distinct meaning of v. 10. . 14. which otherwise would be but a repetition of v. 6. . 8. But it is added, v. 15. that, if the husband make void the vows of his wife, he shall bear her iniquity; that is, if the thing she had vowed was really good for the honour of God and the prosperity of her own soul, and the husband disallow it, out of covetousness, or humour, or to shew his authority, though she be discharged from the obligation of her vow, yet he will have a great deal to answer for.

Now, here it is very observable how carefully the divine law consults the good order of families, and preserves the power of superior relations, and the duty and reverence of inferiors. It is fit that every man should bear rule in his own house, and have his wife and children in subjection, with all gravity; and, rather than that this great rule should be broken, or any encouragement given to inferior relations to break those bonds asunder, God himself would quit his right, and release the obligation, even of a solemn vow; so much does religion strengthen the ties of all relations, and secure the welfare of all societies, and in it the families of the earth are blessed.

CHAP. XXXI.

This chapter belongs to the book of the wars of the Lord, into which, it is probable, it was inserted. It is the history of a Holy War, a war with Midian. Here is, I. A divine command for the war, v. 1, 2. II. The undertaking of the war, v. 3, 6. III. The glorious success of it, v. 7. . 12. IV. Their triumphant return from the war. 1. The respect Moses paid the soldiers, v. 13. 2. The rebuke he gave them for sparing the women, v. 14. . 18. 3. The directions he gave them for the purifying of themselves and their effects, v. 19. . 24. 4. The distribution of the spoil they had taken; one half to the soldiers, the other to the congregation, and a tribute to the Lord out of each, v. 25. . 47. 5. The freewill-offering of the officers, v. 48. . 54.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying. 2. Avenge the children of Israel of the Midianites: afterward shall thou be gathered unto thy people. 3. And Moses spake unto the people, saying, Arm some of yourselves unto the war, and let them go against the Midianites, and avenge the LORD of Midian. 4. Of every tribe a thousand, throughout all the tribes of Israel, shall ye send to the war. 5. So there were delivered out of the thousands of Israel, a thousand of every tribe, twelve thousand armed for war. 6. And Moses sent them to the war, a thousand of every tribe, them and Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, to the war, with the holy instruments, and the trumpets to blow in his hand.

Here,

1. The Lord of Hosts gives orders unto Moses to make war upon the Midianites; and his commission, no doubt, justified this war, though it will not serve to justify the like without such commission. The Midianites were the posterity of Abraham by Keturah, Gen. 25. 2. Some of them settled south of Canaan, among whom Jethro lived, and they retained the worship of the true God; but these were settled east of Canaan, and were fallen into idolatry, neighbours to, and in confederacy with, the Moabites. Their land was not designed to be given to Israel, nor would Israel have meddled with them, if they had not made themselves obnoxious to their resentments, by sending their bad women among them, to draw them to whoredom and idolatry. This was the provocation, this was the quarrel. For this, (says God,) avenge Israel of the Midianites, v. 2. (1.) God would have the Midianites chastised, an inroad made upon that part of their country which lay next to the camp of Israel, and which was concerned in that mischief, probably, more than the Moabites, who therefore were let alone. God will have us to reckon those our worst enemies, that draw us to sin, and to avoid them; and since every man is tempted when he is drawn aside of his own lusts, and those are the Midianites which ensnare us with their wiles, on them we should avenge ourselves; not only make no league with them, but make war upon them by living a life of mortification. God had taken vengeance on his own people for yielding to the Midianites' temptations, now the Midianites must be reckoned with, that gave the temptation, for the deceiver and the deceived are his, (Job 12. 16.) both accountable to his tribunal; and though judgment begin at the house of God, it shall not end there, 1 Pet. 4. 17. There is a day coming, when vengeance will be taken on those that have introduced errors and corruptions into the church, and the Devil that deceived men, will be cast into the lake of fire. Israel's quarrel with Amelek that fought against them, was not avenged till long after, but their quarrel with Midian that debauched them, was speedily avenged, for they were looked upon as much the more dangerous and malicious enemies. (2.) God would have it done by Moses, in his life-time; that he who had so deeply resented that injury, might have the satisfaction of seeing it avenged. "See this execution done upon the enemies of God and Israel, and afterward thou shalt be gathered to thy people." This was the only piece of service of this kind that Moses must further do, and then he has accomplished, as the hireling, his day, and shall have his quietus—enter into rest: hitherto his usefulness must come, and no further; the wars of Canaan must be carried on by another hand. Note, God sometimes removes useful men, when we think they could ill be spared; but this ought to satisfy us, that they are never removed till they have done the work which was appointed them.

2. Moses gives orders to the people to prepare for this expedition, v. 3. He would not have the whole body of the camp to stir, but they must arm some of themselves to the war, such as were either most fit, or most forward, and avenge the Lord of Midian. God said, Avenge Israel, Moses says, Avenge the Lord; for the interests of God and Israel are united, and the cause of both is one and the same. And if God, in what he does, shows himself jealous for the honour of Israel, surely Israel, in what they do, ought to show themselves jealous for the glory of God. Then only we can justify the avenging of ourselves, when it is the vengeance of the Lord that we engage in. Nay, for this reason we are forbidden to avenge ourselves, because God has said, Vengeance is mine, I will repay.

3. A detachment is drawn out accordingly for this service, a thousand for every tribe, 12,000 in all; a small number in comparison with what they could have sent, and, it is probable, small in comparison with the number of the enemies they were sent against. But God would teach them, that it is all one to him to have by many or by few, 1 Sam. 14. 6.

4. Phinehas the son of Eleazer is sent along with them. It is strange that no mention is made of Joshua in this great action. If he was general of these forces, why do we not find him leading them out? If he tarried at home, why do we not find him meeting them with Moses at their return? It is probable, each tribe having a captain of its own thousand, there was no general, but they proceeded in the order of their march through the wilderness, Judah first, and the rest in their posts, under the command of their respective captains, spoken of v. 48. But the war being a holy war, Phinehas was their common head, not to supply the place of a general, but, by the oracle of God, to determine the resolves of their councils of war, in which the captains of thousands would all acquiesce, and according to which they would act in conjunction. He therefore took with him the holy instrument or vessels, probably, the breast-plate of judgment, by which God might be consulted in any emergency. Though he was not yet the High-priest, yet he might be delegated pro hac vice—for this particular occasion, to bear the Urim and Thummim, as 1 Sam. 23. 6. And there was a particular reason for sending Phinehas to preside in this expedition; he had already signaled himself for his zeal against the Midianites and their cursed arts to ensnare Israel, when he slew Cozbi, a daughter of a chief house in Midian, for her impudence in the matter of Peor, ch. 25. 15. He that had so well used the sword of justice against a particular criminal, was best qualified to guide the sword of war against the whole nation. Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things.

7. And they warred against the Midianites, as the LORD commanded Moses; and they slew all the males. 8. And they slew the kings of Midian, beside the rest of them that were slain; namely, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, five kings of Midian: Balaam also the son of Beor they slew with the sword. 9. And the children of Israel took all the women of Midian captives, and their little ones, and took the spoil of all their cattle, and all their flocks, and took all their goods. 10. And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and all their goodly castles, with fire. 11. And they took all the spoil, and all the prey, both of men and of beasts. 12. And they brought the captives, and the prey, and the spoil, unto Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and unto the congregation of the children of Israel, unto the camp at the plains of Moab, which are by Jordan near Jericho.

Here is,

1. The descent which this little army of Israelites made, under the divine commission, conduct, and command, upon the country of Midian. They warred against the Midianites. It is very probable, they first published their manifesto, showing the reasons of the war, and requiring them to give up the ring-leaders of the mischief to justice; for such afterward was the law, (Deut. 20. 10.) and such the practice, Jud. 20. 12, 13. But the Midianites justifying what they had done, and standing by those that had done it, the Israelites attacked them with fire and sword, and all the pious fury which their zeal for God and their people inspired them with.

2. The execution (the military execution) they did in this descent. (1.) They slew all the males, (v. 7.) that is, all they met with as far as they went; they put them all to the sword, and gave no quarter. But that they did not slay all the males of the nation, is certain, for we find the Midianites a powerful and formidable enemy to Israel in the days of Gideon; and they were the Midianites of this country, for they are reckoned with the children of the east, Judg. 6. 3. (2.) They slew the kings of Midian, the same that are called elders of Midian, (ch. 22. 4.) and dukes of Sihon, Josh. 13. 21. Five of these princes are here named, one of which is Zur, probably, the same Zur whose daughter Cozbi was, ch. 25. 15. (3.) They slew Balaam. Many conjectures there are, what brought Balaam among the Midianites at this time; it is probable, the Midianites having intelligence of the march of this army of Israelites against them, hired Balaam to come and assist them with his enchantments; that if he could not prevail to act offensively in their favour, by cursing the armies of Israel, yet he might act defensively, by blessing the country of Midian. Whatever was the occasion of his being there, God's overruling providence brought him thither, and there his just vengeance found him. Had he himself believed what he said of the happy state of Israel, he would not have herded himself thus with the enemies of Israel, but justly does he die the death of the wicked, (though he pretended to desire that of the righteous,) and go down slain to the pit with the uncircumcised, who rebelled thus against the convictions of his own conscience. The Midianites' wives were Balaam's projects, it was therefore just that he should perish with them, Hos. 4. 5. Now was his folly made manifest to all men, who foretold the fate of others, but foresaw not his own. (4.) They took all the women and children captives, v. 9. (5.) They burnt their cities and goodly castles, v. 10. not designing to inhabit them themselves, (that country was out of their line,) but they thus prevented those who had made their escape from sheltering themselves in their own country, and settling there again. Some understand it of their idol-temples; it was fit that they should share in this vengeance. (6.) They plundered the country, and carried off all the cattle, and valuable goods, and so returned to the camp of Israel laden with a very rich booty, v. 9. 11, 12. Thus (as when they came out of Egypt) they were enriched with the spoils of their enemies, and furnished with stock for the good land into which God was bringing them.

13. And Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and all the princes of the congregation, went forth to meet them without the camp. 14. And Moses was wroth with the officers of the host, with the captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, which came from the battle. 15. And Moses said unto them, Have ye saved all the women alive? 16. Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the LORD in the matter of Peor, and there was a plague among the congregation of the LORD. 17. Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him. 18. But all the women-children, that have not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves. 19. And do ye abide without the camp seven days: whosoever hath killed any person, and whosoever hath touched any slain, purify both yourselves and your captives on the third day, and on the seventh day. 20. And purify all your raiment, and all that is made of skins, and all work of goats' hair, and all things made of wood. 21. And Eleazar the priest said unto the men of war which went to the battle, This is the ordinance of the law which the LORD commanded Moses; 22. Only the gold, and the silver, the brass, the iron, the tin, and the lead, 23. Every thing that may abide the fire, ye shall make it go through the fire, and it shall be clean: nevertheless it shall be purified with the water of separation: and all that abideth not the fire ye shall make go through the water. 24. And ye shall wash your clothes on the seventh day, and ye shall be clean, and afterward ye shall come into the camp.

We have here the triumphant return of the army of Israel from the war with Midian. And here,

1. They were met with great respect, v. 13. Moses himself, notwithstanding his age and gravity, walked out of the camp to congratulate their victory, and to grace the solemnity of their triumphs. Public successes should be publicly acknowledged, to the glory of God, and the encouragement of those that have jeopardied their lives in their country's cause.

2. They were severely reprov'd for saving the women alive. It is very probable that Moses had commanded them to kill the women, at least, that was implied in the general order to avenge Israel of the Midianites; the execution having reference to that crime, their drawing them in to the worship of Peor, it was easy to conclude that the women, who were the principal criminals, must not be spared. What! (says Moses) have ye saved the women alive? v. 15. He was moved with a holy indignation at the sight of them. These were they that caused the children of Israel to commit the trespass; and therefore, (1.) It is just that they should die. The law, in case of whoredom, was, The adulterer and adulteress shall surely be put to death. God had put to death the adulterers of Israel by the plague, and now it was fit that the adulteresses of Midian, especially since they had been the tempters, should be put to death by the sword. (2.) "It is dangerous to let them live; they will be still tempting the Israelites to uncleanness, and so your captives will be your conquerors, and a second time your destroyers." Severe orders are therefore given, that all the grown women should be slain in cold blood, and only the female children spared.

3. They were obliged to purify themselves, according to the ceremony of the law, and to abide without the camp seven days, till their purification was accomplished. For, (1.) They had embred their hands in blood, by which, though they had not contracted any moral guilt, the war being just and lawful, yet they were brought under a ceremonial uncleanness, which rendered them unfit to come near the tabernacle till they were purified. Thus God would preserve in their minds a dread and detestation of murder. David must not build the temple, because he had been a man of war, and had shed blood, 1 Chron. 28. 3. (2.) They could not but have touched dead bodies, by which they were polluted, and that required they should be purified with the water of separation, v. 19, 20, 24.

4. They must likewise purify the spoil they had taken; the captives, v. 19. and all the goods, v. 21. . 23. What would bear the fire, must pass through the fire, and what would not, must be washed with water. These things had been used by Midianites, and being now come into the possession of Israelites, it was fit that they should be sanctified to the service of that holy nation, and the honour of their holy God. To us now every thing is sanctified by the word and prayer, if we are sanctified by the Spirit, who is compared both to fire and water. To the pure all things are pure.

25. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 26. Take the sum of the prey that was taken, both of man and of beast, thou, and Eleazar the priest, and the chief fathers of the congregation: 27. And divide the prey into two parts; between them that took the war upon them, who went out to battle, and between all the congregation: 28. And levy a tribute unto the LORD of the men of war which went out to battle: one soul of five hundred, both of the persons, and of the beeves, and of the asses, and of the sheep: 29. Take it of their half, and give it unto Eleazar the priest, for an heave-offering of the LORD. 30. And of the children of Israel's half, thou shalt take one portion of fifty, of the persons, of the beeves, of the asses, and of the flocks, of all manner of beasts, and give them unto the Levites, which keep the charge of the tabernacle of the LORD. 31. And Moses and Eleazar the priest did as the LORD commanded Moses. 32. And the booty, being the rest of the prey which the men of war had caught, was six hundred thousand and seventy thousand and five thousand sheep, 33.

And threescore and twelve thousand beeves, 34. And threescore and one thousand asses, 35. And thirty and two thousand persons in all, of women that had not known man by lying with him. 36. And the half, which was the portion of them that went out to war, was in number three hundred thousand and seven and thirty thousand and five hundred sheep: 37. And the LORD's tribute of the sheep was six hundred and threescore and fifteen. 38. And the beeves were thirty and six thousand; of which the LORD's tribute was threescore and twelve. 39. And the asses were thirty thousand and five hundred; of which the LORD's tribute was threescore and one. 40. And the persons were sixteen thousand; of which the LORD's tribute was thirty and two persons. 41. And Moses gave the tribute, which was the LORD's heave-offering, unto Eleazar the priest, as the LORD commanded Moses. 42. And of the children of Israel's half, which Moses divided from the men that warred, 43. (Now the half that pertained unto the congregation was three hundred thousand and thirty thousand and seven thousand and five hundred sheep, 44. And thirty and six thousand beeves, 45. And thirty thousand asses and five hundred, 46. And sixteen thousand persons;) 47. Even of the children of Israel's half, Moses took one portion of fifty, both of man and of beast, and gave them unto the Levites, which kept the charge of the tabernacle of the LORD; as the LORD commanded Moses.

We have here the distribution of the spoil which was taken in this expedition against Midian. God himself directed how it should be done, and Moses and Eleazar did according to the directions. And thus unhappy contests among themselves were prevented, and the victory was made to turn to the common benefit. It was fit that he who gave them the prey should order the disposal of it: all we have is from God, and therefore must be subject to his will.

1. The prey is ordered to be divided into two parts; one for the twelve thousand men that undertook the war, the other for the congregation. The prey that was divided seems to have been only the captives and the cattle; as for the plate, and jewels, and other goods, every man kept what he took, as is intimated, v. 50 . . 53. That only was distributed which would be of use for the stocking of that good land into which they were going. Now observe, (1.) That the one half of the prey was given to the whole congregation, Moses allotting to each tribe its share, and then leaving it to the heads of the tribes to divide their respective shares among themselves, according to their families. The war was undertaken on the behalf of the whole congregation, they would all have been ready to go to the help of the Lord against the mighty, if they had been so ordered, and they did help, it is likely, by their prayers, and therefore God appoints that they that carried at home should divide the spoil, Ps. 68. 12. David in his time made it a statute and an ordinance for Israel, that as his part is that goes down to the battle, so shall his part be that carrieth by the stuff, 1 Sam. 30. 24, 25. Those that are employed in public trusts must not think to benefit themselves only by their toils and hazards, but must aim at the advantage of the community. (2.) That yet the twelve thousand that went to the battle had as much for their share as the whole congregation (which were fifty times as many) had for their's; so that the particular persons of the soldiery had a much better share than any of their brethren that tarried at home: and good reason they should. The greater pains we take, and the greater hazards we run in the service of God and our generation, the greater will our recompence be at last; for God is not unrighteous to forget the work and labour of love.

2. God was to have a tribute of it; as an acknowledgment of his sovereignty over them in general, and that he was their King, to whom tribute was due; and particularly of his interest in this war and the gains of it, he having given them their success; and that the priests, the LORD's receivers, might have something added to the provision made for their maintenance. Note, Whatever we have, God must have his dues out of it. And here (as before) the soldiers are favoured above the rest of the congregation, for out of the people's share God required one in fifty, but out of the soldiers' share only one in five hundred, because the people got their's easily without any peril or fatigue. The less opportunity we have of honouring God with our personal services, the greater should our pecuniary contributions be. The tribute out of the soldiers' half was given to the priests, v. 29. That out of the people's half was given to the Levites, v. 30. For the priests were taken from among the Levites, as these soldiers from among the people, for special service, and hazardous, and their pay was accordingly.

48. And the officers which were over thousands of the host, the captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds, came near unto Moses: 49. And they said unto Moses, Thy servants have taken the sum of the men of war which are under our charge, and there lacketh not one man of us. 50. We have therefore brought an oblation for the LORD, what every man hath gotten, of jewels of gold, chains, and bracelets, rings, ear-rings, and tablets, to make an atonement for our souls before the LORD. 51. And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of them, even all wrought jewels. 52. And all the gold of the offering that they offered up to the LORD, of the captains of thousands, and of the captains of hundreds, was sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty shekels. 53. (For the men of war had taken spoil, every man for himself.) 54. And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of the captains of thousands and of hundreds, and brought it into the tabernacle of the congregation, for a memorial for the children of Israel before the LORD.

Here is a great example of piety and devotion in the officers of the army; the colonels, that are called captains of thousands, and the inferior officers that were captains of hundreds; they came to Moses as their general and commander in chief; and, though he was now going off the stage, they very humbly and respectfully addressed themselves to him, calling themselves his servants; the honours they had won did not puff them up, so as to make them forget their duty to him. Observe, in their address to him,

1. The pious notice they take of God's wonderful goodness to them in this late expedition, in preserving not only their own lives, but the lives of all the men of war that they had under their charge; so that, upon the review of their muster-roll, it appeared there was not one missing, v. 49. This was very extraordinary, and perhaps cannot be paralleled in any history. So many thousand lives jeopardated in the high places of the field, and not one lost, either by the sword of the enemy, or by any disease or disaster. This was the Lord's doing, and cannot but be marvellous in the eyes of those that consider how the lives of all men, especially soldiers, are continually in their hands. It is an evidence of the ender feeling which these commanders had for their soldiers, and that their lives were very precious to them, that they looked upon it as a mercy to themselves, that none of those under their charge miscarried. Of all that were given them they had lost none: so precious also is the blood of Christ's subjects and soldiers unto him, Ps. 72. 14.

2. The pious acknowledgment they make for this favour, v. 50. Therefore we have brought an oblation to the Lord. The oblation they brought was out of that which every man had gotten, and it was gotten honestly by a divine warrant. Thus every man should lay by, according as God has prospered him, 1 Cor. 16. 2. For where God sows plentifully in the gifts of his bounty, he expects to reap accordingly in the fruits of our piety and charity. The tabernacle first, and the temple afterward, were beautified and enriched with the spoils taken from the enemies of Israel; as by David, 2 Sam. 8. 11, 12. and his captains, 1 Chron. 26. 26, 27. We should never take any thing to ourselves in war, or trade, which we cannot in faith consecrate a part of to God, who hates robbery for burnt-offerings; but when God has remarkably preserved and succeeded us, he expects that we should make some particular return of gratitude to him.

As to this oblation, (1.) The captains offered it to make an atonement for their souls, v. 50. Instead of coming to Moses to demand a recompence for the good service they had done in avenging the Lord of Midian, or to set up trophies of their victory, for the immortalizing of their own names, they bring an oblation to make atonement for their souls, being conscious to themselves, as the best men must be even in their best services, that they had been defective in their duty, not only in that instance for which they were reprov'd, v. 14. but in many others; for there is not a just man upon earth that doeth good, and sinneth not. (2.) Moses accepted it, and laid it up in the tabernacle as a memorial for the children of Israel, v. 54. that is, a monument of God's goodness to them, that they might be encouraged to trust in him in their further wars; and a monument of their gratitude to God; (sacrifices are said to be memorials;) that he, being well-pleas'd with this thankful acknowledgment of favours bestowed, might continue and repeat his mercies to them.

CHAP. XXXII.

In this chapter we have, I. The humble request of the tribes of Reuben and Gad, for an inheritance on that side Jordan, where Israel now lay encamped, v. 1. . 5. II. Moses's misinterpretation of their request, v. 6. . 15. III. Their explication of it, and stating it right, v. 16. . 19. IV. The grant of their petition under the provisos and limitations which they themselves proposed, v. 20. . 42.

1. NOW the children of Reuben and the children of Gad had a very great multitude of cattle: and when they saw the land of Jazer, and the land of Gilead, that, behold, the place was a place for cattle; 2. The children of Gad and the children of Reuben came and spake unto Moses, and to Eleazar the priest, and unto the princes of the congregation, saying, 3. Ataroth, and Dibon, and Jazer, and Nimrah, and Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Shebam, and Nebo, and Beon, 4. Even the country which the Lord smote before the congregation of Israel, is a land for cattle, and thy servants have cattle: 5. Wherefore, said they, if we have found grace in thy sight, let this land be given unto thy servants for a possession, and bring us not over Jordan. 6. And Moses said unto the children of Gad and to the children of Reuben, Shall your brethren go to war, and shall ye sit here?

7. And wherefore discourage ye the heart of the children of Israel from going over into the land which the LORD hath given them? 8. Thus did your fathers, when I sent them from Kadesh-barnea to see the land. 9. For when they went up unto the valley of Eshcol, and saw the land, they discouraged the heart of the children of Israel, that they should not go into the land which the LORD had given them. 10. And the LORD's anger was kindled the same time, and he sware, saying, 11. Surely none of the men that came up out of Egypt, from twenty years old and upward, shall see the land which I sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob; because they have not wholly followed me: 12. Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite, and Joshua the son of Nun: for they have wholly followed the LORD. 13. And the LORD's anger was kindled against Israel, and he made them wander in the wilderness forty years, until all the generation, that had done evil in the sight of the LORD, was consumed. 14. And, behold, ye are risen up in your fathers' stead, an increase of sinful men, to augment yet the fierce anger of the LORD toward Israel. 15. For if ye turn away from after him, he will yet again leave them in the wilderness; and ye shall destroy all this people.

Israel's tents were now pitched in the plains of Moab, where they continued many months, looking back upon the conquests they had already made of the land of Sihon and Og, and looking forward to Canaan, which they hoped in a little time to make themselves masters of. While they made this stand, and were at a pause, this great affair of the disposal of the conquests they had already made, was here concerted and settled, not by any particular order or appointment of God, but at the special instance and request of two of the tribes, which Moses, after a long debate that arose upon it, consented to. For even then, when so much was done by the extraordinary appearances of divine providence, many things were left to the conduct of human prudence; for God, in governing both the world and the church, makes use of the reason of men, and serves his own purposes by it.

I. Here is a motion made by the Reubenites and Gadites, that the land which they had lately possessed themselves of, and which in the right of conquest belonged to Israel in common, might be assigned to them in particular for their inheritance; upon the general idea they had of the Land of Promise, they supposed this would be about their proportion. Reuben and Gad were encamped under the same standard, and so had the better opportunity of comparing notes, and settling this matter between themselves. In the first verse, the children of Reuben are named first, but afterward the children of Gad are, v. 2, 25, 31. either because the Gadites made the first motion, and were most forward for it, or because they were the better spokesmen, and had more of the art of management; Reuben's tribe still lying under Jacob's sentence, he shall not excel. Two things, common in the world, induced these tribes to make this choice, and this motion upon it, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, 1 John, 2. 16. 1. The lust of the eye. This land which they coveted, was not only beautiful for situation, and pleasant to the eye, but it was good for food, food for cattle; and they had a great multitude of cattle, above the rest of the tribes, it is supposed, because they brought more out of Egypt than the rest did, but that was forty years before; and stock of cattle increase and decrease in less time than that; therefore I rather think they had been better husbands of their cattle in the wilderness, had tended them better, had taken more care of the breed, and not been so profuse as their neighbours in eating the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall. Now they, having these large stocks, coveted land proportionable. Many scriptures speak of Bashan and Gilead as places famous for cattle; they had been so already, and therefore these tribes hoped they would be so to them, and whatever comes of it, here they desire to take their lot. The judicious Calvin thinks there was much amiss in the principle they went upon, and that they consulted their own private convenience more than the public good; that they had not such regard to the honour and interest of Israel, and the promise made to Abraham of the land of Canaan, (strictly so called,) as they ought to have had. And still, it is too true, that many seek their own things more than the things of Jesus Christ, (Phil. 2. 21.) and that many are influenced by their secular interest and advantage to take up short of the heavenly Canaan. Their spirits agree too well with this world, and with the things that are seen, that are temporal; and they say, "It is good to be here," and so lose what is hereafter for want of seeking it. Lot thus chose by the sight of the eye, and smarted for his choice. Would we choose our portion aright, we must look above the things that are seen. 2. Perhaps there was something of the pride of life in it. Reuben was the first-born of Israel, but he had lost his birth-right; divers of the tribes, and Judah especially, had risen above him, so that he could not expect the best lot in Canaan; and therefore, to save the shadow of a birthright, when he had forfeited the substance, he here catches at the first lot, though it was out of Canaan, and far off from the tabernacle. Thus Esau sold his birthright, and yet got to be served first with an inheritance in mount Seir. The tribe of Gad descended from the first-born of Zilpah, and were like pretenders with the Reubenites; and Manasseh too was a first-born, but knew he must be eclipsed by Ephraim his younger brother, and therefore he also coveted to get precedency.

II. Moses's dislike of this motion, and the severe rebuke he gives to it, as a faithful prince and prophet.

It must be confessed that, primâ facie—at first sight, the thing looked ill, especially the closing words of their petition, (v. 5.) Bring us not over Jordan. 1. It seemed to proceed from a bad principle; a contempt of the land of promise, which Moses himself was so desirous of a sight of: a distrust too of the power of God to dispossess the Canaanites; as if a lot in a land which they knew, and which was already conquered, was more desirable than a lot in a land they knew not, and which was yet to be conquered; one bird in the hand is worth two in the bush: there seemed also to be covetousness in it; for that which they insisted on, was, that it was convenient for their cattle: it argued likewise a neglect of their brethren, as if they cared not what became of Israel, while they themselves were well provided for. 2. It might have been of bad consequence. The people might have taken improper hints from it, and have suggested that they were few enough, when they had their whole number, to deal with the Canaanites, but how unequal would the match be, if they should drop two tribes and a half (above a fifth part of their strength) on this side Jordan. It would likewise be a bad precedent; if they must have the land thus granted them as soon as it was conquered, other tribes might make the same pretensions and claims, and so the regular disposition of the land by lot would be anticipated.

Moses is therefore very warm upon them, which is to be imputed to his pious zeal against sin, and not to any peevishness, the effect of old age, for his meekness abated not, any more than his natural force.

(1.) He shows them what he apprehended to be evil in this motion, that it would discourage the heart of their brethren, v. 6, 7. "What!" (says he, with a holy indignation at their selfishness,) "shall your brethren go to war, and expose themselves to all the hardships and hazards of the field, and shall you sit here at your ease? No, do not mistake yourselves, you shall never be indulged by me in this sloth and cowardice." It ill becomes any of God's Israel to sit down unconcerned in the difficult and perilous concernments of their brethren, whether public or personal.

(2.) He reminds them of the fatal consequences of the unbelief and faint-heartedness of their fathers, when they were, as these here, just ready to enter Canaan. He recites the story very particularly, (v. 8—13.) "Thus did your fathers, whose punishment should be a warning to you to take heed of sinning after the similitude of their transgression."

(3.) He gives them fair warning of the mischief that would be likely to follow upon this separation, which they were about to make from the camp of Israel; they would be in danger of bringing wrath upon the whole congregation, and hurrying them all back again into the wilderness, v. 15, 16. "Ye are risen up in your fathers' stead, to despise the pleasant land and reject it as they did, when we hoped ye were risen up in their stead to possess it." It was an encouragement to Moses to see what an increase of men they were, but a discouragement to see that they were without an increase of sinful men, treading in the steps of their fathers' impiety. It is sad when we observe, as too often we may, that the rising generation in families and countries is not only no better, but worse, than that which went before it; and what comes of it? Why, it augments the fierce anger of the Lord; not only continues that fire, but increases it, and fills the measure often, till it overflows in a deluge of desolation. Note, If men did consider as they ought, what would be the end of sin, they would be afraid of the beginnings of it.

16. And they came near unto him, and said, We will build sheepfolds here for our cattle, and cities for our little ones: 17. But we ourselves will go ready armed before the children of Israel, until we have brought them unto their place; and our little ones shall dwell in the fenced cities because of the inhabitants of the land. 18. We will not return unto our houses, until the children of Israel have inherited every man his inheritance: 19. For we will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan, or forward; because our inheritance is fallen to us on this side Jordan eastward. 20. And Moses said unto them, If ye will do this thing, if ye will go armed before the LORD to war, 21. And will go all of you armed over Jordan before the LORD, until he hath driven out his enemies from before him, 22. And the land be subdued before the LORD: then afterward ye shall return, and be guiltless before the LORD, and before Israel; and this land shall be your possession before the LORD. 23. But if ye will not do so, behold, ye have sinned against the LORD: and be sure your sin will find you out. 24. Build ye cities for your little ones, and folds for your sheep; and do that which hath proceeded out of your mouth. 25. And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben spake unto Moses, saying, Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth. 26. Our little ones, our wives, our flocks, and all our cattle, shall be there in the cities of Gilead: 27. But thy servants will pass over, every man armed for war, before the LORD to battle, as my lord saith.

We have here the accommodating of the matter between Moses and the two tribes, about their settlement on this side Jordan. Probably, the petitioners withdrew, and considered with themselves what answer they should return to the severe reproof Moses had given them; and, after some consultation, they return with this proposal, that their men of war should go and assist their brethren in the conquest of Canaan, and they would leave their families and flocks behind them in this land: and thus they might have their request, and no harm would be done.

Now it is uncertain whether they designed this at first, when they brought their petition, or no. 1. If they did, it is an instance how often that which is honestly meant is unhappily misinterpreted. Yet Moses herein was excusable, for he had reason to suspect the worst of them, and the rebuke he gave them was from the abundance of his care to prevent sin. 2. But if they did not, it is an instance of the good effect of plain dealing; Moses, by shewing them their sin, and the danger of it, brought them to their duty, without murmuring or disputing. They object not that their brethren were able to contend with the Canaanites without their help, especially since they were sure of God's fighting for them; but engage themselves to stand by them.

I. Their proposal is very fair and generous, and such as, instead of disheartening, would rather encourage their brethren. 1. That their men of war, who were fit for service, would go ready armed before the children of Israel into the land of Canaan; so far would they be from deserting them, that, if it were thought fit, they would lead them on, and be foremost in all dangerous enterprises. So far were they from either distrusting or despising the conquest of Canaan, that they would assist in it with the utmost readiness and resolution. 2. That they would leave their families and cattle behind them, who would have been but the incumbrance of their camp, and so they would be the more serviceable to their brethren, v. 16. 3. That they would not return to their possessions till the conquest of Canaan was completed, v. 18. Their brethren should have their best help as long as they needed it. 4. That yet they would not expect any share of the land that was yet to be conquered, v. 19. "We will not desire to inherit with them, nor, under colour of assisting them in the war, put in for a share with them in the land; no, we will be content with our inheritance on this side Jordan, and there will be so much the more on yonder side for them."

II. Moses thereupon grants their request, upon the consideration that they would adhere to their proposals. 1. He insists much upon it, that they should never lay down their arms till their brethren laid down their's. They promised to go armed before the children of Israel, v. 17. "Nay," (says Moses,) "ye shall go armed before the Lord, v. 20, 21. It is God's cause more than your brethren's, and to him you must have an eye, not to them only." Before the Lord, that is, Before the ark of the Lord, the token of his presence, which, it should seem, they carried about with them in the wars of Canaan, and immediately before which these two tribes were posted, as we find in the order of their march, ch. 2. 10, 17. 2. Upon this condition, he grants them this land, and neither sin nor blame should cleave to it; neither sin before God, nor blame before Israel; and, whatever possessions we have, it is desirable thus to come guiltless to them. But, 3. He warns them of the danger of breaking their word; If you fail, you sin against the Lord, (v. 23.) and not against your brethren only, and be sure your sin will find you out, that is, "God will certainly reckon with you for it, though you may make a light matter of it." Note, Sin will, without doubt, find out the sinner sooner or later. It concerns us therefore to find our sins out, that we may repent of them, and forsake them, lest our sins find us out, to our ruin and confusion.

III. They unanimously agree to the provisos and conditions of the grant, and do, as it were, give bond for performance, by a solemn promise, v. 25. Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth. Their brethren had all contributed their assistance to the conquest of this country, which they desired for a possession, and therefore they owned themselves obliged in justice to help them in the conquest of that which was to be their possession. Having received kindness, we ought to return it, though it was not so conditioned when we received it. We may suppose that this promise was understood on both sides, so as not to oblige all that were numbered of these tribes to go over armed, but those only that were fittest for the expedition, that would be most serviceable, while it was necessary that some should be left to till the ground, and guard the country; and accordingly we find that about forty thousand of the two tribes and a half went over armed, Josh. 4. 13. whereas their whole number was about a hundred thousand.

28. So concerning them Moses commanded Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the chief fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel: 29. And Moses said unto them, If the children of Gad and the children of Reuben will pass with you over Jordan, every man armed to battle, before the LORD, and the land shall be subdued before you; then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession: 30. But if they will not pass over with you armed, they shall have possessions among you in the land of Canaan. 31. And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben answered, saying, As the LORD hath said unto thy servants, so will we do. 32. We will pass over armed before the LORD into the land of Canaan, that the possession of our inheritance on this side Jordan may be our's. 33. And Moses gave unto them, even to the children of Gad, and to the children of Reuben, and unto half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph, the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, the land, with the cities thereof in the coasts, even the cities of the country round about. 34. And the children of Gad built Dibon, and Ataroth, and Aroer, 35. And Atroth, Shophan, and Jaazer, and Jogbehah, 36. And Beth-nimrah, and Beth-haran, fenced cities: and folds for sheep. 37. And the children of Reuben built Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Kirjathaim, 38. And Nebo, and Baal-meon, (their names being changed,) and Shilmah: and gave other names unto the cities which they builded. 39. And the children of Machir the son of Manasseh went to Gilead, and took it, and dispossessed the Amorite which was in it. 40. And Moses gave Gilead unto Machir the son of Manasseh; and he dwelt therein. 41. And Jair the son of Manasseh went and took the small towns thereof, and called them Havoth-jair. 42. And Nobah went and took Kenath, and the villages thereof, and called it Nobah, after his own name.

Here,

1. Moses settles this matter with Eleazar, and with Joshua who was to be his successor, knowing that he himself must not live to see it perfected, v. 28. 30. He gives them an estate upon condition, leaving it to Joshua, if they fulfilled the condition, to declare the estate absolute. "If they will not go over with you," he does not say, "you shall give them no inheritance at all," but "you shall not give them this inheritance which they covet. If their militia will not come over with you, compel the whole tribes to come over, and let them take their lot with their brethren, and fare as they fare; they shall have possessions in Canaan, and let them not expect that the lot will favour them." Hereupon they repeat their promise to adhere to their brethren, v. 31, 32.

2. Moses settles them in the land they desired. He gave it them for a possession, v. 33. Here is the first mention of the half tribe of Manasseh, coming in with them for a share; probably, they had not joined with them in the petition, but the land, when it came to be apportioned, proving to be too much for them, this half tribe had a lot among them, either at their request, or by divine direction, or because they had signalized themselves in the conquest of this country; for the children of Machir, a stout and warlike family, had taken Gilead, and dispossessed the Amorites, v. 39. "Let them win it and wear it; get it and take it." And they being celebrated for their courage and bravery, it was for the common safety to put them in this frontier country. Concerning the settlement of these tribes here; Observe, (1.) That they built the cities, that is, repaired them, because either they had been damaged by the war, or the Amorites had suffered them to go to decay. (2.) That they changed the names of them; (v. 38.) either to show their authority, that the change of the names might signify the change of their owners; or because their names were idolatrous, and carried in them a respect to the dung-hill deities that were there worshipped. Nebo and Baal were names of their gods, which they were forbidden to make mention of, (Exod. 23. 13.) and which, by changing the names of these cities, they endeavoured to bury in oblivion; and God promises to take away the names of Baalim out of the mouths of his people, Hos. 2. 17.

Lastly, It is observable, that as these tribes were now first placed before the other tribes, so, long afterward, they were displaced before the other tribes. We find that they were carried captive into Assyria, some years before the other tribes, 2 Kings 15. 29. Such a proportion does Providence sometimes observe, in balancing prosperity and adversity; he sets the one over-against the other.

CHAP. XXXIII.

In this chapter, we have, I. A particular account of the removals and encampments of the children of Israel, from their escape out of Egypt to their entrance into Canaan; sixty-two in all: with some remarkable events that happened at some of those places, v. 1—19. II. A strict command given to drive out all the inhabitants of the land of Canaan, which they were now going to conquer and take possession of, v. 50—56. So that the former part of the chapter looks back upon their march through the wilderness, the latter looks forward to their settlement in Canaan.

1. THESSE are the journies of the children of Israel, which went forth out of the land of Egypt with their armies, under the hand of Moses and Aaron. 2. And Moses wrote their goings out according to their journies by the commandment of the LORD: and these are their journies according to their goings out. 3. And they departed from Rameses in the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month: on the morrow after the passover the children of Israel went out with a high hand in the face of all the Egyptians. 4. (For the Egyptians buried all their first-born, which the LORD had smitten among them: upon their gods also the LORD executed judgments.) 5. And the children of Israel removed from Rameses, and pitched in Succoth. 6. And they departed from Succoth, and pitched in Etham, which is in the edge of the wilderness. 7. And they removed from Etham, and turned again unto Pi-hahiroth, which is before Baal-zephon: and they pitched before Migdol. 8. And they departed from before Pi-hahiroth, and passed through the midst of the sea into the wilderness, and went three days' journey in the wilderness of Etham, and pitched in Marah. 9. And they removed from Marah, and came unto Elim; and in Elim were twelve fountains of water, and threescore and ten palm-trees; and they pitched there. 10. And they removed from Elim, and encamped by the Red sea. 11. And they removed from the Red sea, and encamped in the wilderness of Sin. 12. And they took their journey out of the wilderness of Sin, and encamped in Dophkah. 13. And they departed from Dophkah, and encamped in Alush. 14. And they removed from Alush, and encamped at Rephidim, where was no water for the people to drink. 15. And they departed from Rephidim, and pitched in the wilderness of Sinai. 16. And they removed from the desert of Sinai, and pitched at Kibroth-hattaavah. 17. And they departed from Kibroth-hattaavah, and encamped at Hazeroth. 18. And they departed from Hazeroth, and pitched in Rithmah. 19. And they departed from Rithmah, and pitched at Rimmon-parez. 20. And they departed from Rimmon-parez, and pitched in Libnah. 21. And they removed from Libnah, and pitched at Rissah. 22. And they journeyed from Rissah, and pitched in Kehelathah. 23. And they went from Kehelathah, and pitched in mount Shapher. 24. And they removed from mount Shapher, and encamped in Haradah. 25. And they removed from Haradah, and pitched in Makbelloth. 26. And they removed from Makbelloth, and encamped at Tahath. 27. And they departed from Tahath, and pitched at Tarah. 28. And they removed from Tarah, and pitched in Mithcah. 29. And they went from Mithcah, and pitched in Hashmonah. 30. And they departed from Hashmonah, and encamped at Moseroth. 31. And they departed from Moseroth, and pitched in Bene-jaakan. 32. And they removed from Bene-jaakan, and encamped at Hor-hagidgad. 33. And they went from Hor-hagidgad, and pitched in Jotbathah. 34. And they removed from Jotbathah, and encamped at Ebronah. 35. And they departed from Ebronah, and encamped at Ezion-gaber. 36. And they removed from Ezion-gaber, and pitched in the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh. 37. And they removed from Kadesh, and pitched in mount Hor, in the edge of the land of Edom. 38. And Aaron the priest went up unto mount Hor at the commandment of the LORD, and died there, in the fortieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the first day of the fifth month. 39. And Aaron was an hundred and twenty and three years old when he died in mount Hor. 40.

And king Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south in the land of Canaan, heard of the coming of the children of Israel. 41. And they departed from mount Hor, and pitched at Zalmonah. 42. And they departed from Zalmonah, and pitched in Punon. 43. And they departed from Punon, and pitched in Oboth. 44. And they departed from Oboth, and pitched in Ije-abarim, in the border of Moab. 45. And they departed from Iim, and pitched in Dibon-Gad. 46. And they removed from Dibon-Gad, and encamped in Almon-diblahaim. 47. And they removed from Almon-diblahaim, and pitched in the mountains of Abarim, before Nebo. 48. And they departed from the mountains of Abarim, and pitched in the plains of Moab, by Jordan, near Jericho. 49. And they pitched by Jordan, from Beth-jesimoth, even unto Abel-shittim, in the plains of Moab.

This is a review and brief rehearsal of the travels of the children of Israel through the wilderness; it was a memorable history, and well worthy to be thus abridged, and when thus abridged to be preserved, to the honour of God that led them, and for the encouragement of the generations that followed. Observe here,

1. How the account was kept, (v. 2.) Moses wrote their goings out. When they began this tedious march, God ordered him to keep a journal or diary, and to insert in it all the remarkable occurrences of their way, that it might be a satisfaction to himself in the review, and an instruction to others when it should be published. It may be of good use to private christians, but especially for those in public stations, to preserve in writing an account of the providences of God concerning them, the constant series of mercies they have experienced, especially those turns and changes which have made some days of their lives more remarkable. Our memories are deceitful and need this help, that we may remember all the way which the Lord our God has led us in this wilderness, Deut. 8. 2.

2. What the account itself was. It began with their departure out of Egypt, continued with their march through the wilderness, and ended in the plains of Moab, where they now lay encamped.

(1.) Some things are observed here concerning their departure out of Egypt, which they are reminded of upon all occasions, as a work of wonder never to be forgotten. [1.] That they went forth with their armies, (v. 1.) rank and file, as an army with banners. [2.] Under the hand of Moses and Aaron, their guides, overseers, and rulers, under God. [3.] With a high hand, because God's hand was high that wrought for them, and in the sight of all the Egyptians, v. 3. They did not steal away clandestinely, (Isa. 52. 12.) but in defiance of their enemies, to whom God had made them such a burdensome stone, that they neither could, nor would, nor durst, oppose them. [4.] They went forth while the Egyptians were burying, or at least preparing to bury, their first-born. [5.] To all the plagues of Egypt it is added here, that on their gods also the Lord executed judgment. Their idols, which they worshipped, it is probable, were broken down, as Dagon afterward before the ark; so that they should not consult them about this great affair. To this perhaps there is a reference, Isa. 19. 1. The idols of Egypt shall be moved at his presence.

(2.) Concerning their travels toward Canaan. Observe, [1.] They were continually upon the remove. When they had pitched a little while in one place, they departed from that to another. Such is our state in this world; we have here no continuing city. [2.] Most of their way lay through a wilderness, uninhabited, untracked, unfurnished even with the necessaries of human life; which magnifies the wisdom and power of God, by whose wonderful conduct and bounty the thousands of Israel not only subsisted for forty years in that desolate place, but came out at least as numerous and vigorous as they went in. At first, they pitched in the edge of the wilderness, (v. 6.) but afterward, in the heart of it; by lesser difficulties God prepares his people for greater. We find them in the wilderness of Etham, (v. 8.) of Sin, (v. 11.) of Sinai, v. 15. Our removes in this world are but from one wilderness to another. [3.] That they were led to and fro, forward and backward, as in a maze or labyrinth, and yet were all the while under the direction of the pillar of cloud and fire. He led them about, (Deut. 32. 10.) and yet led them the right way, Ps. 107. 7. The way which God takes in bringing his people to himself, is always the best way, though it does not always seem to us the nearest way. [4.] Some events are mentioned in this journal, as their want of water at Rephidim, (v. 14.) the death of Aaron, (v. 38, 39.) the insult of Arad, (v. 40.) and the very name of Kibroth-hattavah, the graves of lusts, (v. 16.) has a story depending upon it. Thus we ought to keep in mind the providences of God concerning us and our families, us and our land; and the many instances of that divine care which led us, and fed us, and kept us, all our days hitherto. Shittim, the place where the people sinned in the matter of Peor, (ch. 25. 1.) is here called Abel-shittim; Abel signifies mourning, (as Gen. 50. 11.) and, probably, this place was so called from the mourning of the good people of Israel for that sin, and God's wrath against them for it. It was so great a mourning, that it gave a name to the place.

50. And the LORD spake unto Moses, in the plains of Moab, by Jordan near Jericho, saying, 51. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye are passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan; 52. Then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their molten images, and quite pluck down all their high places. 53. And ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein: for I have given you the land to possess it. 54. And ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families; and to the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less inheritance; every man's inheritance shall be in the place where his lot falleth; according to the tribes of your fathers ye shall inherit. 55. But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you; then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them, shall be pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell. 56. Moreover it shall come to pass, that I shall do unto you as I thought to do unto them.

While the children of Israel were in the wilderness, their total separation from all other people kept them out of the way of temptation to idolatry, and perhaps that was one thing intended by their long confinement in the wilderness, that thereby the idols of Egypt might be forgotten, and the people aired (as it were) and purified from infection, and the generation that entered Canaan, might be such as never knew those depths of Satan. But now that they were to pass over Jordan, they were entering again into that temptation, and therefore,

1. They are strictly charged utterly to destroy all the remnants of idolatry; they must not only drive out the inhabitants of the land, that they might possess their country, but they must deface all their idolatrous pictures and images, and pull down all their high places, v. 52. They must not preserve any of them, no not as monuments of antiquity to gratify the curious, or as ornaments of their houses, or toys for their children to play with, but they must destroy all; both in token of their abhorrence and detestation of idolatry, and to prevent their being tempted to worship those images, and the false gods represented by them, or to worship the God of Israel by such images or representations.

2. They are assured, that, if they did so, God would by degrees put them in full possession of the land of promise, v. 53, 54. If they would keep themselves pure from the idols of Canaan, God would enrich them with the wealth of Canaan. Learn not their way, and then fear not their power.

3. They are threatened, that, if they spared either the idols or the idolaters, they should be beaten with their own rod, and their sin would certainly be their punishment. (1.) They would foster snakes in their own bosoms, v. 55. The remnant of the Canaanites, if they made any league with them, though it were but a cessation of arms, would be pricks in their eyes, and thorns in their sides, that is, they would be on all occasions vexatious to them, insulting them, robbing them, and, to the utmost of their power, making mischief among them. We must expect trouble and affliction from that, whatever it is, which we sinfully indulge; that which we are willing should tempt us, we shall find will vex us. (2.) The righteous God would turn that wheel upon the Israelites, which was to have crushed the Canaanites, v. 56. I shall do to you, as I thought to do unto them. It was intended that the Canaanites should be dispossessed, but if the Israelites fell in with them, and learned their way, they should be dispossessed, for God's displeasure would justly be greater against them than against the Canaanites themselves. Let us hear this, and fear. If we do not drive out sin, sin will drive us out; if we be not the death of our lusts, our lusts will be the death of our souls.

CHAP. XXXIV.

In this chapter God directs Moses, and he is to direct Israel, I. Concerning the bounds and borders of the land of Canaan, v. 1..15. II. Concerning the division and distribution of it to the tribes of Israel, v. 16..24.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Command the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land of Canaan; (this is the land that shall fall unto you for an inheritance, even the land of Canaan with the coasts thereof;) 3. Then your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin along by the coast of Edom, and your south border shall be the outmost coast of the Salt sea eastward: 4. And your border shall turn from the south to the ascent of Akrabbim, and pass on to Zin: and the going forth thereof shall be from the south to Kadesh-barnea, and shall go on to Hazar-addar, and pass on to Azmon: 5. And the border shall fetch a compass from Azmon unto the river of Egypt, and the goings out of it shall be at the sea. 6. And as for the western border, ye shall even have the great sea for a border: this shall be your west border. 7. And this shall be your north border: from the great sea ye shall point out for you mount Hor: 8. From mount Hor ye shall point out your border unto the entrance of Hamath; and the goings forth of the border shall be to Zedad: 9. And the border shall go on to Ziphron, and the goings out of it shall be at Hazar-enan: this shall be your north border. 10. And ye shall point out your east border from Hazar-enan to Shepham: 11. And the coast shall go down from Shepham to Riblah, on the east side of Ain; and the border shall descend, and shall reach unto the side of the sea of Chinnereth eastward: 12. And the border shall go down to Jordan, and the goings out of it shall be at the Salt sea: this shall be your land with the coasts thereof round about. 13. And Moses commanded the children of Israel, saying, This is the land which ye shall inherit by lot, which the LORD commanded to give unto the nine tribes, and to the half tribe: 14. For the tribe of the children of Reuben according to the house of their fathers, and the tribe of the children of Gad according to the house of their fathers, have received their inheritance; and half the tribe of Manasseh have received their inheritance: 15. The two tribes and the half tribe have received their inheritance on this side Jordan near Jericho eastward, toward the sun-rising.

We have here a particular draught of the line by which the land of Canaan was meted, and bounded, on all sides. God directed Moses to settle it here, not as a geographer in his map, only to please the curious, but as a prince in his grant, that it may be certainly known what passes and is conveyed by the grant. There was a much larger possession promised them, which in due time they should be possessed of, if they had been obedient, reaching even to the river Euphrates, Deut. 11. 24. And even so far the dominion of Israel did extend in David's time and Solomon's, 2 Chron. 9. 26. But this here described is Canaan only, which was the lot of the nine tribes and a half, for the other two and a half were already settled, v. 14, 15. Now concerning the limits of Canaan, observe,

I. That it was limited within certain bounds: for God appoints the bounds of our habitation, Acts. 17. 26. The borders are set them, 1. That they might know whom they were to dispossess, and how far the commission which was given them extended, ch. 33. 53. that they should drive out the inhabitants. Those that lay within these borders, and those only, they must destroy; hitherto their bloody sword must go, and no further. 2. That they might know what to expect the possession of themselves. God would not have his people to enlarge their desire of worldly possessions, but to know when they have enough, and to rest satisfied with it. The Israelites themselves must not be placed alone in the midst of the earth, but must leave room for their neighbours to live by them. God sets bounds to our lot; let us then set bounds to our desires, and bring our mind to our condition.

II. That it lay (comparatively) in a very little compass; as it is here bounded, it is reckoned to be but about one hundred and sixty miles in length, and about fifty in breadth; perhaps it did not contain more than half as much ground as England; and yet this is the country which was promised to the father of the faithful, and was the possession of the seed of Israel. This was that little spot of ground in which only, for many ages, God was known, and his name was great, Ps. 76. 1. This was the vineyard of the Lord, the garden enclosed; but, as it is with gardens and vineyards, the narrowness of the extent was abundantly compensated by the extraordinary fruitfulness of the soil, otherwise it could not have subsisted so numerous a nation as did inhabit it. See here then, 1. How little a part of the world God has for himself; though the earth is his, and the fulness thereof, yet few have the knowledge of him, and serve him; but those few are happy, very happy, because fruitful to God. 2. How little a share of the world God often gives to his own people. They that have their portion in heaven, have reason to be content with a small pittance of this earth; but as, here, what is wanting in quantity is made up in quality, a little that a righteous man has, having it from the love of God, and with his blessing, is far better, and more comfortable, than the riches of many wicked, Ps. 37. 16.

III. It is observable what the bounds and limits of it were, 1. Canaan was itself a pleasant land, (so it is called, Dan. 8. 9.) and yet it bordered upon wildernesses and seas, and was surrounded with divers melancholy prospects. Thus the vineyard of the church is compassed on all hands with the desert of this world, which serves as a foil to it, to make it appear the more beautiful for situation. 2. Many of its borders were its defences, and natural fortifications, to render the accesses of its enemies the more difficult; to intimate to them that the God of nature was their Protector, and with his favour would compass them as with a shield. 3. The border reached to the river of Egypt, v. 5, that the sight of that country, which they could look into out of their own, might remind them of their bondage there, and their wonderful deliverance thence. 4. Their border is here made to begin at the Salt sea, v. 3. and there it ends, v. 12. That was the remaining lasting monument of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah; that pleasant fruitful vale, in which these cities stood, became a lake, which was never stirred by any wind, bore no vessels, was replenished with no fish, no living creature of any sort being found in it, therefore called the Dead sea; this was part of their border, that it might be a constant warning to them, to take heed of those sins which had been the ruin of Sodom; yet the iniquity of Sodom was afterward found in Israel, Ezek. 16. 49. For which Canaan was made, though not a salt sea, as Sodom, yet a barren soil, and continues so to this day. 5. Their western border was the Great sea, (v. 6.) which is now called the Mediterranean. Some make that sea itself to be a part of their possession, and that, by virtue of this grant, they had the dominion of it, and if they had not forfeited it by sin, might have rode masters of it.

16. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 17. These are the names of the men which shall divide the land unto you: Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun. 18. And ye shall take one prince of every tribe, to divide the land by inheritance. 19. And the names of the men are these: of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh. 20. And of the tribe of the children of Simeon, Shemuel the son of Ammihud. 21. Of the tribe of Benjamin, Elidad the son of Chislon. 22. And the prince of the tribe of the children of Dan, Bukki the son of Jogli. 23. The prince of the children of Joseph, for the tribe of the children of Manasseh, Hanniel the son of Ephod. 24. And the prince of the tribe of the children of Ephraim, Kennel the son of Shiphtan. 25. And the prince of the tribe of the children of Zebulun, Elizaphan the son of Parnach. 26. And the prince of the tribe of the children of Issachar, Paltiel the son of Azzan. 27. And the prince of the tribe of the children of Asher, Abihud the son of Shelomi. 28. And the prince of the tribe of the children of Naphtali, Pedahel the son of Ammihud. 29. These are they whom the LORD commanded to divide the inheritance unto the children of Israel in the land of Canaan.

God here appoints commissioners for the dividing of the land to them. The conquest of it is taken for granted, though as yet there was never a stroke struck toward it; here is no nomination of the generals and commanders in chief that should carry on the war; for they were to get the land in possession, not by their own sword or bow, but by the power and favour of God; and so confident must they be of victory and success while God fought for them, that the persons must now be named, who should be intrusted with the dividing of the land, that is, who should preside in casting the lots, and determine controversies that might arise, and see that all was done fairly.

1. The principal commissioners, who were of the Quorum, were Eleazar and Joshua, v. 17. typifying Christ, who, as Priest and King, divides the heavenly Canaan to the spiritual Israel; yet as they were to go by the lot, so Christ acknowledges the disposal must be by the will of the Father, Matth. 20. 23. Compare Eph. 1. 11.

2. Beside these, that there might be no suspicion of partiality, a prince of each tribe was employed to inspect this matter, and to see that the tribe he served for was by no means injured. Public affairs should be so managed, as not only to give their right to all, but, if possible, to give satisfaction to all that they have right done them. It is a happiness to a land, to have the princes of their people meet together, some out of every tribe, to concert the affairs that are of common concern; a constitution, which is the abundant honour, ease, and safety, of the nation that is blessed with it.

Some observe, that the order of the tribes here very much differs from that in which they had hitherto, upon all occasions, been named, and agrees with the neighbourhood of their lots in the division of the land. Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, the three first here named, lay close together; the inheritance of Dan lay next them on one side; that of Ephraim and Manasseh on another side; Zebulun and Issachar lay abreast more northerly; and lastly, Ashur and Naphtali most northward of all, as is easy to observe in looking over a map of Canaan; this (says Bishop Patrick) is an evidence that Moses was guided by a divine Spirit in his writings. Known unto God are all his works beforehand, and what is new and surprising to us he perfectly foresaw, without any confusion or uncertainty.

CHAP. XXXV.

Orders having been given before for the dividing of the land of Canaan among the lay-tribes, (as I may call them,) care is here taken for a competent provision for the clergy, the tribe of Levi, which ministered in holy things. I. Forty-eight cities were to be assigned them, with their suburbs, some in every tribe, v. 1. .8. II. Six cities out of those were to be for cities of refuge, for any man that killed another unawares, v. 9. .15. In the law concerning these, observe, 1. In what cases sanctuary was not allowed, not in case of wilful murder, v. 16. .21. 2. In what cases it was allowed, v. 22. .24. 3. What was the law concerning those that took shelter in these cities of refuge, v. 25. .34.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying, 2. Command the children of Israel, that they give unto the Levites of the inheritance of their possession cities to dwell in; and ye shall give also unto the Levites suburbs for the cities round about them. 3. And the cities shall they have to dwell in; and the suburbs of them shall be for their cattle, and for their goods, and for all their beasts. 4. And the suburbs of the cities, which ye shall give unto the Levites, shall reach from the wall of the city and outward a thousand cubits round about. 5. And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side two thousand cubits, and on the south side two thousand cubits, and on the west side two thousand cubits, and on the north side two thousand cubits; and the city shall be in the midst: this shall be to them the suburbs of the cities. 6. And among the cities which ye shall give unto the Levites there shall be six cities for refuge, which ye shall appoint for the manslayer, that he may flee thither: and to them ye shall add forty and two cities. 7. So all the cities which ye shall give to the Levites shall be forty and eight cities: them shall ye give with their suburbs. 8. And the cities which ye shall give shall be of the possession of the children of Israel: from them that have many ye shall give many; but from them that have few ye shall give few: every one shall give of his cities unto the Levites according to his inheritance which he inheriteth.

The laws about the tithes and offerings had provided very plentifully for the maintenance of the Levites; but it was not to be thought, nor indeed was it for the public good, that, when they came to Canaan, they should all live about the tabernacle, as they had done in the wilderness, and therefore care must be taken to provide habitations for them, in which they might live comfortably and usefully. That is it which is here taken care of.

I. Cities were allotted them, with their suburbs, v. 2. They were not to have any ground for tillage; they needed not to sow, or reap, or gather into barns, for their heavenly Father fed them with the tithe of the increase of other people's labours, that they might the more closely attend to the study of the law, and might have more leisure to teach the people; for they were not fed thus easily, that they might live in idleness, but that they might give themselves wholly to the business of their profession, and not be entangled in the affairs of this life. 1. Cities were allotted them, that they might live near together, and converse with one another about the law, to their mutual edification; and that in doubtful cases they might consult one another, and in all cases strengthen one another's hands. 2. These cities had suburbs annexed to them for their cattle, v. 3. a thousand cubits from the wall was allowed them for out-housing to keep their cattle in, and then two thousand more for fields to graze their cattle in, v. 4, 5. Thus was care taken that they should not only live, but live plentifully, and have all desirable conveniencies about them, that they might not be looked upon with contempt by their neighbours.

II. These cities are to be assigned them out of the possessions of each tribe, v. 8. 1. That each tribe might thus make a grateful acknowledgment to God out of their real as well as out of their personal estates; for what was given to the Levites was accepted as given to the Lord; and thus their possessions were sanctified to them. 2. That each tribe might have the benefit of the Levites dwelling among them, to teach them the good knowledge of the Lord; thus that light was diffused through all parts of the country, and none left to sit in darkness, Deut. 33. 10. They shall teach Jacob thy judgments. Jacob's curse on Levi's anger, was, I will scatter them in Israel, Gen. 49. 7. But that curse was turned into a blessing, and the Levites, by being thus scattered, were put into a capacity of doing so much the more good. It is a great mercy to a country to be replenished in all parts with faithful ministers. The number allotted them was forty-eight in all; four out of each of the twelve tribes, one with another. Out of the united tribes of Simeon and Judah nine, out of Naphtali three, and four apiece out of all the rest, as appears, Josh. 21. Thus were they blessed with a good ministry, and that ministry with a comfortable maintenance not only in tithes, but in glebe-lands. And though the gospel is not so particular as the law was in this matter, yet it expressly proves, that he that is taught in the word should communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things, Gal. 6. 6.

9. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 10. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come over Jordan into the land of Canaan; 11. Then ye shall appoint you cities to be cities of refuge for you; that the slayer may flee thither, which killeth any person at unawares. 12. And they shall be unto you cities for refuge from the avenger; that the manslayer die not, until he stand before the congregation in judgment. 13. And of these cities which ye shall give six cities shall ye have for refuge. 14. Ye shall give three cities on this side Jordan, and three cities shall ye give in the land of Canaan, which shall be cities of refuge. 15. These six cities shall be a refuge, both for the children of Israel, and for the stranger, and for the sojourner among them: that every one that killeth any person unawares may flee thither. 16. And if he smite him with an instrument of iron, so that he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death. 17. And if he smite him with throwing a stone, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death. 18. Or, if he smite him with an hand weapon of wood, wherewith he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death. 19. The avenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer: when he meeteth him, he shall slay him. 20. But if he thrust him of hatred, or hurl at him by laying of wait, that he die; 21. Or in enmity smite him with his hand, that he die: he that smote him shall surely be put to death; for he is a murderer: the revenger of blood shall slay the murderer when he meeteth him. 22. But if he thrust him suddenly without enmity, or have cast upon him any thing without laying of wait, 23. Or with any stone, wherewith a man may die, seeing him not, and cast it upon him, that he die, and was not his enemy, neither sought his harm: 24. Then the congregation shall judge between the slayer and the revenger of blood according to these judgments: 25. And the congregation shall deliver the slayer out of the band of the revenger of blood, and the congregation shall restore him to the city of his refuge, whither he was fled: and he shall abide in it unto the death of the high priest, which was anointed with the holy oil. 26. But if the slayer shall at any time come without the border of the city of his refuge, whither he was fled; 27. And the revenger of blood find him without the borders of the city of his refuge, and the revenger of blood kill the slayer; he shall not be guilty of blood: 28. Because he should have remained in the city of his refuge until the death of the high priest: but after the death of the high priest the slayer shall return into the land of his possession. 29. So these things shall be for a statute of judgment unto you throughout your generations in all your dwellings. 30. Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses: but one witness shall not testify against any person to cause him to die. 31. Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death: but he shall be surely put to death. 32. And ye shall take no satisfaction for him that is fled to the city of his refuge, that he should come again to dwell in the land, until the death of the priest. 33. So ye shall not pollute the land wherein ye are: for blood it defileth the land: and the land cannot be cleansed of the blood that is shed therein, but by the blood of him that shed it. 34. Defile not therefore the land which ye shall inhabit, wherein I dwell: for I the LORD dwell among the children of Israel.

We have here the orders given concerning the cities of refuge, fitly annexed to what goes before, because they were all Levites' cities. In this part of the constitution there is a great deal both of good law and pure gospel.

1. Here is a great deal of good law, in the case of murder and manslaughter, a case which the laws of all nations have taken particular cognizance of. It is here enacted and provided, consonant to natural equity,

1. That wilful murder should be punished with death, and in that case no sanctuary should be allowed, no ransom taken, nor any commutation of the punishment accepted; the murderer shall surely be put to death, v.16. It is supposed to be done of hatred, v.20 or in enmity, v.21. upon a sudden provocation, (for our Saviour makes rash anger, as well as malice prepense, to be murder, Matt.5.21,22.) whether the person be murdered with an instrument of iron, v.16. or wood, v.18. or with a stone thrown at him, v.17,20. nay, if he smite him with his hand in enmity, and death ensue, is is murder, v.21. and it was an ancient law, consonant to the law of nature, that whoso sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, Gen.9.6. Where wrong has been done, restitution must be made; and, since the murderer cannot restore the life he has wrongfully taken away, his own must be exacted from him in lieu of it, not (as some have fancied) to satisfy the manes or ghost of a person slain, but to satisfy the law and the justice of a nation, and to be a warning to all others not to do likewise. It is here said, and it is well worthy the consideration of all princes and states, that blood defiles not only the conscience of the murderer, who is thereby proved not to have eternal life abiding in him, 1 John,3.15. but also the land in which it is shed; so very offensive is it to God and all good men, and the worst of nuisances. And it is added, that the land cannot be cleansed from the blood of the murdered, but by the blood of the murderer, v.33. If murderers escape punishment from men, they that suffer them to escape will have a great deal to answer for, and God however will not suffer them to escape his righteous judgments. Upon the same principle, it is provided, that no satisfaction should be taken for the life of a murderer, v.31. If a man would give all the substance of his house to the judges, to the country, or to the avenger of blood, to atone for his crime, it must utterly be contemned. The redemption of the life is so precious, that it cannot be obtained by the multitude of riches, Ps.49.7,8. which perhaps may allude to this law. A rule of law comes in here, (which is a rule of our law, in case of treason only,) that no man shall be put to death upon the testimony of one witness, but it was necessary there should be two, v.30. this law is settled in all capital cases, Deut.17.6.—19.15. and, lastly, not only the prosecution, but the execution of the murderer, is committed to the next of kin, who, as he was to be the redeemer of his kinsman's estate if it were mortgaged, so he was to be the avenger of his blood if he were murdered, v.19. The avenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer, if he were convicted by the notorious evidence of the fact, and he needed not to have recourse by a judicial process to the court of judgment. But if it were uncertain who the murderer was, and the proof doubtful, we cannot think that his bare suspicion or surmise would empower him to do that which the judges themselves could not do, but upon the testimony of two witnesses. Only if the fact were plain, then the next heir of the person slain might himself, in a just indignation, slay the murderer, wherever he met him. Some think, this must be understood to be after the lawful judgment of the magistrate, and so the Chaldee says; "He shall slay him, when he shall be condemned unto him by judgment;" but it should seem, by v.24. that the judges interposed only in a doubtful case, and that if the person on whom he took vengeance was indeed the murderer, and a wilful murderer, the avenger was innocent, (v.27.) only if it proved otherwise, it was at his peril. Our law allows an appeal to be brought against a murderer, by the widow, or next heir, of the person murdered, yea, though the murderer have been acquitted upon an indictment; and if the murderer be found guilty upon that appeal, execution shall be awarded at the suit of the appellant, who may properly be called the avenger of blood.

2. But if the murder were not voluntary, nor done designedly, if it were without enmity or lying in wait, v.22. not seeing him, or seeking his harm, v.23. which our law calls chance-medley, or homicide per infortunium—through misfortune, in this case there were cities of refuge appointed for the manslayer to flee to. By our law this incurs a forfeiture of goods, but a pardon is granted of course upon the special matter found.

Concerning the cities of refuge the law was,

(1.) That if a man killed another, in these cities he was safe, and under the protection of the law, till he had his trial before the congregation, that is, before the judges in open court. If he neglected thus to surrender himself, it was at his peril; if the avenger of blood met him elsewhere, or overtook him loitering in his way to the city of refuge, and slew him, his blood was upon his own head, because he did not make use of the security which God had provided for him.

(2.) If, upon trial, it were found to be wilful murder, the city of refuge should no longer be a protection to him; it was already determined, Exod.21.14. Thou shalt take him from mine altar, that he may die.

(3.) But if it were found to be by error or accident, and that the stroke was given without any design upon the life of the person slain, or any other; then the manslayer should continue safe in the city of refuge, and the avenger of blood might not meddle with him, v.25. There he was to remain in banishment from his own house and patrimony, till the death of the high priest; and if at any time he went out of that city, or the suburbs of it, he put himself out of the protection of this law, and the avenger of blood, if he met him, might slay him, v.26..28. Now, [1.] By the preservation of the life of the manslayer, God would teach us, that men ought not to suffer for that which is rather their unhappiness than their crime, rather the act of Providence than their own act, for God delivered him into his hand, Exod. 21. 13. [2.] By the banishment of the manslayer from his own city, and his confinement to the city of refuge, where he was in a manner a prisoner, God would teach us to conceive a dread and horror of the guilt of blood, and to be very careful of life, and always afraid, lest, by oversight, or negligence, we occasion the death of any. [3.] By the limiting of the time of the offender's banishment to the death of the high priest, an honour was put upon that sacred office. The high priest was to be looked upon as so great a blessing to his country, that when he died, their sorrow upon that occasion should swallow up all other resentments. The cities of refuge being all of them Levites' cities, and the high priest being the head of that tribe, and consequently having a peculiar dominion over those cities, those that were confined to them might properly be looked upon as his prisoners, and so his death must be their discharge; it was, as it were, at his suit, that the delinquent was imprisoned, and therefore at his death it fell; Actio moritur cum persona—The suit expires with the party. Ainsworth has another notion of it, That, as the high priests, while they lived, by their service and sacrificing, made atonement for sin, wherein they figured Christ's satisfaction; so, at their death, those were released that had been exiled for casual murder, which typified redemption in Israel. [4.] By the abandoning of the prisoner to the avenger of blood, in case he at any time went out of the limits of the city of refuge, they were taught to adhere to the methods which Infinite Wisdom prescribed for their security. It was for the honour of a remedial law, that it should be so strictly observed. How can we expect to be saved, if we neglect the salvation, which is indeed a great salvation?

II. Here is a great deal of good gospel couched under the type and figure of the cities of refuge; and to them the apostle seems to allude, when he speaks of our flying for refuge to the hope set before us, Heb. 6. 18. and being found in Christ, Phil. 3. 9. We never read in the history of the Old Testament, of any use made of those cities of refuge, any more than of other such institutions, which yet, no doubt, were made use of upon the occasions intended; only we read of those that, in dangerous cases, took hold of the horns of the altar, (1 Kings, 1. 50.—2. 28.) for the altar, wherever that stood, was, as it were, the capital city of refuge. But the law concerning these cities was designed both to raise and to encourage the expectations of those who looked for redemption in Israel, which should be to those who were convinced of sin, and in terror by reason of it, as the cities of refuge were to the manslayer. Observe, 1. There were several cities of refuge, and they were so appointed in several parts of the country, that the manslayer, wherever he dwelt in the land of Israel, might in half a day reach one or other of them; so, though there is but one Christ appointed for our Refuge, yet, wherever we are, he is a Refuge at hand, a very present Help, for the word is nigh us, and Christ in the word. 2. The manslayer was safe in any of these cities; so, in Christ, believers that fly to him, and rest in him, are protected from the wrath of God, and the curse of the law. There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus, Rom. 8. 1. Who shall condemn those that are thus sheltered? 3. They were all Levites' cities; it was a kindness to the poor prisoner, that though he might not go up to the place where the ark was, yet he was in the midst of Levites, who would teach him the good knowledge of the Lord, and instruct him how to improve the providence he was now under. It might also be expected that the Levites would comfort and encourage him, and bid him welcome; so it is the work of gospel ministers to bid poor sinners welcome to Christ, and to assist and counsel those that through grace are in him. 4. Even strangers and sojourners, though they were not native Israelites, might take the benefit of these cities of refuge, v. 15. So in Christ Jesus no difference is made between Greek and Jew, even the sons of the stranger, that by faith fly to Christ, shall be safe in him. 5. Even the suburbs or borders of the city were a sufficient security to the offender, v. 26, 27. So there is virtue, even in the hem of Christ's garment, for the healing and saving of poor sinners. If we cannot reach to a full assurance, we may comfort ourselves in a good hope through grace. 6. The protection which the manslayer found in the city of refuge, was not owing to the strength of its walls, or gates or bars, but purely to the divine appointment; so it is the word of the gospel that gives souls safety in Christ; for him hath God the Father sealed. 7. If the offender was ever caught straggling out of the borders of his city of refuge, or stealing home to his own house again, he lost the benefit of his protection, and lay exposed to the avenger of blood; so those that are in Christ must abide in Christ, for it is at their peril if they forsake him, and wander from him. Drawing back is to perdition.

CHAP. XXXVI.

We have, in this chapter, the determination of another question that arose upon the case of the daughters of Zelophehad. God had appointed that they should inherit, ch. 27. 7. Now here, I. An inconvenience is suggested, in case they should marry into any other tribe, v. 1. .4. II. It is prevented by a divine appointment, that they should marry in their own tribe and family. (v. 5. .7.) and this is settled for a rule in like cases, (v. 8, 9.) and they did marry accordingly to some of their own relations, (v. 10. .12.) and with this the book concludes, v. 13.

1. AND the chief fathers of the families of the children of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, of the families of the sons of Joseph, came near, and spake before Moses, and before the princes, the chief fathers of the children of Israel: 2. And they said, The LORD commanded my lord to give the land for an inheritance by lot to the children of Israel: and my lord was commanded by the LORD to give the inheritance of Zelophehad our brother unto his daughters. 3. And if they be married to any of the sons of the other tribes of the children of Israel, then shall their inheritance be taken from the inheritance of our fathers, and shall be put to the inheritance of the tribe wherunto they are received; so shall it be taken from the lot of our inheritance. 4. And when the jubile of the children of Israel shall be, then shall their inheritance be put unto the inheritance of the tribe wherunto they are received: so shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of the tribe of our fathers.

We have here the humble address, which the heads of the tribe of Manasseh made to Moses and the princes, on occasion of the order lately made concerning the daughters of Zelophehad. The family they belonged to was part of that half of the tribe of Manasseh which was yet to have their lot within Jordan, not that half that was already settled; and yet they speak of the land of their possession, and the inheritance of their fathers, with as great assurance as if they had it already in their hands, knowing whom they had trusted. In their appeal observe,

1. They fairly recite the former order made in this case, and do not move to have that set aside, but are very willing to acquiesce in it, v. 2. The Lord commanded to give the inheritance of Zelophehad to his daughters: and they are very well pleased that it should be so, none of them knowing but that hereafter it might be the case of their own families, and then their daughters would have the benefit of this law.

2. They represent the inconvenience which might, possibly, follow hereupon, if the daughters of Zelophehad should see cause to marry into any other tribes, v. 3. And it is probable that this was not a bare surmise, or supposition, but that they knew, at this time, great court was made to them by some young gentlemen of other tribes, because they were heiresses, that they might get footing in this tribe, and so enlarge their own inheritance. This truly is often aimed at more than it should be in making marriages; not the wealth of the person, but the convenience of the estate, to lay house to house, and field to field. Wisdom indeed is good with an inheritance; but what is an inheritance good for in that relation without wisdom? But here, we may presume, the personal merit of these daughters recommended them as well as their fortunes; however, the heads of their tribe foresaw the mischief that would follow, and brought the case to Moses, that he might consult the oracle of God concerning it. The difficulty they start, God could have obviated and provided against, in the former order given in this case; but, to teach us that we must, in our affairs, not only attend God's providence, but make use of our own prudence, God did not direct in it, till they themselves, that were concerned, wisely foresaw the inconvenience, and piously addressed Moses for a rule in it. For though they were chief fathers in their families, and might have assumed a power to overrule these daughters of Zelophehad, in disposing of themselves, especially their father being dead, and the common interest of their tribe being concerned in it, yet they chose rather to refer themselves to Moses, and it issued well. We should not covet to be judges in our own case, for it is hard to be so, without being partial. It is easier in many cases to take good advice than to give it, and it is a satisfaction to be under direction.

Two things they aimed at in their representation:

1. To preserve the divine appointment of inheritances. They urge the command, v. 2. that the land should be given by lot to the respective tribes, and urge that it would break in upon the divine appointment, if such a considerable part of the lot of Manasseh should, by their marriage, be transferred to any other tribe; for the issue would be denominated from the father's tribe, not the mother's. This indeed would not lessen the lot of the particular persons of that tribe, (they would have their own still,) but it would lessen the lot of the tribe in general, and render it less strong and considerable; they therefore thought themselves concerned for the reputation of their tribe; and perhaps were the more jealous for it, because it was already very much weakened by the sitting down of the one half of it on this side Jordan.

2. To prevent contests and quarrels among posterity. If those of other tribes should come among them, perhaps it might occasion some contests: they would be apt to give and receive disturbance, and their title might, in process of time, come to be questioned; and how great a matter would this fire kindle! It is the wisdom and duty of those that have estates in the world, to settle them, and dispose of them, so that no strife and contention may arise about them among posterity.

5. And Moses commanded the children of Israel according to the word of the LORD, saying, The tribe of the sons of Joseph hath said well. 6. This is the thing which the LORD doth command concerning the daughters of Zelophehad, saying, Let them marry to whom they think best; only to the family of the tribe of their father shall they marry. 7. So shall not the inheritance of the children of Israel remove from tribe to tribe: for every one of the children of Israel shall keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers. 8. And every daughter, that possesseth an inheritance in any tribe of the children of Israel, shall be wife unto one of the family of the tribe of her father, that the children of Israel may enjoy every man the inheritance of his fathers. 9. Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe: but every one of the tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance. 10. Even as the LORD commanded Moses, so did the daughters of Zelophehad: 11. For Mahlah, Tirzah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Noah, the daughters of Zelophehad, were married unto their father's brothers' sons: 12. And they were married into the families of the sons of Manasseh the son of Joseph, and their inheritance remained in the tribe of the family of their father. 13. These are the commandments and the judgments, which the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses unto the children of Israel in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho.

Here is,

1. The matter settled, by express order from God, between the daughters of Zelophehad and the rest of the tribe of Manasseh. The petition is assented to, and care taken to prevent the inconvenience feared, v. 5. The tribe of the sons of Joseph hath said well. Thus those that consult the oracles of God, concerning the making of their heavenly inheritance sure, shall not only be directed what to do, but their inquiries shall be graciously accepted, and they shall have not only their well-done, but their well-said, good and faithful servant. Now the matter is thus accommodated; these heiresses must be obliged to marry, not only within their own tribe of Manasseh, but within the particular family of the Heberites, to which they did belong. (1.) They are not determined to any particular persons, there was choice enough in the family of their father, Let them marry to whom they think best. As children must preserve the authority of their parents, and not marry against their mind; so parents must consult the affections of their children in disposing of them, and not compel them to marry such as they cannot love. Forced marriages are not likely to prove blessings. (2.) Yet they are confined to their own relations, that their inheritance might not go to another family. God would have them know, that the land being to be divided by lot, the disposal whereof was of the Lord, they could not mend, and therefore should not alter, his appointment. The inheritance must not remove from tribe to tribe, v. 7. lest there should be confusion among them, their estates entangled, and their genealogies perplexed. God would not have one tribe to be enriched by the straitening and impoverishing of another, since they were all alike the seed of Abraham his friend.

2. The law, in this particular case, was made perpetual, and to be observed whenever hereafter the like case should happen, v. 8. Those that were not heiresses might marry into what tribe they pleased, (though we may suppose that, ordinarily, they kept within their own tribe,) but those that were must either quit their claim to the inheritance, or marry one of their own family, that each of the tribes might keep themselves to their own inheritance, and one tribe might not encroach upon another, but throughout their generations there might remain immovable the ancient landmarks, set, not by their fathers, but by the God of their fathers.

3. The submission of the daughters of Zelophehad to this appointment. How could they but marry well, and to their satisfaction, when God himself directed them? They married their father's brothers' sons, v. 10. 12. By this it appears, (1.) That the marriage of cousin-germans is not in itself unlawful, nor within the degrees prohibited, for then God would not have countenanced these marriages. But, (2.) That ordinarily it is not advisable; for if there had not been a particular reason for it, (which cannot hold in any case now, inheritances being not disposed of, as then, by the special designation of Heaven,) they would not have married such near relations. The world is wide, and he that walks uprightly, will endeavour to walk surely.

Lastly, The conclusion of this whole book, referring to the latter part of it; These are the judgments which the Lord commanded in the plains of Moab, v. 13. these foregoing, ever since ch. 26. most of which related to their settlement in Canaan, into which they were now entering. Whatever new condition God is by his providence bringing us into, we must beg of him to teach us the duty of it, and to enable us to do it, that we may do the work of the day in its day, of the place in its place.

E X P O S I T I O N,

WITH

Practical Observations,

UPON THE FIFTH BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

D E U T E R O N O M Y.

This book is a repetition of very much both of the history and of the laws contained in the three foregoing books; which repetition Moses delivered to Israel, (both by word of mouth, that it might affect, and by writing, that it might abide,) a little before his death. There is no new history in it but that of the death of Moses, in the last chapter, nor any new revelation to Moses, for aught that appears, and therefore the style here is not, as before, The Lord spake unto Moses, saying: But the former laws are repeated and commented upon, explained and enlarged, and some particular precepts added to them, with copious reasonings for the enforcing of them. In this, Moses was divinely inspired and assisted, so that this is as truly the word of the Lord by Moses, as that which was spoken to him with an audible voice out of the tabernacle of the congregation, Levit. 1. 1. The Greek Interpreters called it Deuteronomy, which signifies, the second law; or, a second edition of the law, not with amendments, for there needed none, but with additions, for the further direction of the people in divers cases not mentioned before. Now,

- I. It was much for the honour of the divine law, that it should be thus repeated; how great were the things of that law which was thus inculcated, and how inexcusable would they be by whom they were counted as a strange thing, Hos. 8. 12.
- II. There might be a particular reason for the repeating of it now; the men of that generation to which the law was first given were all dead, and a new generation was sprung up, to whom God would have it repeated by Moses himself, that, if possible, it might make a lasting impression upon them. Now that they were just going to take possession of the land of Canaan, Moses must read the articles of agreement to them, that they might know upon what terms and conditions they were to hold and enjoy that land, and might understand that they were upon their good behaviour in it.
- III. It would be of great use to the people to have those parts of the law thus gathered up and put together, which did more immediately concern them, and their practice; for the laws which concerned the priests and Levites, and the execution of their offices, are not repeated; it was enough for them that they were once delivered; but, in compassion to the infirmities of the people, the laws of more common concern are delivered a second time. Precept must be upon precept, and line upon line, Isa. 28. 10. The great and needful truths of the gospel should be often pressed upon people by the ministers of Christ. To write the same things (says Paul, Philip. 3. 1.) to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe. What God has spoken once we have need to hear twice, to hear many times, and it is well, if, after all, it be duly perceived and regarded. Three ways this book of Deuteronomy was magnified and made honourable. 1. The king was to write a copy of it with his own hand, and to read therein all the days of his life, ch. 17. 18, 19. 2. It was to be written upon great stones plastered, at their passing over Jordan, ch. 27. 2, 3. 3. It was to be read publicly every seventh year, at the feast of tabernacles, by the priests, in the audience of all Israel, ch. 31. 9, &c. The gospel is a kind of Deuteronomy, a second law, a remedial law, a special law, a law of faith; by it we are under the law to Christ, and it is a law that makes the comers thereunto perfect.—This book of Deuteronomy begins with a brief rehearsal of the most remarkable events that had befallen the Israelites since they came from mount Sinai; in the fourth chapter we have a most pathetic exhortation to obedience; in the twelfth chapter, and so on to the twenty-seventh, are repeated many particular laws, which are enforced, ch. 27, and 28, with promises and threatenings, blessings and curses, formed into a covenant, ch. 29, and 30. Care is taken to perpetuate the remembrance of these things among them, ch. 31. particularly by a song, ch. 32. and so Moses concludes with a blessing, ch. 33.—All this was delivered by Moses to Israel in the last month of his life. The whole book contains the history but of two months; compare ch. 1. 3. with Josh. 4. 19. the latter of which was the thirty days of Israel's mourning for Moses; see how busy that great and good man was to do good, when he knew that his time was short; how quick his motion, when he drew near his rest. Thus we have more recorded of what our blessed Saviour said and did in the last week of his life, than in any other. The last words of eminent persons make, or should make, deep impressions.—Observe, for the honour of this book, that when our Saviour would answer the devil's temptations with, It is written, he fetched each of his quotations out of this book, Matth. 4. 4, 7, 10.

Israel's History repeated.

CHAP. I.

The first part of Moses's farewell sermon to Israel begins with this chapter, and is continued to the latter end of the fourth chapter. In the five first verses of this chapter we have the date of the sermon, the place where it was preached, (v. 1, 2, 5.) and the time when, v. 3, 4. The narrative in this chapter reminds them, I. Of the promise God made them of the land of Canaan, v. 6, 8. II. Of the provision made of judges for them, v. 9, 18. III. Of their unbelief and murmuring upon the report of the spies, v. 19, 33. IV. Of the sentence passed upon them for it, and the ratification of that sentence, v. 34, 46.

I. THESE be the words which Moses spake unto all Israel on this side Jordan in the wilderness, in the plain over against the Red sea, between Paran, and Tophel, and Laban, and Hazeroth, and Dizahab. 2. (There are eleven days' journey from Horeb by the way of mount Seir unto Kadesh-barnea.) 3. And it came to pass in the fortieth year, in the eleventh month, on the first day of the month, that Moses spake unto the children of Israel, according unto all that the LORD had given him in commandment unto them; 4. After he had slain Sihon the king of the Amorites, which dwelt in Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, which dwelt at Astaroth in Edrei: 5. On this side Jordan, in the land of Moab, began Moses to declare this law, saying, 6. The LORD our God spake unto us in Horeb, saying, Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount: 7. Turn you, and take your journey, and go to the mount of the Amorites, and unto all the places nigh thereunto, in the plain, in the hills, and in the vale, and in the south, and by the sea-side, to the land of the Canaanites, and unto Lebanon, unto the great river, the river Euphrates. 8. Behold, I have set the land before you: go in and possess the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give unto them and to their seed after them.

We have here,

I. The date of this sermon which Moses preached to the people of Israel. A great auditory, no question, he had, as many as could crowd within hearing, and particularly all the elders and officers, the representatives of the people; and, probably, it was on the sabbath-day that he delivered this to them. 1. The place, where they were now encamped, was in the plain, in the land of Moab, (v. 1, 5.) where they were just ready to enter Canaan, and engage in a war with the Canaanites; yet he discourses not to them concerning military affairs, the arts and stratagems of war, but concerning their duty to God; for if they kept themselves in his fear and favour, he would secure to them the conquest of the land; their religion would be their best policy. 2. The time was near the end of the fortieth year since they came out of Egypt. So long God had borne their manners, and they had borne their own iniquity, (Numb. 14. 34.) and now that a new and more pleasant scene was to be introduced, as a token for good, Moses repeats the law to them. Thus, after God's controversy with them on account of the golden calf, the first and surest sign of God's being reconciled to them, was, the renewing of the tables. There is no better evidence and earnest of God's favour than his putting his law in our hearts, Ps. 147. 19, 20.

II. The discourse itself. In general, Moses spake unto them all that the Lord had given him in commandment, v. 3. Which intimates, not only that what he now delivered was for substance the same with what had formerly been commanded, but that it was what God now commanded him to repeat. He gave them this rehearsal and exhortation purely by divine direction; God appointed him to leave this legacy to the church.

He begins his narrative with their removal from mount Sinai, v. 6. and relates here, 1. The orders which God gave them to decamp, and proceed in their march, v. 6, 7. Ye have dwelt long enough in this mount, that was the mount that burned with fire, Heb. 12. 18. and gendered to bondage, Gal. 4. 24. Thither God brought them to humble them, and by the terrors of the law to prepare them for the land of promise. There he kept them about a year, and then told them they had dwelt long enough there, they must go forward. Though God brings his people into trouble and affliction, into spiritual trouble and affliction of mind, he knows when they have dwelt long enough in it, and will certainly find a time, the fittest time, to advance them from the terrors of the spirit of bondage to the comforts of the spirit of adoption. See Rom. 8. 15. 2. The prospect which he gave them of a happy and early settlement in Canaan. Go to the land of the Canaanites, v. 7. enter and take possession, it is all your own. Behold, I have set the land before you, v. 8. When God commands us to go forward in our Christian course, he sets the heavenly Canaan before us for our encouragement.

9. And I spake unto you at that time, saying, I am not able to bear you myself alone: 10. The LORD your God hath multiplied you, and, behold, ye are this day as the stars of heaven for multitude. 11. (The LORD God of your fathers make you a thousand times as many more as ye are, and bless you, as he hath promised you!) 12. How can I myself alone bear your cumbrance, and your burden, and your strife? 13. Take you wise men, and understanding, and known among your tribes, and I will make them rulers over you. 14. And ye answered me, and said, The thing which thou hast spoken, is good for us to do. 15. So I took the chief of your tribes, wise men, and known, and made them heads over you, captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, and captains over fifties, and captains over tens, and officers among your tribes. 16. And I charged your judges at that time, saying, Hear the causes between your brethren, and judge righteously between every man and his brother, and the stranger that is with him. 17. Ye shall not respect persons in judgment; but ye shall hear the small as well as the great; ye shall not be afraid of the face of man for the judgment is God's: and the cause that is too hard for you, bring it unto me, and I will hear it. 18. And I commanded you at that time all the things which ye should do.

Moses here reminds them of the happy constitution of their government, which was such as might make them all safe and easy, if it was not their own fault. When good laws were given them, good men were intrusted with the execution of them; which as it was an instance of God's goodness to them, so it was of the care of Moses concerning them; and, it should seem, he mentions it here, to recommend himself to them as a man that sincerely sought their welfare, and so to make way for what he was about to say to them, wherein he aimed at nothing but their good.

In this part of his narrative he insinuates to them,

1. That he greatly rejoiced in the increase of their numbers. He owns the accomplishment of God's promise to Abraham, (v. 10.) Ye are as the stars of heaven for multitude; and prays for the further accomplishment of it, (v. 11.) God make you a thousand times more. This prayer comes in, in a parenthesis, and a good prayer prudently put in cannot be impertinent, in any discourse of divine things; nor will a pious ejaculation break the coherence, but rather strengthen and adorn it. But how greatly are his desires enlarged, when he prays that they might be made a thousand times more than they were! We are not straitened in the power and goodness of God, why should we be straitened in our own faith and hope, which ought to be as large as the promise? larger it needs not be. It is from the promise that Moses here takes the measures of his prayer, The Lord bless you as he hath promised you. And why might he not hope that they might become a thousand times more than they were now, when they were now ten thousand times more than they were when they went down into Egypt, about 250 years ago? Observe, When they were under the government of Pharaoh, the increase of their numbers was envied, and complained of as a grievance; (Exod. 1. 9.) but now, under the government of Moses, it was rejoiced in, and prayed for, as a blessing; the comparing of which might give them occasion to reflect with shame upon their own folly, when they had talked of making a captain, and returning to Egypt.

2. That he was not ambitious of monopolizing the honour of the government, and ruling them himself alone, as an absolute monarch, v. 9. Though he was a man as well worthy of that honour, and as well qualified for the business, as ever any man was, yet he was desirous that others might be taken in as assistants to him in the business, and consequently sharers with him in the honour. I cannot myself alone bear the burden, v. 12. Magistracy is a burden. Moses himself, though eminently gifted for it, found it lay heavy upon his shoulders; nay, the best magistrates complain most of the burden, and are most desirous of help, and most afraid of undertaking more than they can perform.

3. That he was not desirous to prefer his own creatures, or such as underhand should have a dependence upon him; for he leaves it to the people to choose their own judges, to whom he would grant commissions, not durante bene placeto—to be turned out when he pleased; but quam diu se bene gesserint—to continue so long as they approved themselves faithful, v. 13. Take you wise men, that are known to be so among your tribes, and I will make them rulers. Thus the apostle directed the multitude to choose overseers of the poor, and then they ordained them, Acts 6. 3, 6. He directs them to take wise men and understanding, whose personal merit would recommend them; the rise and original of this nation were so late, that none of them could pretend to antiquity of race, and nobility of birth, above their brethren; and they having all lately come out of slavery in Egypt, it is probable that one family was not much richer than another; so that their choice must be directed purely by the qualifications of wisdom, experience, and integrity. "Choose those," says Moses, "whose praise is in your tribes, and, with all my heart, I will make them rulers." We must not grudge that God's work be done by other hands than our's, provided it be done by good hands.

4. That he was in this matter very willing to please the people; and though he did not in any thing aim at their applause, yet in a thing of this nature he would not act without their approbation. And they agreed to the proposal, (v. 14.) The thing which thou hast spoken, is good. This he mentions, to aggravate the sin of their mutinies and discontents after this, that the government they quarrelled with, as what they themselves had consented to; Moses would have pleased them, if they would have been pleased.

5. That he aimed to edify them, as well as to gratify them; for, (1.) He appointed men of good characters, (v. 15.) wise men and men known, men that would be faithful to their trust, and to the public interest. (2.) He gave them a good charge, v. 16, 17. Those that are advanced to honour, must know that they are charged with business, and must give account another day of their charge. [1.] He charges them to be diligent and patient; Hear the causes. Hear both sides, hear them fully, hear them carefully, for nature has provided us with two ears, and he that answereth a matter before he heareth it, it is folly and shame to him. The ear of the learner is necessary to the tongue of the learned, Isa. 50. 4. [2.] To be just and impartial; Judge righteously. Judgment must be given according to the merits of the cause, without regard to the quality of the parties. The natives must not be suffered to abuse the strangers, any more than the strangers to insult the natives, or to encroach upon them: the great must not be suffered to oppress the small, or to crush them, any more than the small to rob the great, or to affront them. No faces must be known in judgment, but unbribed, unbiassed equity must always pass sentence. [3.] To be resolute and courageous; Ye shall not be afraid of the face of men. Be not overawed to do an ill thing, either by the clamours of the crowd, or by the menaces of those that have power in their hands." And he gave them a good reason to enforce this charge, "For the judgment is God's. You are God's vicegerents, you act for him, and therefore must act like him; you are his representatives, but if you judge unrighteously, you misrepresent him. The judgment is his, and therefore he will protect you in doing right; and will certainly call you to account if you do wrong." And, (Lastly,) He allowed them to bring all difficult cases to him, and he would always be ready to hear and determine, and to make both the judges and the people easy. Happy art thou, O Israel, in such a prince as Moses was.

19. And when we departed from Horeb, we went through all that great and terrible wilderness, which ye saw by the way of the mountain of the

Amorites, as the LORD our God commanded us; and we came to Kadesh-barnea. 20. And I said unto you, Ye are come unto the mountain of the Amorites, which the LORD our God doth give unto us. 21. Behold, the LORD thy God hath set the land before thee: go up and possess it, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath said unto thee; fear not, neither be discouraged. 22. And ye came near unto me every one of you, and said, We will send men before us, and they shall search us out the land, and bring us word again by what way we must go up, and into what cities we shall come. 23. And the saying pleased me well: and I took twelve men of you, one of a tribe: 24. And they turned and went up into the mountain, and came unto the valley of Eshcol, and searched it out. 25. And they took of the fruit of the land in their hands, and brought it down unto us, and brought us word again, and said, It is a good land which the LORD our God doth give us. 26. Notwithstanding ye would not go up, but rebelled against the commandment of the LORD your God: 27. And ye murmured in your tents, and said, Because the LORD hated us, he hath brought us forth out of the land of Egypt, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us. 28. Whither shall we go up? our brethren have discouraged our heart, saying, The people is greater and taller than we; the cities are great and walled up to heaven; and moreover we have seen the sons of the Anakims there. 29. Then I said unto you, Dread not, neither be afraid of them. 30. The LORD your God which goeth before you, he shall fight for you, according to all that he did for you in Egypt before your eyes; 31. And in the wilderness, where thou hast seen how that the LORD thy God bare thee, as a man doth bear his son, in all the way that ye went, until ye came into this place. 32. Yet in this thing ye did not believe the LORD your God, 33. Who went in the way before you, to search you out a place to pitch your tents in, in fire by night, to shew you by what way ye should go, and in a cloud by day. 34. And the LORD heard the voice of your words, and was wroth, and sware, saying, 35. Surely there shall not one of these men of this evil generation see that good land, which I sware to give unto your fathers, 36. Save Caleb the son of Jephunneh; he shall see it, and to him will I give the land that he hath trodden upon, and to his children, because he hath wholly followed the LORD. 37. Also the LORD was angry with me for your sakes, saying, Thou also shalt not go in thither. 38. But Joshua the son of Nun, which standeth before thee, he shall go in thither; encourage him: for he shall cause Israel to inherit it. 39. Moreover your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, and your children, which in that day had no knowledge between good and evil, they shall go in thither, and unto them will I give it, and they shall possess it. 40. But as for you, turn you, and take your journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea. 41. Then ye answered and said unto me, We have sinned against the LORD, we will go up and fight, according to all that the LORD our God commanded us. And when ye had girded on every man his weapons of war, ye were ready to go up into the hill. 42. And the LORD said unto me, Say unto them, Go not up, neither fight; for I am not among you; lest ye be smitten before your enemies. 43. So I spake unto you; and ye would not hear, but rebelled against the commandment of the LORD, and went presumptuously up into the hill. 44. And the Amorites, which dwelt in that mountain, came out against you, and chased you, as bees do, and destroyed you in Seir, even unto Hormah. 45. And ye returned and wept before the LORD; but the LORD would not hearken to your voice, nor give ear unto you. 46. So ye abode in Kadesh many days, according unto the days that ye abode there.

Moses here makes a large rehearsal of that fatal turn which was given them by their own sins, and God's wrath, when, from the very borders of Canaan, the honour of conquering it, and the pleasure of possessing it, the whole generation was hurried back into the wilderness, and their carcasses fell there. It was a memorable story; we read it in Numb. 13, and 14. but divers circumstances are found here, which are not related there.

I. He reminds them of their march from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea, (v. 19.) through that great and terrible wilderness. This he takes notice of, 1. To make them sensible of the great goodness of God to them, in guiding them through so great a wilderness, and protecting them from the mischiefs they were surrounded with in such a terrible wilderness. The remembrance of our dangers should make us thankful for our deliverances. 2. To aggravate the folly of those who, in their discontent, would have gone back to Egypt through the wilderness, though they had forfeited, and had no reason to expect, the divine conduct, in such a retrograde motion.

II. He shews them how fair they stood for Canaan at that time, v. 20, 21. He told them with triumph, The land is set before you; go up, and possess it. He lets them see how near they were to a happy settlement, when they put a bar in their own door, that their sin might appear the more exceeding sinful. It will aggravate the eternal ruin of hypocrites, that they were not far from the kingdom of God, and yet came short, Mark, 12. 34.

III. He lays the blame of sending the spies upon them, which did not appear in Numbers; there, it is said, ch. 13. 1, 2. that the Lord directed the sending of them, but here we find that the people first desired it, and God, in permitting it, gave them up to their own counsels, v. 22. Ye said, We will send men before us. Moses had given them God's word, v. 20, 21. But they could not find in their hearts to rely upon that; human policy goes further with them than divine wisdom, and they will needs light a candle to the sun. As if it were not enough that they were sure of a God before them, they must send men before them.

IV. He repeats the report which the spies brought of the goodness of the land, which they were sent to survey, v. 24, 25. The blessings which God has promised are truly valuable and desirable, even the unbelievers themselves being judges: never any looked into the Holy Land, but they must own it a good land. Yet they represented the difficulties of conquering it as insuperable, v. 28. as if it were in vain to think of attacking them either by battle, for the people are taller than we, or by siege, for the cities are walled up to heaven; an hyperbole which they made use of to serve their ill purpose, which was to dishearten the people, and perhaps they intended to reflect on the God of heaven himself, as if they were able to defy him, like the Babel-builders, the top of whose tower must reach to heaven, Gen. 11. 4. Those places only are walled up to heaven that are compassed with God's favour as with a shield.

V. He tells them what pains he took with them to encourage them, when their brethren had said so much to discourage them, v. 29. Then I said unto you, Dread not. Moses suggested enough to have stilled the tumult, and to have kept them with their faces toward Canaan. He assured them that God was present with them, and President among them, and would certainly fight for them, v. 30. As for proof of his power over their enemies, he refers them to what they had seen in Egypt, where their enemies had all possible advantages against them, and yet were humbled and forced to yield, v. 30. And, for proof of God's good-will to them, and the real kindness which he intended them, he refers them to what they had seen in the wilderness, v. 31, 33. through which they had been guided by the eye of Divine Wisdom, in a pillar of cloud and fire, which guided both their motions and their rests; and had been carried in the arms of divine grace, with as much care and tenderness as ever any child was borne in the arms of a nursing father. And was there any room left to distrust this God? Or, were they not the most ungrateful people in the world, who, after such sensible proofs of the divine goodness, hardened their hearts in the day of temptation? Moses had complained once that God had charged him to carry this people as a nursing father doth the sucking child, Numb. 11. 12. But here he owns that it was God that so carried them, and perhaps this is alluded to, Acts. 13. 18. where he is said to bear them, or to suffer their manners.

VI. He charges them with the sin which they were guilty of upon this occasion. Though those whom he was now speaking to were a new generation, yet he lays it upon them, Ye rebelled, and ye murmured; for many of these were then in being, though under twenty years old, and perhaps were engaged in the riot; and the rest inherited their fathers' vices, and smarted for them. Observe what he lays to their charge. 1. Disobedience, and rebellion against God's law. Ye would not go up, but rebelled, v. 26. The rejecting of God's favours is really a rebelling against his authority. 2. Invidious reflections upon God's goodness. They basely suggested, v. 27. Because the Lord hated us, he brought us out of Egypt. What could have been more absurd, more disingenuous, and more reproachful to God? 3. An unbelieving heart at the bottom of all this, v. 32. Ye did not believe the Lord your God. All your disobedience to God's laws, and distrust of his power and goodness, flow from a disbelief of his word. A sad pass it is come to with us, when the God of eternal truth cannot be believed.

VII. He repeats the sentence passed upon them for this sin, which now they had seen the execution of. 1. They were all condemned to die in the wilderness, and none of them must be suffered to enter Canaan, except Caleb and Joshua, v. 34. 36. So long they must continue their wanderings in the wilderness, that most of them would drop off of course, and the youngest of them should be cut off. Thus they could not enter in because of unbelief. It was not the breach of any of the commands of the law that shut them out of Canaan, no, not the golden calf, but their disbelief of that promise which was typical of gospel-grace, to signify that no sin will ruin us but unbelief, which is a sin against the remedy. 2. Moses himself afterwards fell under God's displeasure, for a hasty word which they provoked him to speak, v. 37. The Lord was angry with me for your sakes. Because all the old stock must go off, Moses himself must not stay behind. Their unbelief let death into the camp, and, having entered, even Moses falls within his commission. 3. Yet here is mercy mixed with wrath. (1.) That though Moses might not bring them into Canaan, Joshua should, v. 38. Encourage him; for he would be discouraged from taking up a government which he saw Moses himself fall under the weight of; but let him be assured that he shall accomplish that for which he is raised up, He shall cause Israel to inherit it. Thus, what the law could not do in that it was weak, Jesus, our Joshua, does, by bringing in the better hope. (2.) That though this generation should not enter into Canaan, the next should, v. 39. As they had been chosen for their father's sakes, so their children might justly have been rejected for their sakes. But mercy rejoiceth against judgment.

VIII. He reminds them of their foolish and fruitless attempt to get this sentence reversed, when it was too late. 1. They tried it by their reformation in this particular; whereas they had refused to go up against the Canaanites, now they would go up, in all haste, and they girded on their weapons of war for that purpose, v. 41. Thus, when the door is shut, and the day of grace over, there will be found those that stand without and knock. But this, which looked like a reformation, proved but a further rebellion; God, by Moses, prohibited the attempt, v. 42. Yet they went presumptuously up to the hill, v. 43. acting now in contempt of the threatening, as before in contempt of the promise, as if they were governed by a spirit of contradiction; and it sped accordingly, v. 44. they were chased and destroyed, and by this defeat which they suffered, when they had provoked God to leave them, they were taught what success they might have had if they had kept themselves in his love. 2. They tried by their prayers and tears to get the sentence reversed, v. 45. They returned and wept before the Lord. While they were fretting and quarrelling, it is said, Numb. 14. 1. they wept that night; those were tears of rebellion against God, these were tears of repentance and humiliation before God. Note, Tears of discontent must be wept over again; the sorrow of the world worketh death, and is to be repented of; it is not so with godly sorrow, that will end in joy. But their weeping was all to no purpose, The Lord would not hearken to your voice, because ye would not hearken to his; the decree was gone forth, and, like Esau, they found no place of repentance, though they sought it carefully with tears.

CHAP. II.

Moses, in this chapter, proceeds in the rehearsal of God's providences concerning Israel in their way to Canaan, yet preserves not the record of any thing that happened during their tedious march back to the Red sea, in which they were almost 38 years, but passes that over in silence, as a dark time; and makes his narrative to begin again when they faced about toward Canaan, v. 1. .3. and drew toward the countries that were inhabited, concerning which God here gives them direction. I. What nations they must not give any disturbance to, 1. Not to the Edomites, v. 4. .8. 2. Not to the Moabites, v. 9. of the antiquities of whose country, with that of the Edomites, he gives some account, v. 10. .12. And here comes in an account of their passing the river Zered, v. 13. .16. 3. Not to the Ammonites, of whose country here is some account given, v. 17. .23. II. What nations they should attack and conquer. They must begin with Sihon, king of the Amorites, v. 24, 25, 26. And, accordingly, 1. They had a fair occasion of quarrelling with him, v. 26. .32. 2. God gave them a complete victory over him v. 33. .37.

1. THEN we turned, and took our journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea, as the LORD spake unto me: and we compassed mount Seir many days. 2. And the LORD spake unto me, saying, 3. Ye have compassed this mountain long enough: turn you northward. 4. And command thou the people, saying, Ye are to pass through the coast of your brethren the children of Esau, which dwell in Seir; and they shall be afraid of you: take ye good heed unto yourselves therefore: 5. Meddle not with them; for I will not give you of their land, no, not so much as a foot breadth; because I have given mount Seir unto Esau for a possession. 6. Ye shall buy meat of them for money, that ye may eat; and ye shall also buy water of them for money, that ye may drink. 7. For the LORD thy God hath blessed thee in all the works of thy hand: he knoweth thy walking through this great wilderness: these forty years the LORD thy God hath been with thee; thou hast lacked nothing.

Here is,

I. A short account of the long stay of Israel in the wilderness; We compassed mount Seir many days, v. 1. Near thirty-eight years they wandered in the deserts of Seir; probably, in some of their rests they stayed several years, and never stirred; God, by this, not only chastised them for their murmuring and unbelief, but, 1. Prepared them for Canaan, by humbling them for sin, teaching them to mortify their lusts, to follow God, and to comfort themselves in him. It is a work of time to make souls meet for heaven, and it must be done by a long train of exercises. 2. He prepared the Canaanites for destruction, all this time the measure of their iniquity was filling up; and, though it might have been improved by them as a space to repent in, it was abused by them to the hardening of their hearts. Now that the host of Israel was once repulsed, and after that, was so long entangled, and seemingly lost in the wilderness, they were secure, and thought the danger was over from that quarter, which would make the next attempt of Israel upon them the more dreadful.

II. Orders given them to turn toward Canaan. Though God contend long, he will not contend for ever. Though Israel may be long kept waiting for deliverance and enlargement, it will come at last; The vision is for an appointed time, and at the end it shall speak, and not lie.

III. A charge given them not to annoy the Edomites: 1. They must not offer any hostility to them as enemies, v. 4, 5. Meddle not with them. (1.) They must not improve the advantage they had against them, by the fright they would be put into upon Israel's approach. They shall be afraid of you, knowing your strength and numbers, and the power of God engaged for you; but think not that because their fears make them an easy prey, you may therefore prey upon them; no, take heed to yourselves. There is need of great caution and a strict government of our own spirits, to keep ourselves from injuring those whom we have an advantage against. Or, this caution is given to the princes; they must not only not meddle with the Edomites themselves, but not permit any of the soldiers to meddle with them. (2.) They must not avenge upon the Edomites the affront they gave them in refusing them passage through their country, Numb. 20. 21. Thus, before God brought Israel to destroy their enemies in Canaan, he taught them to forgive their enemies in Edom. (3.) They must not expect to have any part of their land given them for a possession; mount Seir was already settled upon the Edomites, and they must not, under pretence of God's covenant and conduct, think to seize for themselves all they could lay hands on. Dominion is not founded in grace. God's Israel shall be well placed, but must not expect to be placed alone in the midst of the earth, Isa. 5. 8. 2. They must trade with them as neighbours: buy meat and water of them, and pay for what they bought, v. 6. religion must never be made a cloak for injustice. The reason given, v. 7. is, because God hath blessed thee, and hitherto thou hast lacked nothing; and therefore, (1.) "Thou needest not beg; scorn to be beholden to Edomites, when thou hast a God all-sufficient to depend upon. Thou hast wherewithal to pay for what thou callest for, (thanks to the divine blessing!) use, therefore, what thou hast, use it cheerfully, and do not spunge upon the Edomites." (2.) "Therefore thou must not steal. Thou hast experienced the care of the divine providence concerning thee, in confidence of which, for the future, and in a firm belief of its sufficiency, never use any indirect methods for thy supply. Live by thy faith, and not by thy sword."

8. And when we passed by from our brethren the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, through the way of the plain from Elath, and from Ezion-gaber, we turned and passed by the way of the wilderness of Moab. 9. And the LORD said unto me, Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle: for I will not give thee of their land for a possession; because I have given Ar unto the children of Lot for a possession. 10. The Emims dwelt therein in times past, a people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims; 11. Which also were accounted giants, as the Anakims; but the Moabites call them Emims. 12. The Horims also dwelt in Seir before time; but the children of Esau succeeded them, when they had destroyed them from before them, and dwelt in their stead; as Israel did unto the land of his possession, which the LORD gave unto them. 13. Now rise up, said I, and get you over the brook Zered. And we went over the brook Zered. 14. And the space in which we came from Kadesh-barnea, until we were come over the brook Zered, was thirty and eight years; until all the generation of the men of war were wasted out from among the host, as the LORD sware unto them. 15. For indeed the hand of the LORD was against them, to destroy them from among the host, until they were consumed. 16. So it came to pass, when all the men of war were consumed and dead from among the people, 17. That the LORD spake unto me, saying, 18. Thou art to pass over through Ar, the coast of Moab, this day: 19. And when thou comest nigh over against the children of Ammon, distress them not, nor meddle with them: for I will not give thee of the land of the children of Ammon any possession; because I have given it unto the children of Lot for a possession. 20. (That also was accounted a land of giants: giants dwelt therein in old time; and the Ammonites called them Zamzummins; 21. A people great, and many, and tall, as the Anakims; but the LORD destroyed them before them; and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead: 22. As he did to the children of Esau, which dwelt in Seir, when he destroyed the Horims from before them; and they succeeded them, and dwelt in their stead even unto this day: 23. And the Avims which dwelt in Hazerim, even unto Azzah, the Caphtorims, which came forth out of Caphtor, destroyed them, and dwelt in their stead.)

It is observable here, that Moses, speaking of the Edomites, v. 8. calls them our brethren, the children of Esau; though they had been unkind to Israel, in refusing them a peaceable passage through their country, yet he calls them brethren. For, though our relations fail in their duty to us, we must retain a sense of the relation, and not be wanting in our duty to them, as there is occasion.

Now, in these verses, we have,

I. The account which Moses gives of the original of the nations which he had here occasion to speak of; the Moabites, Edomites, and Ammonites. We know very well, from other parts of his history, whose posterity they were, but here he tells us how they came to those countries in which Israel found them; they were not the aborigines, or first planters. But, 1. The Moabites dwelt in a country which had belonged to a numerous race of giants, called Emims, that is, terrible ones; as tall as the Anakims, and perhaps more fierce, v. 10, 11. 2. The Edomites, in like manner, dispossessed the Horims from mount Seir, and took their country, v. 12. and again, v. 22. of which we read, Gen. 36. 20. 3. The Ammonites likewise got possession of a country that had formerly been inhabited by giants, called Zamzumims, crafty men, or wicked men, v. 20, 21. probably the same that are called Zuzims, Gen. 14. 5. He illustrates these remarks by an instance older than any of these; the Caphtorims (who were akin to the Philistines, Gen. 10. 14.) drove the Avims out of their country, and took possession of it, v. 23. The learned Bishop Patrick supposes these Avites, being expelled hence, to have settled in Assyria, and to be the same people we read of under that name, 2 Kings, 17. 31. Now, these revolutions are recorded, (1.) To shew how soon the world was peopled after the flood, so well peopled, that, when a family grew numerous, they could not find a place to settle in, at least in that part of the world, but they must drive out those that were already settled. (2.) To shew that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong. Giants were expelled by those of ordinary stature; for, probably, these giants, like those before the flood, (Gen. 6. 4.) were notorious for impiety and oppression, which brought the judgments of God upon them, against which their great strength would be no defence. (3.) To shew what uncertain things worldly possessions are, and how often they change their owners: it was so of old, and ever will be so. Families decline, and from them estates are transferred to families that increase; so little constancy or continuance is there in these things! (4.) To encourage the children of Israel, who were now going to take possession of Canaan, against the difficulties they would meet with, and to shew the unbelief of those that were afraid of the sons of Anak, to whom the giants, here said to be conquered, are compared, v. 11, 21. If the providence of God had done this for Moabites and Ammonites, much more would his promise do it for Israel, his peculiar people.

II. The advances which Israel made toward Canaan. They passed by the way of the wilderness of Moab, v. 3. and then went over the brook or vale of Zered, v. 13. and there Moses takes notice of the fulfilling of the word which God had spoken concerning them, that none of those that were numbered at mount Sinai should see the land that God had promised, Numb. 14. 23. According to that sentence, now that they began to set their faces toward Canaan, and to have it in their eye, notice is taken of their being all destroyed and consumed, and not a man of them left, v. 14. Common providence, we may observe, in about thirty-eight years, ordinarily raises a new generation, so that, in that time, few remain of the old one; but here it was entirely new, and none at all remained but Caleb and Joshua: for indeed the hand of the Lord was against them, v. 15. Those cannot but waste, until they are consumed, who have the hand of God against them. Observe, Israel is not called to engage with the Canaanites, till all the men of war, the veteran regiments, that had been used to hardship, and had learned the art of war from the Egyptians, were consumed and dead from among the people, v. 16. that the conquest of Canaan, being effected by a host of new-raised men, trained up in a wilderness, the excellency of the power but more plainly appear to be of God, and not of men.

III. The caution given them, not to meddle with the Moabites or Ammonites, whom they must not disseize, nor so much as disturb, in their possessions. Distress them not, nor contend with them, v. 9. Though the Moabites aimed to ruin Israel, Numb. 22. 6. yet Israel must not aim to ruin them. If others design us a mischief, that will not justify us in designing them a mischief. But, why must not the Moabites and Ammonites be meddled with? 1. Because they were the children of Lot, v. 9, 19. righteous Lot, who kept his integrity in Sodom. Note, Children often fare the better in this world for the piety of their ancestors; the seed of the upright, though they degenerate, yet are blessed with temporal good things. 2. Because the land they were possessed of was what God had given them, and he did not design it for Israel. Even wicked men have a right to their worldly possessions, and must not be wronged. The tares are allowed their place in the field, and must not be rooted out until the harvest. God gives and preserves outward blessings to wicked men, to shew that these are not the best things, but he has better in store for his own children.

24. Rise ye up, take your journey, and pass over the river Arnon: behold, I have given into thine hand Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land: begin to possess it, and contend with him in battle. 25. This day will I begin to put the dread of thee and the fear of thee upon the nations that are under the whole heaven, who shall hear report of thee, and shall tremble, and be in anguish because of thee. 26. And I sent messengers out of the wilderness of Kedemoth unto Sihon king of Heshbon with words of peace, saying, 27. Let me pass through thy land: I will go along by the highway, I will neither turn unto the right hand nor to the left. 28. Thou shalt sell me meat for money, that I may eat; and give me water for money, that I may drink: only I will pass through on my feet; 29. (As the children of Esau which dwell in Seir, and the Moabites which dwell in Ar, did unto me;) until I shall pass over Jordan into the land which the LORD our God giveth us. 30. But Sihon king of Heshbon would not let us pass by him: for the LORD thy God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, that he might deliver him into thy hand, as appeareth this day. 31. And the LORD said unto me, Behold, I have begun to give Sihon and his land before thee: begin to possess, that thou mayest inherit his land. 32. Then Sihon came out against us, he and all his people, to fight at Jahaz. 33. And the LORD our God delivered him before us; and we smote him, and his sons, and all his people. 34. And we took all his cities at that time, and utterly destroyed the men, and the women, and the little ones, of every city, we left none to remain: 35. Only the cattle we took for a prey unto ourselves, and the spoil of the cities which we took. 36. From Aroer, which is by the brink of the river of Arnon, and from the city that is by the river, even unto Gilead, there was not one city too strong for us: the LORD our God delivered all unto us: 37. Only unto the land of the children of Ammon thou camest not, nor unto any place of the river Jabbok, nor unto the cities in the mountains, nor unto whatsoever the LORD our God forbade us.

God having tried the self-denial of his people, in forbidding them to meddle with the Moabites and Ammonites, and they having quietly passed by those rich countries, and, though superior in number, not made any attack upon them, here he recompenses them for their obedience, by giving them possession of the country of Sihon, king of the Amorites. If we forbear what God forbids, we shall receive what he promises, and shall be no losers at last by our obedience, though it may seem, for the present, to be our loss. Wrong not others, and God shall right thee.

I. God gives them commission to seize upon the country of Sihon, king of Heshbon, v. 24, 25. This was then God's way of disposing of kingdoms, but such particular grants are not now either to be expected or pretended. In this commission, observe, 1. Though God assured them that the land should be their own, yet they must bestir themselves, and contend in battle with the enemy. What God gives, we must endeavour to get. 2. God promises, that, when they fight, he will fight for them. Do you begin to possess it, and I will begin to put the dread of you upon them. God would dispirit the enemy, and so destroy them; would magnify Israel, and so terrify all those against whom they were commissioned. See Exod. 15. 14.

II. Moses sends to Sihon a message of peace, and only begs a passage through his land, with a promise to give his country no disturbance, but the advantage of trading for ready money with so great a body, v. 26. .29. Moses herein did neither disobey God, who bid him contend with Sihon, nor dissemble with Sihon; but, doubtless, it was by divine direction that he did it, that Sihon might be left inexcusable, though God hardened his heart. This may illustrate the method of God's dealing with those to whom he gives his gospel, but does not give grace to believe it.

III. Sihon began the war, v. 32. God having made his heart obstinate, and hid from his eyes the things that belonged to his peace, v. 30. that he might deliver him into the hand of Israel. Those that meddle with the people of God, meddle to their own hurt; and God sometimes ruins his enemies by their own resolves. See Mic. 4. 11. .13. Rev. 16. 14.

IV. Israel was victorious. 1. They put all the Amorites to the sword, men, women, and children, v. 33, 34. this they did as the executioners of God's wrath; now the measure of the Amorites' iniquity was full, Gen. 15. 16. and the longer it was in the filling, the sorer was the reckoning at last. This was one of the devoted nations; they died not as Israel's enemies, but as sacrifices to divine justice, in the offering of which sacrifices Israel was employed, as a kingdom of priests. The case being, therefore, extraordinary, it ought not to be drawn into a precedent for military executions, which make no distinction, and give no quarter: they will have judgment without mercy that shew no mercy. 2. They took possession of all they had; their cities, v. 34. their goods, v. 35. and their land, v. 36. The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just. What a new world did Israel now come into! Most of them were born, and had lived all their days, in a vast howling wilderness, where they knew not what either fields or cities were, had no houses to dwell in, and neither sowed nor reaped; and now of a sudden to become masters of a country so well built, so well husbanded, this made them amends for their long waiting, and yet it was but the earnest of a great deal more. Much more joyful will the change be which holy souls will experience, when they remove out of the wilderness of this world to the better country, that is, the heavenly; to the city that has foundations.

CHAP. III.

Moses, in this chapter, relates, I. The conquest of Og, king of Bashan, and the seizing of his country, v. 1. .11. II. The distribution of these new conquests to the two tribes and a half, v. 12. .17. Under certain provisos and limitations, v. 18. .20. III. The encouragement given to Joshua to carry on the war, which was so gloriously begun, v. 21, 22. IV. Moses's request to go over into Canaan, v. 23. .25. With the denial of that request, but the grant of an equivalent, v. 26. .29.

1. THEN we turned, and went up the way to Bashan: and Og the king of Bashan came out against us, he and all his people, to battle at Edrei. 2. And the LORD said unto me, Fear him not: for I will deliver him, and all his people, and his land, into thy hand; and thou shalt do unto him as thou didst unto Sihon king of the Amorites, which dwelt at Heshbon. 3. So the LORD our God delivered into our hands Og also, the king of Bashan, and all his people: and we smote him until none was left to him remaining. 4. And we took all his cities at that time, there was not a city which we took not from them, threescore cities, all the region of Argob, the kingdom of Og in Bashan. 5. All these cities were fenced with high walls, gates, and bars; beside unwalled towns a great many. 6. And we utterly destroyed them, as we did unto Sihon king of Heshbon, utterly destroying the men, women, and children, of every city. 7. But all the cattle, and the spoil of the cities, we took for a prey to ourselves. 8. And we took at that time out of the hand of the two kings of the Amorites the land that was on this side Jordan, from the river of Arnon unto mount Hermon; 9. (Which Hermon the Sidonians call Sirion; and the Amorites call it Shenir;) 10. All the cities of the plain, and all Gilead, and all Bashan, unto Salchah and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan. 11. For only Og king of Bashan remained of the remnant of giants; behold, his bedstead was a bedstead of iron; is it not in Rabbath of the children of Ammon? nine cubits was the length thereof, and four cubits the breadth of it, after the cubit of a man.

We have here another brave country delivered into the hand of Israel, that of Bashan; the conquest of Sihon is often mentioned, together with that of Og, to the praise of God, the rather because in these Israel's triumphs began, Ps. 135. 11.—136. 19, 20.

See, 1. How they got the mastery of Og, a very formidable prince. (1.) Very strong, for he was of the remnant of the giants, v. 11. his personal strength was extraordinary, a monument of which was preserved by the Ammonites in his bedstead, which was shewed as a rarity in their chief city. You might guess at his weight by the materials of his bedstead; it was iron, as if a bedstead of wood were too weak for him to trust to: and you might guess at his stature by the dimensions of it; it was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad, which, supposing a cubit to be but half a yard, (and some learned men have made it appear to be somewhat more,) was four yards and a half long, and two yards broad; and, if we allow his bedstead to be two cubits longer than himself, and that is as much as we need allow, he was three yards and a half high, double the stature of an ordinary man, and every way proportionable, yet they smote him, v.3. Note, When God pleads his people's cause, he can deal with giants as with grasshoppers. No man's might can secure him against the Almighty. The army of Og was very powerful, for he had the command of sixty fortified cities, beside unwall'd towns, v.5. Yet all this was nothing before God's Israel, when they came with commission to destroy him. 2. He was very stout and daring; he came out against Israel to battle, v.1. It was wonderful that he did not take warning by the ruin of Sihon, and send to desire conditions of peace; but he trusted to his own strength, and so was hardened to his destruction. Note, Those that are not awakened by the judgments of God upon others, but persist in their defiance of Heaven, are ripening apace for the like judgments upon themselves, Jer.3.8. God bade Moses not fear him, v.2. If Moses himself was so strong in faith as not to need the caution, yet it is probable that the people needed it; and for them these fresh assurances are designed, "I will deliver him into thine hand; not only deliver thee out of his hand, that he shall not be thy ruin, but deliver him into thy hand, that thou shalt be his ruin, and make him pay dear for his attempt." He adds, Thou shalt do to him as thou didst to Sihon; intimating, that they ought to be encouraged, by their former victory, to trust in God for another victory; for he is God, and changeth not.

II. How they got possession of Bashan, a very desirable country. They took all the cities, v.4. and all the spoil of them, v.7. They made them all their own, v.10. so that now they had in their hands all that fruitful country which lay east of Jordan, from the river Arnon unto Hermon, v.8. Their conquering and possessing of all these countries was intended, not only for the encouragement of Israel in the wars of Canaan, but for the satisfaction of Moses before his death; because he must not live to see the completing of their victory and settlement, God thus gives him a specimen of it. Thus the Spirit is given to them that believe, as the earnest of their inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession.

12. And this land, which we possessed at that time, from Aroer, which is by the river Arnon, and half mount Gilead, and the cities thereof, gave I unto the Reubenites and to the Gadites. 13. And the rest of Gilead, and all Bashan, being the kingdom of Og, gave I unto the half tribe of Manasseh; all the region of Argob, with all Bashan, which was called the land of giants. 14. Jair the son of Manasseh took all the country of Argob unto the coasts of Geshuri and Maachathi; and called them after his own name, Bashan-havoth-jair, unto this day. 15. And I gave Gilead unto Machir. 16. And unto the Reubenites and unto the Gadites I gave from Gilead even unto the river Arnon half the valley, and the border even unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon; 17. The plain also, and Jordan, and the coast thereof, from Chimmereth even unto the sea of the plain, even the Salt sea, under Ashdoth-pisgah eastward. 18. And I commanded you at that time, saying, The LORD your God hath given you this land to possess it: ye shall pass over armed before your brethren the children of Israel, all that are meet for the war. 19. But your wives, and your little ones, and your cattle, (for I know that ye have much cattle,) shall abide in your cities which I have given you; 20. Until the LORD have given rest unto your brethren, as well as unto you, and until they also possess the land which the LORD your God hath given them beyond Jordan: and then shall ye return every man unto his possession, which I have given you.

Having shewed how this country which they were now in was conquered, in these verses he shews how it was settled upon the Reubenites, Gadites, and half-tribe of Manasseh, which we had the story of before, Numb.32. Here is the rehearsal.

1. Moses specifies the particular parts of the country that were allotted to each tribe, especially the distribution of the lot to the half-tribe of Manasseh, the subdividing of which tribe is observable. Joseph was divided into Ephraim and Manasseh; Manasseh was divided into one half on the one side Jordan, and the other half on the other side: that here on the east side Jordan was again divided into two great families, which had their several allotments, Jair, v.14. Machir, v.15. and, perhaps, Jacob's prediction of the smallness of that tribe was now accomplished in these divisions and subdivisions. Observe, that Bashan is here called the land of the giants, because it had been in their possession, but Og was the last of them. These giants, it seems, had lost their country, and were rooted out of it sooner than any of their neighbours; for they, who, presuming upon their strength and stature, had their hand against every man, had every man's hand against them, and went down slain to the pit, though they were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living.

2. He repeats the condition of the grant which they had already agreed to, v.18. 20. That they should send a strong detachment over Jordan, to lead the van in the conquest of Canaan, who should not return to their families, at least not to settle, (though, for a time, they might retire thither into winter-quarters, at the end of a campaign,) till they had seen their brethren in as full possession of their respective allotments as themselves were now in of their's. They must hereby be taught not to look at their own things only, but at the things of others, Phil.2.4. It ill becomes an Israelite to be selfish, and to prefer any private interest before the public welfare. When we are at rest, we should desire to see our brethren at rest too, and should be ready to do what we can towards it; for we are not horn for ourselves, but are members one of another. A good man cannot rejoice much in the comforts of his family, unless withal he sees peace upon Israel, Ps.128.6.

21. And I commanded Joshua at that time, saying, Thine eyes have seen all that the LORD your God hath done unto these two kings: so shall the LORD do unto all the kingdoms whither thou passest. 22. Ye shall not fear them: for the LORD your God he shall fight for you. 23. And I besought the LORD at that time, saying, 24. O LORD GOD, thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness, and thy mighty hand: for what God is there in heaven or in earth, that can do according to thy works, and according to thy might? 25. I pray thee, let me go over, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon. 26. But the LORD was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me: and the LORD said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter. 27. Get thee up into the top of Pisgah, and lift up thine eyes westward.

and northward, and southward, and eastward, and behold it with thine eyes: for thou shalt not go over this Jordan. 28. But charge Joshua, and encourage him, and strengthen him: for he shall go over before this people, and he shall cause them to inherit the land which thou shalt see. 29. So we abode in the valley over against Beth-peor.

Here is,

1. The encouragement which Moses gave to Joshua, who was to succeed him in the government, v.21,22. He commanded him not to fear. Thus, those that are aged and experienced in the service of God should do all they can to strengthen the hands of those that are young, and setting out in religion. Two things he would have him consider for his encouragement. 1. What God had done. Joshua had seen what a total defeat God had given, by the forces of Israel, to these two kings; and, from thence, he might easily infer, so shall the Lord do to all the rest of the kingdoms which we are to make war upon. He must not only infer from thence, that thus the Lord can do with them all, for his arm is not shortened, but, thus he will do, for his purpose is not changed; he that has begun, will finish; as for God, his work is perfect. Joshua had seen it with his own eyes. And the more we have seen of the instances of divine wisdom, power, and goodness, the more inexcusable we are, if we fear what flesh can do unto us. 2. What God had promised. The Lord your God he shall fight for you; and that cause cannot but be victorious which the Lord of Hosts fights for. If God be for us, who can be against us, so as to prevail? We reproach our Leader, if we follow him trembling.

II. The prayer which Moses made for himself, and the answer which God gave to that prayer.

1. His prayer was, That, if it were God's will, he might go before Israel over Jordan into Canaan. At that time, When he had been encouraging Joshua to fight Israel's battles, taking it for granted that he must be their leader; upon that occasion, he was touched with an earnest desire to go over himself, which expresses itself, not in any passionate and impatient complaints, or reflections upon the sentence he was under, but in humble prayers to God, for a gracious reversing of it. I besought the Lord. Note, We should never allow any desires in our hearts which we cannot, in faith, offer up to God by prayer: and what desires are innocent, let them be presented to God. We have not, because we ask not.

Observe, (1.) What he pleads here. Two things. [1.] The great experience which he had had of God's goodness to him, in what he had done for Israel. "Thou hast begun to shew thy servant thy greatness. Lord, perfect what thou hast begun. Thou hast given me to see thy glory in the conquest of these two kings, and the sight has affected me with wonder and thankfulness: Oh let me see more of the outgoings of my God, my King! This great work, no doubt, will be carried on, and completed; let me have the satisfaction of seeing it." Note, The more we see of God's glory in his works, the more we shall desire to see. The works of the Lord are great, and therefore are sought out more and more of all them that have pleasure therein. [2.] The good impressions that had been made upon his heart by what he had seen; for what God is there in heaven or earth that can do according to thy works? The more we are affected with what we have seen of God, and of his wisdom, power, and goodness, the better we are prepared for further discoveries. Those shall see the works of God that admire him in them. Moses had thus expressed himself, concerning God and his works, long before, Exod.15.11. and he still continues of the same mind, that there are no works worthy to be compared with God's works, Ps. 86.8.

(2.) What he begs. I pray thee, let me go over, v.25. God had said, he should not go over; yet he prays that he might; not knowing but that the threatening was conditional, for it was not ratified with an oath, as that concerning the people was, that they should not enter. Thus Hezekiah prayed for his own life, and David for the life of his child, after both had been expressly threatened; and the former prevailed, though the latter did not. Moses remembered the time when he had, by prayer, prevailed with God to recede from the declarations which he had made of his wrath against Israel, Exod.32.14. And why might he not hope, in like manner, to prevail for himself? Let me go over and see the good land. Not, "Let me go over, to be a prince and a ruler there;" he seeks not his own honour, is content to resign the government to Joshua; but, "Let me go, to be a spectator of thy kindness to Israel; to see what I believe concerning the goodness of the land of promise." How pathetically does he speak of Canaan, that good land, that goodly mountain! Note, Those may hope to obtain and enjoy God's favours that know how to value them. What he means by that goodly mountain, we may learn from Ps.78.54. where it is said of God's Israel, that he brought them to the border of his sanctuary, even to this mountain, which his right hand had purchased: where it is plainly to be understood of the whole land of Canaan, yet with an eye to the sanctuary, the glory of it.

2. God's answer to this prayer had in it a mixture of mercy and judgment, that he might sing unto God of both.

(1.) There was judgment in the denial of his request, and that in something of anger too, v.26. The Lord was wroth with me, for your sakes. God not only sees sin in his people, but is much displeased with it; and even those that are delivered from the wrath to come, yet may lie under the tokens of God's wrath in this world, and may be denied some particular favour, which their hearts are much set upon. God is a gracious, tender, loving Father; but he is angry with his children when they do amiss, and denies them many a thing that they desire, and are ready to cry for. But, how was he wroth with Moses, for the sake of Israel? Either, [1.] For that sin which they provoked him to. See Ps. 106.32,33. Or, [2.] The removal of Moses at that time, when he could so ill be spared, was a rebuke to all Israel, and a punishment of their sin. Or, [3.] It was for their sakes, that it might be a warning to them to take heed of offending God, by passionate and unbelieving speeches at any time, after the similitude of his transgression; for, if this were done to such a green tree, what should be done to the dry? He acknowledges that God would not hear him. God had often heard him for Israel, yet he would not hear him for himself. It was the prerogative of Christ, the great Intercessor, to be heard always; yet of him his enemies said, He saved others, himself he could not save: which the Jews would not have upbraided him with, had they considered that Moses, their great prophet, prevailed for others, but for himself he could not prevail. Though Moses, being one of the wrestling seed of Jacob, did not seek in vain, yet he had not the thing itself which he sought for. God may accept our prayers, and yet not grant us the very thing we pray for.

(2.) Here is mercy mixed with this wrath; in several things.

[1.] God quieted the spirit of Moses, under the decree that was gone forth, by that word, v.26. Let it suffice thee. With which word, no doubt, a divine power went to reconcile Moses to the will of God, and to bring him to acquiesce in it. If God does not, by his providence, give us what we desire, yet if, by his grace, he makes us content without it, it comes much to one. "Let it suffice thee to have God for thy Father, and Heaven for thy portion, though thou hast not every thing thou wouldst have in this world. Be satisfied with this, God is all-sufficient.

[2.] He put an honour upon his prayer, in directing him not to insist upon his request. Speak no more to me of this matter. It intimates, that what God does not think fit to grant, we should not think fit to ask; and that God takes such a pleasure in the prayer of the upright, that it is no pleasure to him, no, not in any particular instance, to give a denial to it.

[3.] He promised him a sight of Canaan from the top of Pisgah, v.27. Though he should not have the possession of it, he should have the prospect of it; not to tantalize him, but such a sight of it as would yield him true satisfaction, and would enable him to form a very clear and pleasing idea of that promised land. Probably, Moses had not only his sight preserved for other purposes, but greatly enlarged for this purpose: for, if he were not to have such a sight of it as others could not have from the same place, it had been no particular favour to Moses, nor the matter of a promise. Even great believers, in this present state, see heaven but at a distance.

[4.] He provided him a successor, one who should support the honour of Moses, and carry on and complete that glorious work which the heart of Moses was so much upon, the bringing of Israel to Canaan, and settling them there, v. 28. Charge Joshua, and encourage him in this work. Those to whom God gives a charge, he will be sure to give encouragement to. And it is a comfort to the church's friends, (when they are dying and going off,) to see God's work likely to be carried on by other hands, when they are silent in the dust.

CHAP. IV.

In this chapter we have, I. A most earnest and pathetic exhortation to obedience, both in general, and in some particular instances, backed with a great variety of very pressing arguments, repeated again and again, and set before them in the most moving and affectionate manner imaginable, v. 1. .40. II. The appointing the cities of refuge on that side Jordan, v. 41. 43. III. The particular description of the place where Moses delivered the following repetition of the law, v. 44. .49.

1. NOW therefore hearken, O Israel, unto the statutes and unto the judgments, which I teach you, for to do them, that ye may live, and go in and possess the land which the LORD God of your fathers giveth you. 2. Ye shall not add unto the word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish ought from it, that ye may keep the commandments of the LORD your God which I command you. 3. Your eyes have seen what the LORD did because of Baal-peor: for all the men that followed Baal-peor, the LORD thy God hath destroyed them from among you. 4. But ye that did cleave unto the LORD your God are alive every one of you this day. 5. Behold, I have taught you statutes and judgments, even as the LORD my God commanded me, that ye should do so in the land whither ye go to possess it. 6. Keep therefore and do them; for this is your wisdom and your understanding in the sight of the nations, which shall hear all these statutes, and say, Surely this great nation is a wise and understanding people. 7. For what nation is there so great, who hath God so nigh unto them, as the LORD our God is in all things that we call upon him for? 8. And what nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous as all this law, which I set before you this day? 9. Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently, lest thou forget the things which thine eyes have seen, and lest they depart from thy heart all the days of thy life: but teach them thy sons, and thy sons' sons; 10. Specially the day that thou stoodest before the LORD thy God in Horeb, when the LORD said unto me, Gather me the people together, and I will make them hear my words, that they may learn to fear me all the days that they shall live upon the earth, and that they may teach their children. 11. And ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven, with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness. 12. And the LORD spake unto you out of the midst of the fire: ye heard the voice of the words, but saw no similitude; only ye heard a voice. 13. And he declared unto you his covenant, which he commanded you to perform, even ten commandments; and he wrote them upon two tables of stone. 14. And the LORD commanded me at that time to teach you statutes and judgments, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go over to possess it. 15. Take ye therefore good heed unto yourselves; for ye saw no manner of similitude on the day that the LORD spake unto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire: 16. Lest ye corrupt yourselves, and make you a graven image, the similitude of any figure, the likeness of male or female, 17. The likeness of any beast that is on the earth, the likeness of any winged fowl that flieth in the air, 18. The likeness of any thing that creepeth on the ground, the likeness of any fish that is in the waters beneath the earth: 19. And lest thou lift up thine eyes unto heaven, and when thou seest the sun, and the moon, and the stars, even all the host of heaven, shouldest be driven to worship them, and serve them, which the LORD thy God hath divided unto all nations under the whole heaven. 20. But the LORD hath taken you, and brought you forth out of the iron furnace, even out of Egypt, to be unto him a people of inheritance, as ye are this day. 21. Furthermore, the LORD was angry with me for your sakes, and swore that I should not go over Jordan, and that I should not go in unto that good land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance: 22. But I must die in this land, I must not go over Jordan: but ye shall go over, and possess that good land. 23. Take heed unto yourselves, lest ye forget the covenant of the LORD your God, which he made with you, and make you a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, which the LORD thy God hath forbidden thee. 24. For the LORD thy God is a consuming fire, even a jealous God. 25. When thou shalt beget children, and children's children, and ye shall have remained long in the land, and shall corrupt yourselves, and make a graven image, or the likeness of any thing, and shall do evil in the sight of the LORD thy God, to provoke him to anger: 26. I call heaven and earth to witness against you this day, that ye shall soon utterly perish from off the land whereunto ye go over Jordan to possess it; ye shall not prolong your days upon it, but shall utterly be destroyed. 27. And the LORD shall scatter you among the nations, and ye shall be left few in number among the heathen, whither the LORD shall lead you. 28. And there ye shall serve gods, the work of men's hands, wood and stone, which neither see, nor hear, nor eat, nor smell. 29. But if from thence thou shalt seek the LORD thy God, thou shalt find him, if thou seek him with all thy heart and with all thy soul. 30. When thou art in tribulation, and all these things are come upon thee, even in the latter days, if thou turn to the LORD thy God, and shalt be obedient unto his voice; 31. (For the LORD thy God is a merciful God;) he will not forsake thee, neither destroy thee, nor forget the covenant of thy fathers which he swore unto them. 32. For ask now of the days that are past, which were before thee, since the day that God created man upon the earth, and ask from the one side of heaven unto the other, whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it? 33. Did ever people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live? 34. Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by temptations, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by a stretched-out arm, and by great terrors, according to all that the LORD your God did for you in Egypt before your eyes? 35. Unto thee it was shewed, that thou mightest know that the LORD he is God; there is none else beside him. 36. Out of heaven he made thee to hear his voice, that he might instruct thee: and upon earth he shewed thee his great fire; and thou heardest his words out of the midst of the fire. 37. And because he loved thy fathers, therefore he chose their seed after them, and brought thee out in his sight with his mighty power out of Egypt; 38. To drive out nations from before thee greater and mightier than thou art, to bring thee in, to give thee their land for an inheritance, as it is this day. 39. Know therefore this day, and consider it in thine heart, that the LORD he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath: there is none else. 40. Thou shalt keep therefore his statutes, and his commandments, which I command thee this day, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days upon the earth, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, for ever.

This most lively and excellent discourse is so entire, and the particulars of it are so often repeated, that we must take it altogether in the exposition of it, and endeavoured to digest it into proper heads, for we cannot divide it into paragraphs.

1. In general, it is the use and application of the foregoing history; it comes in by way of inference from it, v. 1. Now therefore hearken, O Israel. This use we should make of the review of God's providences concerning us, we should by them be quickened and engaged to duty and obedience. The histories of the years of ancient times should in like manner be improved by us.

II. The scope and drift of his discourse is to persuade them to keep close to God, and to his service, and not to forsake him for any other god, nor in any instance to decline from their duty to him. Now observe what he says to them with a great deal of divine rhetoric. 1. By way of exhortation and direction. 2. By way of motive and argument to enforce his exhortations.

1. See here how he charges and commands them, and shews them what is good, and what the Lord requires of them.

(1.) He demands their diligent attention to the word of God, and to the statutes and judgments that were taught them, Hearken, O Israel. He means, not only that they must now give him the hearing, but that, whenever the book of the law was read to them, or read by them, they should be attentive to it. "Hearken to the statutes, as containing the great commands of God, and the great concerns of your own souls, and therefore challenging your utmost attention." At Horeb God had made them hear his words, v. 10. hear them with a witness; the attention which was then constrained by the circumstances of the delivery, ought ever after to be engaged by the excellency of the things themselves. What God so spoke once, we should hear twice, hear often.

(2.) He charges them to preserve the divine law pure and entire among them, v. 2. Keep it pure, and do not add to it; keep it entire, and do not diminish from it. Not in practice, so some; "Ye shall not add, by committing the evil which the law forbids; nor diminish, by omitting the good which the law requires." Not in opinion, so others; "Ye shall not add your own inventions, as if the divine institutions were defective, nor introduce, much less impose, any rites of religious worship, other than what God has appointed; nor shall ye diminish, or set aside, any thing that is appointed, as needless, or superfluous." God's work is perfect, nothing can be put to it, or taken from it, without making it the worse. See Eccl. 3. 14. The Jews understand it as prohibiting the alteration of the text or letter of the law, even in the least jot or tittle. And to their great care and exactness herein we are very much indebted, under God, for the purity and integrity of the Hebrew code. We find a fence like this made about the New Testament in the close of it, Rev. 22. 18, 19.

(3.) He charges them to keep God's commandments, v. 2. to do them, v. 5, 14. to keep and do them, v. 6. to perform the covenant, v. 13. Hearing must be in order to doing; knowledge in order to practice. God's commandments were the way they must keep in, the rule they must keep to; they must govern themselves by the moral precepts: perform their devotion according to the divine ritual; and administer justice according to the judicial law. He concludes his discourse, v. 40. with this repeated charge, Thou shalt keep his statutes and his commandments which I command thee. What are laws made for, but to be observed and obeyed?

(4.) He charges them to be very strict and careful in their observance of the law, v. 9. Only take heed to thyself, and keep thy soul diligently; and v. 15. Take ye therefore good heed unto yourselves: And again, v. 23. Take heed to yourselves. Those that would be religious must be very cautious, and walk circumspectly. Considering how many temptations we are compassed about with, and what corrupt inclinations we have in our own bosoms, we have great need to look about us, and to keep our hearts with all diligence. Those cannot walk aright, that walk carelessly, and at all adventures.

(5.) He charges them particularly to take heed of the sin of idolatry, that sin which of all others they would be most tempted to by the customs of the nations, were most addicted to by the corruption of their hearts, and which would be most provoking to God, and of the most pernicious consequence to themselves:

Take good heed, lest in this matter ye corrupt yourselves, v. 15, 16. Two sorts of idolatry he cautions them against.

[1.] The worship of images, however by them they might intend to worship the true God, as they had done in the golden calf; so changing the truth of God into a lie, and his glory into shame. The second commandment is expressly directed against this, and is here enlarged upon, v. 15..18. "Take heed lest ye corrupt yourselves," that is, "lest ye debauch yourselves;" for they that think to make images of God, form in their minds such notions of him as must needs be an inlet to all impieties; and it is intimated that it is a spiritual adultery; "and take heed lest ye destroy yourselves. If any thing ruin you, this will be it. Whatever you do, make no similitude of God, either in a human shape, male or female; or in the shape of any beast or fowl, serpent or fish;" for the heathen worshipped their gods by images of all these kinds, being either not able to form, or not willing to admit, that plain demonstration which we find, Hos. 8. 6. The workman made it, therefore it is not God. To represent an infinite spirit by an image, and the Great Creator by the image of a creature, is the greatest affront we can put upon God, and the greatest cheat we can put upon ourselves.

As an argument against their making images of God, he urges it very much upon them, that, when God made himself known to them at Horeb, he did it by a voice of words which sounded in their ears, to teach them that faith comes by hearing, and God in the word is nigh us; no image was presented to their eye; for to see God as he is, is reserved for our happiness in the other world, and to see him as he is not, will do us hurt, and no good, in this world. Ye saw no similitude, v. 12. no manner of similitude, v. 15. Probably, they expected to have seen some similitude, for they were ready to break through unto the Lord to gaze, Exod. 19. 21. But all they saw was, light and fire, and nothing that they could make an image of; God, in infinite wisdom, so ordering his manifestation of himself, because of the peril of idolatry. It is said indeed of Moses, that he beheld the similitude of the Lord, Numb. 12. 8. God allowing him that favour, because he was above the temptation of idolatry; but, for the people who were lately come from admiring the idols of Egypt, they must see no resemblance of God, lest they should have pretended to copy it, and so should have received the second commandment in vain; "For," says Bishop Patrick, "they would have thought that that forbade them only to make any representation of God beside that wherein he shewed himself to them, in which they would have concluded it lawful to represent him." Let this be a caution to us, to take heed of making images of God in our fancy and imagination, when we are worshipping him, lest thereby we corrupt ourselves. There may be idols in the heart, where there are none in the sanctuary.

[2.] The worship of the sun, moon, and stars, is another sort of idolatry which they are here cautioned against, v. 19. This was the most ancient species of idolatry, and the most plausible, drawing the adoration to those creatures that not only are in a situation above us, but are most sensibly glorious in themselves, and most generally serviceable to the world. And the plausibility of it made it the more dangerous. It is intimated here, First, How strong the temptation is to sense; for the caution is, Lest thou shouldst be driven to worship them, by the strong impulse of a vain imagination, and the impetuous torrent of the customs of the nations. The heart is supposed to walk after the eye, which, in our corrupt and degenerate state, it is very apt to do. "When thou seest the sun, moon, and stars, thou wilt so admire their height and brightness, their regular motion and powerful influence, that thou wilt be strongly tempted to give that glory to them which is due to him that made them, and made them what they are to us; gave them their beings, and made them blessings to the world." It seems, there was need of a great deal of resolution to arm them against this temptation; so weak was their faith in an invisible God and an invisible world. Secondly, Yet he shews how weak the temptation would be to those that would use their reason; for these pretended deities, the sun, moon, and stars, were only blessings which the Lord their God, whom they were obliged to worship, had imparted to all nations. It is absurd to worship them, for, 1. They are man's servants, were made and ordained to give light on earth; and shall we serve those that were made to serve us? The sun, in Hebrew, is called Shemesh, which signifies a servant, for it is the minister-general of this visible world, and holds the candle up to all mankind: let it not then be worshipped as a lord. 2. They are God's gifts; he has imparted them; whatever benefit we have by them, we owe it to him; it is therefore highly injurious to him, to give that honour and praise to them which is due to him only.

(6.) He charges them to teach their children to observe the law of God. Teach them thy sons, and thy sons' sons, v. 9. that they may teach their children, v. 10. [1.] Care must be taken in general to preserve the entail of religion among them, and to transmit the knowledge and worship of God to posterity; for the kingdom of God in Israel was designed to be perpetual, if they did not forfeit the privilege of it. [2.] Parents must, in order hereunto, particularly take care to teach their own children the fear of God, and to train them up in an observance of all his commandments.

(7.) He charges them never to forget their duty, v. 23. Take heed lest ye forget the covenant of the Lord your God. Though God is ever mindful of the covenant, we are apt to forget it; and that is at the bottom of all our departures from God. We have need therefore to watch against all those things which would put the covenant out of our minds, and to watch over our own hearts, lest at any time we let it slip; and so we must take heed lest at any time we forget our religion, lest we lose it, or leave it off. Care and caution, and holy watchfulness, are the best helps against a bad memory. These are the directions and commands he gives them.

2. Let us see now what are the motives and arguments with which he backs these exhortations. How does he order the cause before them, and fill his mouth with arguments? He has a great deal to say on God's behalf. Some of his topics are indeed peculiar to that people, yet applicable to us. But, upon the whole, it is evident, that religion has reason on its side, the powerful charms of which, all that are irreligious wilfully stop their ears against.

(1.) He urges the greatness, glory, and goodness of God. Did we consider what a God he is with whom we have to do, we should surely make conscience of our duty to him, and not dare to sin against him. He reminds them here, [1.] That the Lord Jehovah is the one only living and true God. This they must know and consider, v. 39. There are many things which we know, but are not the better for, because we do not consider them, we do not apply them to ourselves, nor draw proper inferences from them. This is a truth so evident, that it cannot but be known, and so important, that, if it were duly considered, it would effectually reform the world. That the Lord Jehovah he is God, an infinite and eternal Being, self-existent and self-sufficient, and the Fountain of all being, power, and motion; that he is God in heaven above, clothed with all the glory, and Lord of all the hosts, of the upper world, and that he is God upon earth beneath, which, though distant from the throne of his glory, is not out of the reach of his sight or power; and though despicable and mean, is not below his care and cognizance. And there is none else; no true and living God but himself, all the deities of the heathens were counterfeits and usurpers; nor did any of them so much as pretend to be universal monarchs in heaven and earth, but were only local deities. The Israelites, who worshipped no other than the supreme Numen—Divinity, were for ever inexcusable, if they either changed their God, or neglected him. [2.] That he is a consuming fire, a jealous God, v. 24. "Take heed of offending him, for, First, He has a jealous eye to discern an affront; he must have your entire affection and adoration, and will by no means endure a rival." God's jealousy over us is a good reason for our godly jealousy over ourselves. Secondly, He has a heavy hand to punish an affront, especially in his worship, for therein he is in a special manner jealous; he is a consuming fire; his wrath against sinners is so, it is dreadful and destroying, it is a fiery indignation which will devour the adversaries, Heb. 10. 27. Fire consumes that only which is fuel for it, so the wrath of God fastens upon those only who, by their own sin, have fitted themselves for destruction, 1 Cor. 3. 13. Isa. 27. 4. Even in the New Testament we find the same argument urged upon us, as a reason why we should serve God with reverence, Heb. 12. 28, 29. because though he is our God, and a rejoicing light to those that serve him faithfully, yet he is a consuming fire to those that trifle with him. Thirdly, That yet he is a merciful God, v. 31. It comes in here as an encouragement to repentance, but might serve as an inducement to obedience, and a consideration proper to prevent their apostacy. Shall we forsake a merciful God, who will never forsake us, as it follows here, if we be faithful unto him? Whither can we go to mend ourselves? Shall we forget the covenant of our God, who will not forget the covenant of our fathers? Let us be held to our duty by the bonds of love, and prevailed with by the mercies of God to cleave to him.

(2.) He urges their relation to this God, his authority over them, and their obligations to him. "The commandments you are to keep and do, are not mine," says Moses, "not my inventions, not my injunctions, but they are the commandments of the Lord, framed by infinite wisdom, enacted by sovereign power, he is the Lord of your fathers, v. 1. so that you are his by inheritance, your fathers were his, and you were born in his house. He is the Lord your God, v. 2. so that you are his by your own consent. He is the Lord my God, v. 5. so that I treat with you as his agent and ambassador," and in his name Moses delivered unto them all that, and that only, which he had received from the Lord.

(4.) He urges the singular advantages which they enjoyed by virtue of the happy establishment they were under, v. 7, 8. Our communion with God (which is the highest honour and happiness we are capable of in this world) is kept up by the word and prayer; in both these, Israel were happy above any people under heaven.

[1.] Never were any people so privileged in speaking to God, v. 7. he was nigh unto them in all that they called upon him for, ready to answer their inquiries, and resolve them by his oracle; ready to answer their requests, and grant them by a particular providence. When they had cried unto God for bread, for water, for healing, they had found him near them, to succour and relieve them, a very present help, and in the midst of them, (Ps. 46. 1. 5.) his ear open to their prayers. Observe, First, It is the character of God's Israel that on all occasions they call upon him, in every thing they make their requests known to God. They do nothing but what they consult him in, they desire nothing but what they come to him for. Secondly, Those that call upon God shall certainly find him within call, and ready to give an answer of peace to every prayer of faith; See Isa. 58. 9. Thou shalt cry, as the child for the nurse, and he shall say, Here I am, what does my dear child cry for? Thirdly, This is a privilege which makes the Israel of God truly great and honourable. What can go further than this to magnify a people, or person? Is any name more illustrious than that of Israel, a prince with God? What nation is there so great? Other nations might boast of greater numbers, larger territories, and more ancient incorporations; but none could boast of such an interest in Heaven as Israel had. They had their gods, but not so nigh to them as Israel's God was; they could not help them in a time of need, as 1 Kings, 18. 26.

[2.] Never were any people so privileged in hearing from God, by the statutes and judgments which were set before them, v. 8. This also was the grandeur of Israel above any people. What nation is there so great, that hath statutes and judgments so righteous? Observe, First, That all these statutes and judgments of the divine law are infinitely just and righteous, above the statutes and judgments of any of the nations. The law of God is far more excellent than the law of nations. No law so consonant to natural equity and the unprejudiced dictates of right reason, so consistent with itself in all the parts of it, and so conducive to the welfare and interest of mankind, as the scripture-law is, Ps. 119. 128. Secondly, The having of these statutes and judgments set before them, is the true and transcendent greatness of any nation or people. See Ps. 147. 19, 20. It is an honour to us that we have the Bible in reputation and power among us. It is an evidence of a people's being high in the favour of God, and a means of making them high among the nations. They that magnify the law shall be magnified by it.

(5.) He urges God's glorious appearances to them at mount Sinai, when he gave them this law. This he insists much upon. Take heed lest thou forget the day that thou stoodest before the Lord thy God in Horeb, v. 10. Some of them were now alive, that could remember it, though they were then under twenty years of age, and the rest of them might be said to stand there in the loins of their fathers, who received the law, and entered into covenant there, not for themselves only, but for their children, to whom God had an eye particularly in giving the law, that they might teach it their children.

Two things they must remember, and, one would think, they could never forget them.

[1.] What they saw at mount Sinai, v. 11. they saw a strange composition of fire and darkness, both dreadful and very awful; and they must needs be a striking foil to each other; the darkness made the fire in the midst of it look the more dreadful. Fires in the night are most frightful, and the fire made the darkness that surrounded it look the more awful; for it must needs be a strong darkness which such a fire did not disperse. In allusion to this appearance upon mount Sinai, God is said to shew himself for his people, and against his and their enemies, in fire and darkness together, Ps. 18. 8, 9. He tells them again, v. 36. what they saw, for he would have them never to forget it; he shewed thee his great fire. One flash of lightning, that fire from heaven, strikes an awe upon us; and some have observed, that most creatures naturally turn their face toward the lightning, as ready to receive the impressions of it; but how dreadful then must a constant fire from heaven be! It gave an earnest of the day of judgment, in which the Lord Jesus shall be revealed in flaming fire. As he reminds them of what they saw, so he tells them what they saw not; no manner of similitude, from which they might form either an idea of God in their fancies, or an image of God in their high places. By what we see of God, sufficient ground is given us to believe him to be a Being of infinite power and perfection, but no occasion given us to suspect him to have a body such as we have.

[2.] What they heard at mount Sinai, v. 12. "The Lord spake unto you with an intelligible voice, in your own language, and you heard it. This he enlarges upon toward the close of his discourse, v. 32, 33, 36. First, They heard the voice of God speaking out of heaven. God manifests himself to all the world in the works of creation, without speech or language, and yet their voice is heard, Ps. 19. 1. . 3. but to Israel he made himself known by speech and language, condescending to the weakness of the church's infant state. Here was the voice of one crying in the wilderness to prepare the way of the Lord. Secondly, They heard it out of the midst of the fire, which shewed that it was God himself that spake to them, for who else could dwell with devouring fire? God spake to Job out of the whirlwind, which was terrible; but to Israel out of the fire, which was more terrible. We have reason to be thankful that he does not thus speak to us, but by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid, Job, 33. 6, 7. Thirdly, They heard it, and yet lived, v. 33. It was a wonder of mercy that the fire did not devour them, or that they did not die for fear, when Moses himself trembled. Fourthly, Never any people heard the like. He bids them inquire of former days, and distant places, and they would find this favour of God to Israel without precedent or parallel, v. 32. This singular honour done them, called for singular obedience from them. It might justly be expected that they should do more for God than other people, since God had done so much more for them.

(6.) He urges God's gracious appearances for them, in bringing them out of Egypt, from the iron furnace, where they laboured in the fire, forming them into a people, and then taking them to be his own people, a people of inheritance, v. 20. this he mentions again, v. 34, 37, 38. Never did God do such a thing for any people; the rise of this nation was quite different from the origin of all other nations. [1.] They were thus dignified and distinguished, not for any thing in them that was deserving or inviting, but, because God had a kindness for their fathers, he chose them. See the reasons of free grace; we are not beloved for our own sakes, but for his sake who is the great Trustee of the covenant. [2.] They were delivered out of Egypt by miracles and signs, in mercy to them, and in judgment upon the Egyptians, against whom God stretched out his arm, which was signified by Moses's stretching out his hand in summoning the plagues. [3.] They were designed for a happy settlement in Canaan, v. 38. Nations must be driven out from before them, to make room for them, to shew how much dearer they were to God than any other people were. Egyptians and Canaanites must both be sacrificed to Israel's honour and interest. They that stand in Israel's light, in Israel's way, shall find that it is at their peril.

(7.) He urges God's righteous appearance against them sometimes for their sins. He specifies the matter of Peor, v. 3, 4. this had happened very lately; their eyes had seen but the other day the sudden destruction of those that joined themselves to Baal-peor, and the preservation of those that clave to the Lord; from which they might easily infer the danger of apostacy from God, and the benefit of adherence to him. He also takes notice again of God's displeasure against himself, v. 21, 22. The Lord was angry with me for your sakes. He mentions this, to try their ingenuousness, whether they would really be troubled for the great prejudice which they had occasioned to their faithful friend and leader. Others' sufferings for our sakes should grieve us more than our own.

(8.) He urges the certain benefit and advantage of obedience. This argument he begins with, v. 1. That ye may live, and go in and possess the land; and this he concludes with, v. 40. That it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee. He reminds them that they were upon their good behaviour, their prosperity would depend upon their piety. If they kept God's precepts, he would undoubtedly fulfil his promises.

(9.) He urges the fatal consequences of their apostacy from God: That it would undoubtedly be the ruin of their nation. This he enlarges upon, v. 25. . 31. Where, [1.] He foresees their revolt from God to idols; that in process of time, when they had remained long in the land, and were settled upon their lees, they would corrupt themselves, and make a graven image; this was the sin that would most easily beset them, v. 25. [2.] He foretells the judgments of God upon them for this, Ye shall utterly be destroyed, v. 26. scattered among the nations, v. 27. And their sin should be made their punishment, v. 28. There shall ye serve gods, the work of men's hands; be compelled to serve them, whether ye will or no; or, through your own sottishness and stupidity, you will find no better succours to apply yourselves to in your captivity." Those that cast off the duties of religion in their prosperity, cannot expect the comforts of it when they come to be in distress. Justly are they then sent to the gods whom they have served, Judges, 10. 14. [3.] Yet he encourages them to hope that God would reserve mercy for them in the latter days; that he would by his judgments upon them bring them to repentance, and take them again into covenant with himself, v. 29. . 31. Where observe, First, That whatever place we are in, we may from thence seek the Lord our God, though never so remote from our own land, or from his holy temple. There is no part of this earth that has a gulf fixed between it and heaven. Secondly, They, and they only, shall find God to their comfort, who seek him with all their heart, that is, who are entirely devoted to him, and earnestly desirous of his favour, and solicitous to obtain it. Thirdly, Afflictions are sent to engage and quicken us to seek God, and, by the grace of God working with them, many are thus reduced to their right mind. "When these things are come upon thee, it is to be hoped that thou wilt turn to the Lord thy God, for thou seest what comes of turning from him," see Dan. 9. 11, 12. Fourthly, God's faithfulness to his covenant encourages us to hope that he will not reject us, though we are driven to him by affliction. If we at length remember the covenant, we shall find that he has not forgotten it.

Now let all these arguments be laid together, and then say, whether religion has not reason on its side. None cast off the government of their God, but those that have first abandoned the understanding of a man.

41. Then Moses severed three cities on this side Jordan toward the sun-rising; 42. That the slayer might flee thither, which should kill his neighbour unawares, and hated him not in times past; and that fleeing unto one of these cities he might live; 43. Namely, Bezer in the wilderness, in the plain country, of the Reubenites; and Ramoth in Gilead, of the Gadites; and Golan in Bashan, of the Manassites. 44. And this is the law which Moses set before the children of Israel: 45. These are the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, which Moses spake unto the children of Israel, after they came forth out of Egypt. 46. On this side Jordan, in the valley over against Beth-peor, in the land of Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt at Heshbon, whom Moses and the children of Israel smote, after they were come forth out of Egypt: 47. And they possessed his land, and the land of Og king of Bashan, two kings of the Amorites, which were on this side Jordan toward the sun-rising; 48. From Aroer, which is by the bank of the river Arnon, even unto mount Sion, which is Hermon, 49. And all the plain on this side Jordan eastward, even unto the sea of the plain, under the springs of Pisgah.

Here is,

1. The nomination of the cities of refuge on that side Jordan where Israel now lay encamped. Three cities were appointed for that purpose, one in the lot of Reuben, another in that of Gad, and another in that of the half tribe of Manasseh, v.41. .43. What Moses could do for that people while he was yet with them, he did, to give example to the rulers who were settled, that they might observe them the better when he was gone.

2. The introduction to another sermon that Moses preached to Israel, which we have in the following chapters. Probably, it was preached the next sabbath-day after, when the congregation attended to receive instruction. He had in general exhorted them to obedience in the former chapter; here he comes to repeat the law which they were to observe; for he demands an universal, but not an implicit, obedience. How can we do our duty, if we do not know it? Here therefore he sets the law before them, as the rule they were to work by, the way they were to walk in; sets it before them, as the glass in which they were to see their natural face, that, looking into this perfect law of liberty, they might continue therein. These are the testimonies, the statutes, and the judgments, the moral, ceremonial, and judicial laws, which had been enacted before, when Israel was newly come out of Egypt, and were now repeated, on this side Jordan, v.44. .46. The place where Moses gave them these laws in charge is here particularly described. It was, (1.) Over against Beth-peor, an idol temple of the Moabites, which perhaps Moses sometimes looked toward, with a particular caution to them against the infection of that and other such like dangerous places. (2.) It was upon their new conquests, in the very land which they had got out of the hands of Sihon and Og, and were now actually in possession of, v.47. Their present triumphs herein were a powerful argument for obedience.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter we have the second edition of the ten commandments. 1. The general intent of them; they were in the nature of a covenant between God and Israel, v.1. .5. II. The particular precepts are repeated, v.6. .21. With the double delivery of them, both by word and writing, v.22. III. The settling of the correspondence from thenceforward between God and Israel, by the mediation and ministry of Moses. 1. It was Israel's humble petition that it might be so, v.23. .27. 2. It was God's gracious grant that it should be so, v.28. .31. And from hence he infers the obligation they were under to obedience, v.32, 33.

1. AND Moses called all Israel, and said unto them, Hear, O Israel, the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them, and keep, and do them. 2. The LORD our God made a covenant with us in Horeb. 3. The LORD made not this covenant with our fathers, but with us, even us, who are all of us here alive this day. 4. The LORD talked with you face to face in the mount out of the midst of the fire, 5. (I stood between the LORD and you at that time, to shew you the word of the LORD: for ye were afraid by reason of the fire, and went not up into the mount;) saying,

Here,

I. Moses summons the assembly. He called all Israel, not only the elders, but, it is likely, as many of the people as could come within hearing, v.1. The greatest of them were not above God's command, nor the meanest of them below his cognizance; but they were all concerned to hear what they were all bound to do.

II. He demands attention. "Hear, O Israel; hear and heed, hear and remember, hear, that you may learn, and keep, and do; else your hearing is to no purpose. When we hear the word of God, we must set ourselves to learn it, that we may have it ready to us upon all occasions, and what we have learned we must put in practice, for that is the end of hearing and learning; not to fill our heads with notions, or our mouths with talk, but to rectify and direct our affections and conversations.

III. He refers them to the covenant made with them in Horeb, as that which they must govern themselves by. See the wonderful condescension of divine grace in turning the command into a covenant, that we might be the more strongly bound to obedience by our own consent, and the more encouraged in it by the divine promise, both which are supposed in the covenant. The promises and threatenings annexed to some of the precepts, as to the second, third, and fifth, make them amount to a covenant. Observe, 1. The parties to this covenant. God made it not with our fathers, not with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; to them God gave the covenant of circumcision, Acts, 7. 8. but not that of the ten commandments. The light of divine revelation shone gradually, and the children were made to know more of God's mind, than their fathers had done. "The covenant was made with us, or our immediate parents that represented us, before mount Sinai, and transacted for us." 2. The publication of this covenant; God himself did, as it were, read the articles to them, v.4. He talked with you face to face. Word to Word. So the Chaldee. Not in dark visions, as of old he spake to the fathers, Job, 4. 12, 13. but openly and clearly, and so as that all the thousands of Israel might hear and understand. He spake to them, and then received the answer they returned to him: thus was it transacted face to face. 3. The mediator of the covenant; Moses stood between God and them, at the foot of the mount, v.5. and carried messages between them, both for the settling of the preliminaries, Exod. 19. and for the exchanging of the ratifications, Exod. 24. Herein Moses was a type of Christ, who stands between God and man, to shew us the word of the Lord: a blessed Day's-Man, that has laid his hand upon us both, so that we may both hear from God, and speak to him, without trembling.

6. I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. 7. Thou shalt have none other gods before me. 8. Thou shalt not make thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the waters beneath the earth: 9. Thou shalt not bow down thyself unto them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me, 10. And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments. 11. Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain: for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain. 12. Keep the sabbath-day to sanctify it, as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee. 13. Six days thou shalt labour, and do all thy work: 14. But the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thine ox, nor thine ass, nor any of thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou. 15. And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the LORD thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched-out arm: therefore the LORD thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath-day. 16. Honour thy father and thy mother, as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee; that thy days may be prolonged, and that it may go well with thee, in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. 17. Thou shalt not kill. 18. Neither shalt thou commit adultery. 19. Neither shalt thou steal. 20. Neither shalt thou hear false witness against thy neighbour. 21. Neither shalt thou desire thy neighbour's wife, neither shalt thou covet thy neighbour's house, his field, or his manservant, or his maid-servant, his ox, or his ass, or any thing that is thy neighbour's. 22. These words the LORD spoke unto all your assembly in the mount out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice: and he added no more. And he wrote them in two tables of stone, and delivered them unto me.

Here is the repetition of the ten commandments; in which observe,

I. Though they had been spoken before, and written, yet they are again rehearsed: for precept must be upon precept, and line upon line, and all little enough to keep the word of God in our minds, and to preserve and renew the impressions of it. We have need to have the same things often inculcated upon us. See Phil. 3. 1.

II. There is some variation here from that record, Exod. 20. as there is between the Lord's prayer, as it is in Matth. 6. and as it is Luke, 11. In both it is more necessary that we tie ourselves to the things, than to the words, unalterably.

III. The most considerable variation is in the fourth commandment, Exod. 20. the reason annexed is taken from the creation of the world; here it is taken from their deliverance out of Egypt, because that was typical of our redemption by Jesus Christ, in remembrance of which the Christian sabbath was to be observed, v. 15. Remember that thou wast a servant, and God brought thee out. And therefore, 1. "It is fit that thy servants should be favoured by the sabbath rest; for thou knowest the heart of a servant, and how welcome one day's ease will be after six days' labour." 2. "It is fit that thy God should be honoured by the sabbath-work, and the religious services of the day, in consideration of the great things he has done for thee." In the resurrection of Christ, we were brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, with a mighty hand, and an outstretched arm; therefore, by the gospel edition of the law, we are directed to observe the first day of the week, in remembrance of that glorious work of power and grace.

IV. It is added in the fifth commandment, That it may go well with thee, which addition the apostle quotes, and puts first, Eph. 6. 3. that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest live long. If there be instances of some that have been very dutiful to their parents, and yet have not lived long upon earth, we may reconcile it to the promise, by this explication of it, Whether they live long or no, it shall go well with them, either in this world or in a better. See Eccl. 8. 12.

V. The five last commandments are connected or coupled together, which they are not in Exodus; Neither shalt thou commit adultery, neither shalt thou steal, &c. Which intimates that God's commands are all of a piece, the same authority that obliges us to one obliges us to another; and we must not be partial in the law, but have respect to all God's commandments; for he that offends in one point is guilty of all, Jan. 2. 10, 11.

VI. That these commandments were given with a great deal of awful solemnity, v. 22. 1. They were spoken with a great voice out of the fire and thick darkness. That was a dispensation of terror, designed to make the gospel of grace the more welcome, and to be a specimen of the terrors of the judgment-day, Ps. 50. 3, 4. 2. He added no more. What other laws he gave them were sent by Moses, but no more were spoken in the same manner that the ten commandments were. He added no more, therefore we must not add: the law of the Lord is perfect. 3. He wrote them in two tables of stone, that they might be preserved from corruption, and might be transmitted pure and entire to posterity, for whose use they were intended, as well as for the present generation. These being the heads of the covenant, the chest in which the written tables were deposited was called the ark of the covenant. See Rev. 11. 19.

23. And it came to pass, when ye heard the voice out of the midst of the darkness, (for the mountain did burn with fire,) that ye came near unto me, even all the heads of your tribes, and your elders; 24. And ye said, Behold, the LORD our God hath shewed us his glory and his greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire: we have seen this day that God doth talk with man, and he liveth. 25. Now therefore why should we die? for this great fire will consume us: if we hear the voice of the LORD our God any more, then we shall die. 26. For who is there of all flesh, that hath heard the voice of the living God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as we have, and lived? 27. Go thou near, and hear all that the LORD our God shall say: and speak thou unto us all that the LORD our God shall speak unto thee; and we will hear it, and do it. 28. And the LORD heard the voice of your words, when ye spake unto me; and the LORD said unto me, I have heard the voice of the words of this people, which they have spoken unto thee: they have well said all that they have spoken. 29. O that there were such an heart in them, that they would fear me, and keep all my commandments always, that it might be well with them, and with their children for ever! 30. Go say to them, Get you into your tents again. 31. But as for thee, stand thou here by me, and I will speak unto thee all the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which thou shalt teach them, that they may do them in the land which I give them to possess it. 32. Ye shall observe to do therefore as the LORD your God hath commanded you; ye shall not turn aside to the right hand or to the left. 33. Ye shall walk in all the ways which the LORD your God hath commanded you, that ye may live, and that it may be well with you, and that ye may prolong your days in the land which ye shall possess.

Here,

I. Moses reminds them of the agreement of both the parties that were now treating, in the mediation of Moses.

1. Here is the consternation that the people were put into, by that extreme terror with which the law was given. They owned that they could not bear it any more; “This great fire will consume us, this dreadful voice will be fatal to us, we shall certainly die if we hear it any more,” v. 25. They wondered that they were not already struck dead with it, and took it for an extraordinary instance of the divine power and goodness, not only that they were thus spoken to, but that they were enabled to hear it. For, who ever heard the voice of the living God, as we have, and lived? God’s appearances have always been terrible to man, ever since the fall: but Christ, having taken away sin, invites us to come boldly to the throne of grace.

2. Their earnest request that God would from henceforward speak to them by Moses, with a promise that they would hear what he said, as from God himself, and do it, v. 27. It seems by this, (1.) That they expected to receive further commands from God, and were willing to hear more from him. (2.) That they thought Moses able to bear these discoveries of the divine glory, which they, by reason of guilt, were sensible of their inability to stand up under. They believed him to be a favourite of Heaven, and also one that would be faithful to them; yet at other times they murmured at him, and but a little before this, were ready to stone him, Exod. 17. 4. See how men’s convictions correct their passions. (3.) That now they were in a good mind, under the strong convictions of the word they heard. Many have their consciences startled by the law, that have them not purified; fair promises are extorted from them, but no good principles fixed and rooted in them.

3. God’s approbation of their request. (1.) He commends what they said, v. 28. They spoke it to Moses, but God took notice of it; for there is not a word in our tongue, but he knows it. He acknowledges, They have well said. Their owning the necessity of a mediator to deal between them and God, was well said. Their desire to receive further directions from God by Moses, and their promise to observe what directions should be given them, were well said. And what is well said, shall have its praise with God, and should have with us. What is good, as far as it goes, let it be commended. (2.) He wishes they were but sincere in it, (v. 29.) O that there were such a heart in them! [1.] Such a heart as they should have; a heart to fear God, and keep his commandments for ever. Note, The God of heaven is truly and earnestly desirous of the welfare and salvation of poor sinners: he has given abundant proof that he is so; he gives us time and space to repent; by his mercies invites us to repentance, and waits to be gracious; has sent his Son to redeem us, published a general offer of pardon and life, promised his Spirit to those that pray for him, and has said it, and sworn, that he has no pleasure in the ruin of sinners. [2.] Such a heart as they now had, or, one would think they had. Note, It would be well with many, if there were always such a heart in them, as there seems to be sometimes; when they are under conviction of sin, or the rebukes of Providence, or when they come to look death in the face: How gracious will they be, when these pangs come upon them! O that there were always such a heart in them! (3.) He appoints Moses to be his messenger to them, to receive the law from his mouth, and to communicate it to them, v. 31. Here the matter was settled by consent of both parties, that God should from henceforward speak to us by men like ourselves, by Moses and the prophets, by the apostles and the evangelists, whom if we believe not, neither should we be persuaded, though God should speak to us as he did to Israel at mount Sinai, or send expresses from heaven or hell.

II. Hence he infers a charge to them, to observe and do all that God had commanded them, v. 32, 33. Seeing God had showed himself so tender of them, and so willing to consider their frame, and gratify them in what they desired, and withal so ready to make the best of them; seeing they themselves had desired to have Moses for their teacher, who was now teaching them; and seeing they had promised so solemnly, and under the influence of so many good causes and considerations, that they would hear and do; he charges them to walk in all the ways that God had commanded them, assuring them that it would be highly to their advantage to do so. The only way to be happy, is to be holy. Say to the righteous, I shall be well with them.

CHAP. VI.

Moses, in this chapter, goes on with his charge to Israel, to be sure to keep up their religion in Canaan. It is much the same with ch. 4. I. His preface is a persuasive to obedience, v. 1—3. II. He lays down the great principles of obedience. The first truth to be believed, That God is one, v. 4. The first duty to be done, To love him with all our heart, v. 5. III. He prescribes the means for keeping up religion, v. 6—9. IV. He cautions them against those things which would be the ruin of religion; abuse of plenty, (v. 10—12) inclination to idolatry; (v. 14, 15.) and gives them some general precepts, v. 13, 16—18. V. He directs them what instructions to give their children v. 20—25.

1. NOW these are the commandments, the statutes, and the judgments, which the LORD your God commanded to teach you, that ye might do them in the land whither ye go to possess it: 2. That thou mightest fear the LORD thy God, to keep all his statutes and his commandments, which I command thee, thou, and thy son, and thy son’s son, all the days of thy life; and that thy days may be prolonged. 3. Hear therefore, O Israel, and observe to do it, that it may be well with thee, and that ye may increase mightily, as the LORD God of thy fathers hath promised thee, in the land that floweth with milk and honey.

Observe here, 1. That Moses taught the people all that, and that only, which God commanded him to teach them, v. 1. Thus Christ’s ministers are to teach his churches all that he has commanded, and neither more nor less, Matth. 28. 20. 2. That the end of their being taught, was, that they might do as they were taught, (v. 1.) might keep God’s statutes, (v. 2.) and observe to do them, v. 3. Good instructions from parents and ministers will but aggravate our condemnation, if we do not live up to them. 3. That Moses carefully endeavoured to fix them for God and godliness, now that they were entering upon the land of Canaan, that they might be prepared for the comforts of that land, and fortified against the snares of it; and now that they were setting out in the world, might set out well. 4. That the fear of God in the heart will be the most powerful principle of obedience; (v. 2.) That thou mightest fear the Lord thy God, to keep all his statutes. 5. The entail of religion in a family, or country, is the best entail: it is highly desirable that not we only, but our children, and our children’s children, may fear the Lord. 6. Religion and righteousness advance and secure the prosperity of any people. Fear God, and it shall be well with thee. Those that are well-taught, if they do what they are taught, shall be well-fed too, as Israel in the land flowing with milk and honey, v. 3.

4. Hear, O Israel: the LORD our God is one LORD: 5. And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. 6. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart: 7. And thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. 8. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. 9. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates. 10. And it shall be when the LORD thy God shall have brought thee into the land which he swore unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give thee great and goodly cities, which thou buildedst not, 11. And houses full of all good things, which thou filledst not, and wells digged, which thou diggedst not, vineyards and olive trees, which thou plantedst not; when thou shalt have eaten and be full; 12. Then beware lest thou forget the LORD, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. 13. Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God, and serve him, and shalt swear by his name. 14. Ye shall not go after other gods, of the gods of the people which are round about you; 15. (For the LORD thy God is a jealous God among you) lest the anger of the LORD thy God be kindled against thee, and destroy thee from off the face of the earth. 16. Ye shall not tempt the LORD your God, as ye tempted him in Massah.

Here is,

I. A brief summary of religion, containing the first principles of faith and obedience, v. 4, 5. These two verses the Jews reckon one of the choicest portions of scripture: they write it in their phylacteries, and think themselves not only obliged to say it at least twice every day, but very happy in being so obliged; having this saying among them: Blessed are we, who every morning and evening say, Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord. But more blessed are we, if we duly consider and improve,

1. What we are here taught to believe concerning God; That Jehovah our God is one Jehovah. (1.) That the God whom we serve is Jehovah, a Being infinitely and eternally perfect, self-existent, and self-sufficient. (2.) That he is the one only living and true God; he only is God, and he is but One. The firm belief of this self-evident truth would effectually arm them against all idolatry, which was introduced by that fundamental error, That there are gods many. It is past dispute, that there is one God, and there is no other but he, Mark, 12. 32. Let us therefore have no other, nor desire to have any other. Some have thought there is here a plain intimation of the Trinity of persons in the unity of the Godhead; for here is the name of God three times, and yet all declared to be One. Happy they that have this one Lord for their God; for they have but one Master to please, but one Benefactor to seek to. It is better to have one fountain than a thousand cisterns; one all-sufficient God than a thousand insufficient ones.

2. What we are here taught concerning the duty which God requires of man. It is all summed up in this, as its principle, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart. He had undertaken, v. 2. to teach them to fear God; and, in pursuance of his undertaking, he here teaches them to love him: for the warmer our affection to him, the greater will be our veneration for him; and the child that honours his parents, no doubt loves them. Did ever any prince make a law that his subjects should love him? Yet such is the condescension of the divine grace, that this is made the first and great commandment of God's law, that we love him, and that we perform all other parts of our duty to him from a principle of love: My son, give me thine heart. We must highly esteem him, be well-pleased that there is such a Being, well-pleased in all his attributes and relations to us: our desire must be toward him, our delight in him, our dependence upon him, and to him we must be entirely devoted. It must be a constant pleasure to us to think of him, hear from him, speak to him, and serve him. We must love him, (1.) As the Lord, the best of Beings, most excellent and amiable in himself. (2.) As our God, a God in covenant with us, our Father, and the most kind and bountiful of friends and benefactors. We are also commanded to love God with all our heart, and soul, and might; that is, We must love him, [1.] With a sincere love; not in word and tongue only, saying we love him when our hearts are not with him, but inwardly, and in truth, solacing ourselves in him. [2.] With a strong love; the heart must be carried out toward him with great ardour and fervency of affection. Some have from hence thought, that we should avoid saying (as we commonly express ourselves) that we will do this or that, with all our heart; for we must not do any thing with all our heart but love God; and that this phrase being here used concerning that sacred fire, it should not be unhalloed. He that is our All must have our all, and none but he. [3.] With a superlative love; We must love God above any creature whatsoever, and love nothing beside him, but what we love for him, and in subordination to him. [4.] With an intelligent love; for so it is explained, Mark, 12. 33. To love him with all the heart, and with all the understanding; we must know him, and therefore love him, as those that see good cause to love him. [5.] With an entire love; he is one, and therefore our hearts must be united in this love, and the whole stream of our affections must run toward him. Oh that this love of God may be shed abroad in our hearts!

II. Means are here prescribed for the maintaining and keeping up of religion in our hearts and houses, that it might not wither and go to decay. And they are these:

1. Meditation, v. 6. These words which I command thee, shall be in thine heart. Though the words alone without the things will do us no good, yet we are in danger of losing the things if we neglect the words, by which ordinarily divine light and power are conveyed to the heart. God's words must be laid up in our heart, that our thoughts may be daily conversant with them, and employed about them, and thereby the whole soul may be brought to abide and act under the influence and impression of them. This immediately follows upon the law of loving God with all our heart; for they that do so will lay up his word in their hearts, both as an evidence and effect of that love, and as a means to preserve and increase it. He that loves God, loves his Bible.

2. The religious education of children, v. 7. Thou shalt teach them diligently to thy children; and by communicating thy knowledge thou wilt increase it." They that love the Lord God themselves should do what they can to engage the affections of their children to him, and so to preserve the entail of religion in their families from being cut off. Thou shalt whet them diligently upon thy children, so some read it; frequently repeat these things to them, try all ways of instilling them into their minds, and making them pierce into their hearts. As in whetting a knife, it is turned first on this side, then on that. "Be careful and exact in teaching thy children; and aim, as by whetting, to sharpen them, and put an edge upon them. Teach them thy children, not only those of thine own body," (say the Jews,) "but all those that are any way under thy care and tuition." Bishop Patrick well observes here, that Moses thought his law so very plain and easy, that every father might be able to instruct his sons in it, and every mother her daughters. Thus that good thing which is committed to us, we must carefully transmit to those that come after us, that it may be perpetuated.

3. Pious discourse. "Thou shalt talk of these things, with due reverence and seriousness, for the benefit not only of thy children, but of thy other domestics, thy friends and companions, as thou sittest in thy house, either at work, or at meat, or at rest, or to receive visits; and when thou walkest by the way, either for diversion, or for conversation, or in journeys, when at night thou art retiring from thy family to lie down for sleep, and when in the morning thou art risen up, and returnest to thy family again. Take all occasions to discourse with those about thee of divine things; not of unrevealed mysteries, or matters of doubtful disputation, but of the plain truths and laws of God, and the things that belong to our peace." So far is it from being reckoned a diminution to the honour of sacred things, to make them the subject of our familiar discourse, that they are recommended to us to be talked of; for the more conversant we are with them, the more we shall admire them, and be affected with them, and may thereby be instrumental to communicate divine light and heat.

4. Frequent reading of the word. They shall be as frontlets between the eyes, and thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, v. 8, 9. It is probable that at that time there were few written copies of the whole law, only at the feast of tabernacles the people had it read to them; and therefore God appointed them, at least for the present, to write some select sentences of the law, that were most weighty and comprehensive, upon their walls, or in scrolls of parchment to be worn about their wrists, and some think that hence the phylacteries, so much used among the Jews, took rise. Christ blames the Pharisees, not for wearing them, but for affecting to have them broader than other people's, Matth. 23. 5. But when Bibles came to be common among them, there was the less occasion for this expedient. It was prudently and piously provided, by the first reformers of the English church, that then, when Bibles were scarce, some select portions of scripture should be written on the walls and pillars of the churches, which the people might make familiar to them, in conformity to this direction here, which seems to have been binding in the letter of it to the Jews, as it is to us in the intent of it, which is, that we should endeavour by all means possible to make the word of God familiar to us, that we may have it ready to us upon all occasions, for our restraint from sin, and our direction and excitement to our duty. It must be as that which is graven on the palms of our hands, always before our eyes. See Prov. 3. 1, 3. It is also intimated that we must never be ashamed to own our religion, nor to own ourselves under the check and government of it. Let it be written on our gates, and let every one that goes by our door, read it, That we believe Jehovah to be God alone, and believe ourselves bound to love him with all our hearts.

III. A caution is here given not to forget God in a day of prosperity and plenty, v. 10. 12. Here, 1. He raises their expectations of the goodness of their God; taking it for granted that he would bring them into the good land that he had promised, v. 10. That they should no longer dwell in tents as shepherds and poor travellers, but should settle in great and goodly cities; should no longer wander in a barren wilderness, but should enjoy houses well-furnished, and gardens well-planted, v. 11. and all this without any care or expence of their own, which he here lays a great stress upon, Cities which thou buildedst not, houses which thou filledst not, &c. both because it made the mercy really much more valuable, that what they had came to them so cheap, and yet, if they did not actually consider it, the mercy would be the less esteemed, for we are most sensible of the value of that which has cost us dear. When they came so easily by the gift, they would be apt to grow secure, and unmindful of the Giver. 2. He engages their watchfulness against the badness of their own hearts; then beware, when thou liest safe and soft, lest thou forget the Lord, v. 12. Note, (1.) In a day of prosperity we are in great danger of forgetting God, our dependence upon him, our need of him, and our obligations to him. When the world smiles, we are apt to make our court to it, and expect our happiness in it, and so we forget him that is our only portion and rest. Agur prays against this temptation, Prov. 30. 9. Lest I be full, and deny thee. (2.) There is therefore need of great care and caution at such a time, and strict watch over our own hearts. "Then beware; being warned of your danger, stand upon your guard against it. Bind the words of God for a sign upon thy hand, for this end, to prevent thy forgetting God. When thou art settled in Canaan, forget not thy deliverance out of Egypt; but look to the rock out of which thou wast hewn: when thy latter end is greatly increased, remember the smallness of thy beginnings."

IV. Some special precepts and prohibitions are here given, which are of great consequence. 1. They must upon all occasions give honour to God, v. 13. Fear him and serve him, (for if he be a Master, we must both reverence him and do his work,) and swear by his name; that is, they must not upon any occasion appeal to any other, as the Discerner of truth, and Avenger of wrong. Swear by him only, and not by any idol, or any other creature. Swear by his name in all treaties and covenants with the neighbouring nations, and do not compliment them so far as to swear by their gods. Swearing by his name, is sometimes put for an open profession of his name; Isa. 45. 23. Every tongue shall swear, is expounded, Rom. 14. 11. Every tongue shall confess to God. 2. They must not upon any occasion give that honour to other gods, v. 14. Ye shall not go after other gods, that is, "Ye shall not serve or worship them," for therein they went astray, they went a-whoring from the true God, who, in this, more than in any thing, is a jealous God, v. 15. and the learned Bishop Patrick observes here, out of Maimonides, that we never find, either in the law or the prophets, anger, or fury, or jealousy, or indignation, attributed to God, but upon occasion of idolatry. 3. They must take heed of dishonouring God by tempting him, v. 16. Ye shall not tempt the Lord your God, that is, "Ye shall not in any exigence distrust the power, presence, and providence of God, nor quarrel with him;" which, if they indulged an evil heart of unbelief, they would take occasion to do in Canaan as well as in the wilderness. No change of condition will cure a disposition to murmur and fret. Our Saviour uses this caution as an answer to one of Satan's temptations, with application to himself, Matth. 4. 7. Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God; either by despairing of his power and goodness, while we keep in the way of our duty, or by presuming upon it, when we turn aside out of that way.

17. Ye shall diligently keep the commandments of the LORD your God, and his testimonies, and his statutes, which he hath commanded thee. 18. And thou shalt do that which is right and good in the sight of the LORD: that it may be well with thee, and that then mayest go in and possess the good land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers. 19. To cast out all thine enemies from before thee, as the LORD hath spoken. 20. And when thy son asketh thee in time to come, saying, What mean the testimonies, and the statutes, and the judgments, which the LORD our God hath commanded you? 21. Then thou shalt say unto thy son, We were Pharaoh's bondmen in Egypt; and the LORD brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand: 22. And the LORD shewed signs and wonders, great and sore, upon Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his household, before our eyes: 23. And he brought us out from thence, that he might bring us in, to give us the land which he sware unto our fathers. 24. And the LORD commanded us to do all these statutes, to fear the LORD our God, for our good always, that he might preserve us alive, as it is at this day. 25. And it shall be our righteousness, if we observe to do all these commandments before the LORD our God, as he hath commanded us.

Here,

I. Moses charges them to keep God's commandments themselves, v. 17. 19. Ye shall diligently keep God's commandments. Note, It requires a great deal of care and pains to keep up religion in the power of it in our hearts and lives. Negligence will ruin us; but we cannot be saved without diligence. To induce them to this, he here shews them, 1. That this would be very acceptable to God. It is right and good in the sight of the Lord; and that is right and good, indeed, that is so in God's sight. If we have any regard to the favour of our Creator as our felicity, and the law of our creation as our rule, we shall be religious. 2. That it would be very advantageous and profitable to themselves. It would secure to them the possession of the land of Canaan, prosperity there, and constant victory over those that stood in their way. In short, Do well, and it shall be well with thee.

II. He charges them to instruct their children in the commands of God; not only that they might in their tender years intelligently and affectionately join in religious services, but that afterward they might in their day keep up religion, and convey it to those that should come after them.

Now, 1. Here is a proper question, which it is supposed the children would ask, v. 20. "What mean the testimonies and the statutes? What is the meaning of the feasts we observe, the sacrifices we offer, and the many peculiar customs we keep up?" Observe, (1.) All divine institutions have a certain meaning, and there is something great designed in them. (2.) It concerns us to know and understand the meaning of them, that we may perform a reasonable service, and may not offer the blind for sacrifice. (3.) It is good for children betimes to inquire into the true intent and meaning of the religious observances they are trained up in. To be thus inquisitive, in divine things, is a good sign that they are concerned about them, and a good means of their attaining to a great acquaintance with them. Then shall we know, if thus we follow on to know.

2. Here is a full answer put into the parents' mouths to be given to this good question. Parents and teachers must give instruction to those under their charge, though they do not ask it, nay, though they have an aversion to it; much more must they be ready to answer questions, and to give instruction when it is desired; for, it may be hoped, they that ask it will be willing to receive it. Did the children ask the meaning of God's laws, let them be told, That they were to be observed, (1.) In a grateful remembrance of God's former favours to them, especially their deliverance out of Egypt, v. 21. .23. The children must be often told of the deplorable state their ancestors were in, when they were bondmen in Egypt, the great salvation God wrought for them in fetching them out thence, and that God, in giving them these peculiar statutes, meant to perpetuate the memorial of that work of wonder by which they were formed into a peculiar people. (2.) As the prescribed condition of his further favours, v. 24. The Lord commanded us all these statutes for our good. Note, God commands us nothing but what is really for our own good. It is our interest, as well as our duty, to be religious. [1.] It will be our life; that he might preserve us alive, which is a great favour, and more than we could expect, considering how often we have forfeited life itself. Godliness has the promise of the continuance and comfort of the life that now is, as far as it is for God's glory. [2.] It will be our righteousness. Could we perfectly fulfil but that one command of loving God with all our heart, soul, and might, and could we say, "We have never done otherwise," that would be so our righteousness, as to entitle us to the benefits of the covenant of innocency; had we continued in every thing that is written in the book of the law to do it, the law would have justified us. But that we cannot pretend to, therefore our sincere obedience shall be accepted through a Mediator, to denominate us, as Noah was, righteous before God, Gen. 7. 1. Luke, 1. 6. and John, 3. 7. The Chaldee reads it, There shall be a reward to us, if we observe to do these commandments; for, without doubt, in keeping God's commandments there is great reward.

CHAP. VII.

Moses in this chapter exhorts Israel, I. In general, to keep God's commandments, v. 11, 12. II. In particular, and in order to that, to keep themselves pure from all communion with idolaters. 1. They must utterly destroy the seven devoted nations, and not spare them, or make leagues with them, v. 1, 2, 16, 24. 2. They must by no means marry with the remainders of them, v. 3, 4. 3. They must deface and consume their altars and images, and not so much as take the silver and gold of them to their own use, v. 5, 25, 26. To enforce this charge, he shews that they were bound to do so, (1.) In duty. Considering, [1.] Their election to God, v. 6. [2.] The reason of that election, v. 7, 8. [3.] The terms they stood upon with God, v. 9, 10. (2.) In interest. It is here promised, [1.] In general, that if they would serve God, he would bless and prosper them, v. 12. .15. [2.] In particular, that if they would drive out the nations, that they might not be a temptation to them, God would drive them out, that they should not be any vexation to them, v. 17. .21.

1. WHEN the LORD thy God shall bring thee into the land whither thou goest to possess it, and hath cast out many nations before thee, the Hittites, and the Gergashites, and the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, seven nations greater and mightier than thou; 2. And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor shew mercy unto them: 3. Neither shalt thou make marriages with them; thy daughter thou shalt not give unto his son, nor his daughter shalt thou take unto thy son. 4. For they will turn away thy son from following me, that they may serve other gods: so will the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and destroy thee suddenly. 5. But thus shall ye deal with them; ye shall destroy their altars, and break down their images, and cut down their groves, and burn their graven images with fire. 6. For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God: the LORD thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth. 7. The LORD did not set his love upon you, nor choose you, because ye were more in number than any people; for ye were the fewest of all people: 8. But because the LORD loved you, and because he would keep the oath which he had sworn unto your fathers, hath the LORD brought you out with a mighty hand, and redeemed you out of the house of bondmen, from the hand of Pharaoh king of Egypt. 9. Know therefore that the LORD thy God, he is God, the faithful God, which keepeth covenant and mercy with them that love him and keep his commandments to a thousand generations; 10. And repayeth them that hate him to their face, to destroy them: he will not be slack to him that hateth him, he will repay him to his face. 11. Thou shalt therefore keep the commandments, and the statutes, and the judgments, which I command thee this day, to do them.

Here is,

1. A very strict caution against all friendship and fellowship with idols and idolaters. Those that are taken into communion with God, must have no communication with the unfruitful works of darkness. These things they are charged about, for the preventing of this snare now before them.

1. They must shew them no mercy, v. 1, 2. Bloody work is here appointed them, and yet it is God's work, and good work, and in its time and place needful, acceptable, and honourable.

(1.) God here engages to do his part. It is spoken of as a thing taken for granted, that God would bring them into the land of promise, that he would cast out the nations before them who were the present occupants of that land; no room was left to doubt of that. His power is irresistible, and therefore he can do it: his promise is inviolable, and therefore he will do it. Now, [1.] These devoted nations are here named and numbered, v. 1. Seven in all, and seven to one seemed to make it a very unequal contest. They are specified, that Israel might know the bounds and limits of their commission; hitherto their severity must come, but no further; nor must they, under colour of this commission, kill all that came in their way; no, here must its waves be stayed. The confining of this commission to the nations here mentioned, plainly intimates that after-ages were not to draw this into a precedent; this will not serve to justify those barbarous wars which give no quarter. How agreeable soever this method might be, when God himself prescribed it, to that dispensation under which such multitudes of beasts were killed and burned in sacrifice; now that all sacrifices of atonement are perfected in, and superseded by, the great propitiation made by the blood of Christ, human blood is become perhaps more precious than it was, and those that have most power, yet must not be prodigal of it. [2.] They are here owned to be greater and mightier than Israel. They had been long rooted in this land, to which Israel came strangers; they were more numerous, had men much more bulky, and more expert in war, than Israel had; yet all this shall not prevent their being cast out before Israel. The strength of Israel's enemies magnifies the power of Israel's God, who will certainly be too hard for them.

(2.) He engages them to do their part. Thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them, v. 2. If God cast them out, Israel must not take them in, no not as tenants, or tributaries, or servants. No covenant of any kind must be made with them, no mercy must be shewed them. This severity was appointed, [1.] In order to the wickedness they and their fathers had been guilty of. The iniquity of the Amorites was now full, and the longer it had been in the filling, the sorer was the vengeance when it came at last. [2.] In order to prevent the mischiefs they would do to God's Israel, if they were left alive. The people of these abominations must not be mingled with the holy seed, lest they corrupt them. Better that all these lives should be lost from the earth, than that religion and the true worship of God should be lost in Israel. Thus we must deal with our lusts that war against our souls; God has delivered them into our hands by that promise, Sin shall not have dominion over you, unless it be your own faults; let not us then make covenants with them, or shew them any mercy, but mortify and crucify them, and utterly destroy them.

2. They must make no marriages with those of them that escaped the sword, v. 3, 4. The families of the Canaanites were ancient, and it is probable that some of them were called honourable, which might be a temptation to the Israelites, especially those of them that were of least note in their tribes, to court an alliance with them, to mend their blood, and the rather because their acquaintance with the country might be serviceable to them in the improvement of it; but religion, and the fear of God, must overrule all these considerations. To intermarry with them was therefore unlawful, because it was dangerous; this very thing had proved of fatal consequence to the old world, Gen. 6. 2. and thousands, in the world that now is, have been undone by irreligious ungodly marriages, for there is more ground of fear in mixed marriages that the good will be perverted, than of hopes that the bad will be converted. The event proved the reasonableness of this warning, They will turn away thy son from following me. Solomon paid dear for his folly herein. We find a national repentance for this sin of marrying strange wives, and care taken to reform, Ezra, 10, 19, &c. and Neh. 13. 23. and a New-Testament caution not to be unequally yoked with unbelievers, 2 Cor. 6. 14. Those that, in choosing yokefellows, keep not at least within the bounds of a justifiable profession of religion, cannot promise themselves helps meet for them. One of the Chaldee paraphrases adds here, as a reason of this command, v. 3. For he that marries with idolaters does in effect marry with their idols.

3. They must destroy all the relics of their idolatry, v. 5. Their altars and pillars, their groves and graven images, all must be destroyed; both in a holy indignation against idolatry, and to prevent infection. This command was given before, Exod. 23. 24.—34. 13. A great deal of good work of this kind was done by the people in their pious zeal, 2 Chron. 31. 1. and by good Josiah, 2 Chron. 34. 3, 7. and with this may be compared the burning of the conjuring books, Acts, 19. 19.

II. Here are very good reasons to enforce this caution.

1. The choice which God had made of this people for his own, v. 6. There was such a covenant and communion established between God and Israel, as was not between him and any other people in the world. Shall they by their idolatries dishonour him who had thus honoured them? Shall they slight him who had thus testified his kindness for them? Shall they put themselves upon the level with other people, when God had thus dignified and advanced them above all people? Had God taken them to be a special people to him, and no other but them, and will not they take God to be a special God to them, and no other but him?

2. The freeness of that grace, which made this choice. (1.) There was nothing in them to recommend or entitle them to this favour. In the multitude of the people is the king's honour, Prov. 14. 28. But their number was inconsiderable; they were only seventy souls when they went down into Egypt, and though greatly increased there, yet there were many other nations more numerous; Ye were the fewest of all people, v. 7. The author of the Jerusalem Targum passes too great a compliment upon his nation, in his reading this, Ye were humble in spirit, and meek above all people; quite contrary. They were rather stiff-necked, and ill-natured, above all people. (2.) God fetched the reason of it purely from himself, v. 8. [1.] He loved you, because he would love you. Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes. All that God loves, he loves freely, Hos. 14. 4. Those that perish, perish by their own merits, but all that are saved, are saved by prerogative. [2.] He has done his work, because he would keep his word. "He has brought you out of Egypt, in pursuance of the oath sworn to your fathers." Nothing in them, or done by them, did or could make God a debtor to them; but he had made himself a debtor to his own promise, which he would perform, notwithstanding their unworthiness.

3. The tenor of the covenant into which they were taken; it was in short this, That as they were to God, so God would be to them. They should certainly find him, (1.) Kind to his friends, v. 9. "The Lord thy God is not like the gods of the nations, the creatures of fancy, subjects fit enough for loose poetry, but no proper objects of serious devotion; no, he is God, God indeed, God alone, the faithful God, able and ready not only to fulfil his own promises, but to answer all the just expectations of his worshippers, and he will certainly keep covenant and mercy," that is, "shew mercy according to covenant, to them that love him, and keep his commandments;" (and in vain do we pretend to love him, if we do not make conscience of his commandments;) "and this," (as is here added for the explication of the promise in the second commandment,) "not only to thousands of persons, but to thousands of generations. So inexhaustible is the fountain, so constant the streams!" (2.) Just to his enemies; he repayeth them that hate him, v. 10. Note, [1.] Wilful sinners are haters of God; for the carnal mind is enmity against him. Idolaters are so in a special manner, for they are in league with his rivals. [2.] Those that hate God, cannot hurt him, but certainly ruin themselves. He will repay them to their face, in defiance of them and all their impotent malice. His arrows are said to be made ready against the face of them, Ps. 21. 12. Or, He will bring those judgments upon them, which shall appear to themselves to be the just punishment of their idolatry. Compare Job, 21. 19. He rewardeth him, and he shall know it. Though vengeance seem to be slow, yet it is not slack. The wicked and sinner shall be recompensed in the earth, Prov. 11. 31. I cannot pass the gloss of the Jerusalem Targum upon this place, because it speaks the faith of the Jewish church concerning a future state: He recompenses to them that hate him, the reward of their good works in this world, that he may destroy them in the world to come.

12. Wherefore it shall come to pass, if ye hearken to these judgments, and keep, and do them, that the LORD thy God shall keep unto thee the covenant and the mercy which he swore unto thy fathers: 13. And he will love thee, and bless thee, and multiply thee: he will also bless the fruit of thy womb, and the fruit of thy land, thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep, in the land which he swore unto thy fathers to give thee. 14. Thou shalt be blessed above all people: there shall not be male or female barren among you, or among your cattle. 15. And the LORD will take away from thee all sickness, and will put none of the evil diseases of Egypt, which thou knowest, upon thee; but will lay them upon all them that hate thee. 16. And thou shalt consume all the people which the LORD thy God shall deliver thee; thine eye shall have no pity upon them: neither shalt thou serve their gods; for that will be a snare unto thee. 17. If thou shalt say in thine heart, These nations are more than I; how can I dispossess them? 18. Thou shalt not be afraid of them; but shalt well remember what the LORD thy God did unto Pharaoh, and unto all Egypt; 19. The great temptations which thine eyes saw, and the signs, and the wonders, and the mighty hand, and the stretched-out arm, whereby the LORD thy God brought thee out: so shall the LORD thy God do unto all the people of whom thou art afraid. 20. Moreover the LORD thy God will send the hornet among them, until they that are left, and hide themselves from thee, be destroyed. 21. Thou shalt not be affrighted at them: for the LORD thy God is among you, a mighty God and terrible. 22. And the LORD thy God will put out those nations before thee by little and little: thou mayest not consume them at once, lest the beasts of the field increase upon thee. 23. But the LORD thy God shall deliver them unto thee, and shall destroy them with a mighty destruction, until they be destroyed. 24. And he shall deliver their kings into thine hand, and thou shalt destroy their name from under heaven: there shall no man be able to stand before thee, until thou have destroyed them. 25. The graven images of their gods shall ye burn with fire: thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them, nor take it unto thee, lest thou be snared therein: for it is an abomination to the LORD thy God. 26. Neither shalt thou bring an abomination into thine house, lest thou be a cursed thing like it: but thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it; for it is a cursed thing.

Here,

I. The caution against idolatry is repeated, and against communion with idolaters, v. 16. "Thou shalt consume the people, and not serve their gods." We are in danger of having fellowship with the works of darkness, if we take pleasure in fellowship with those that do those works. Here is also a repetition of the charge to destroy the images, v. 25, 26. The idols which the heathen had worshipped were an abomination to God, and therefore must be so to them: all that truly love God hate what he hates. Observe how this is urged upon them, Thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it: such a holy indignation as this must we conceive against sin, that abominable thing which the Lord hates. They must not retain the images, to gratify their covetousness: Thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them, nor think it pity to have that destroyed. Achan paid dear for converting that to his own use which was an anathema. Nor must they retain the images, to gratify their curiosity; "Neither shalt thou bring it into thine house, to be hung up as an ornament, or preserved as a monument of antiquity: No, to the fire with it, that is the fittest place for it." Two reasons are given for this caution: Lest thou be snared therein, v. 25. that is, "lest thou be drawn, ere thou art aware, to like it and love it, to fancy it, and pay respect to it; and, Lest thou be a cursed thing like it, v. 26. They that make images are said to be like unto them, stupid and senseless; here they are said to be, in a worse sense, like to them—accursed of God, and devoted to destruction. Compare these two reasons together, and observe, That whatever brings us into a snare brings us under a curse.

II. The promise of God's favour to them, if they would be obedient, is enlarged upon with a most affecting copiousness and fluency of expression, which intimates how much it is both God's desire, and our own interest, that we be religious. All possible assurance is here given them,

1. That, if they would sincerely endeavour to do their part of the covenant, God would certainly perform his part. He shall keep the mercy which he swore unto thy fathers, v. 12. Let us be constant to our duty, and we cannot question the constancy of God's mercy.

2. That, if they would love God, and serve him, and devote themselves and their's to him, he would love them, and bless them, and multiply them greatly, v. 13, 14. What could they desire more to make them happy? (1.) He will love thee. He began in love to us, 1 John, 4. 19. and if we return his love in filial duty, then, and then only, we may expect the continuance of it, John, 14. 21. (2.) He will bless thee with the tokens of his love above all people. If they would distinguish themselves from their neighbours by singular services, God would dignify them above their neighbours by singular blessings. (3.) He will multiply thee. Increase was the ancient blessing for the peopling of the world, once and again, Gen. 1. 28.—9. 1. and here for the peopling of Canaan, that little world by itself. The increase both of their families and of their stock is promised: They should neither have estates without heirs, nor heirs without estates, but should have the complete satisfaction of having many children, and plentiful provisions and portions for them.

3. That, if they would keep themselves pure from the idolatries of Egypt, God would keep them clear from the diseases of Egypt, v. 15. It seems to refer not only to those plagues of Egypt, by the force of which they were delivered, but to some other epidemical country disease, as we call it, which they remembered the prevalency of among the Egyptians, and by which God had chastised them for their national sins. Diseases are God's servants; they go where he sends them, and do what he bids them. It is therefore good for the health of our bodies, to mortify the sin of our souls.

4. That if they would cut off the devoted nations, they should cut them off, and none should be able to stand before them. Their duty in this matter would itself be their advantage. Thou shalt consume all the people which the Lord thy God shall deliver thee, that is the precept, v. 16. And then the Lord thy God shall deliver them unto thee, and shall destroy them, that is the promise, v. 23. Thus we are commanded not to let sin reign, not to indulge ourselves in it, or give countenance to it, but to hate it, and strive against it; and then God has promised that sin shall not have dominion over us, (Rom. 6. 12, 14.) but that we shall be more than conquerors over it.

The difficulty and doubtfulness of the conquest of Canaan having been a stone of stumbling to their fathers, he here animates them against those things which were most likely to discourage them, bidding them not to be afraid of them, v. 18. And again, v. 21.

(1.) Let them not be disheartened by the number and strength of their enemies. Say not, they are more than I, how can I dispossess them? v. 17. We are apt to think that the most numerous must needs be victorious: but to fortify them against this temptation, he reminds them of the destruction of Pharaoh and all the power of Egypt, v. 18, 19. They had seen the great temptations, or miracles, (so the Chaldee reads it,) the signs and wonders, wherewith God had brought them out of Egypt, in order to his bringing of them into Canaan, and from thence might easily infer, that God could dispossess the Canaanites, who, though formidable enough, had not such advantages against Israel as the Egyptians had; He that had done the greater, could do the lesser: and they might also infer, that he would dispossess them, otherwise his bringing Israel out of Egypt had been no kindness to them. He that begun, would finish. Thou shalt therefore well remember this, v. 18. The word and works of God are then well remembered, when they are improved as helps to our faith and obedience. This is well laid up, which is ready to us when we have occasion to use it.

(2.) Let them not be disheartened by the weakness and deficiency of their own forces; for God will send them in auxiliary troops of hornets, or wasps, as some read it, (v. 20.) probably, larger than ordinary, which would so terrify and molest their enemies, (and perhaps be the death of many of them,) that their most numerous armies would become an easy prey to Israel. God plagued the Egyptians with flies, but the Canaanites with hornets. Those who take not warning by lesser judgments on others, may expect greater on themselves. But their great encouragement was, that they had God among them, a mighty God and terrible, v. 21. And if God be for us, if God be with us, we need not fear the power of any creature against us.

(3.) Let them not be disheartened by the slow progress of their arms, nor think that the Canaanites would never be subdued, if they were not expelled the first year; no, they must be put out by little and little, and not all at once, v. 22. Note, We must not think, that because the deliverance of the church, and the destruction of its enemies are not effected immediately, therefore it will never be effected; God will do his own work in his own method and time; and we may be sure that they are always the best. Thus corruption is driven out of the hearts of believers by little and little. The work of sanctification is carried on gradually; but that judgment will at length be brought forth into a complete victory. The reason here given (as before, Exod. 23. 29, 30.) is, Lest the beast of the field increase upon thee. The earth God has given to the children of men; and therefore there shall rather be a remainder of Canaanites to keep possession till Israel become numerous enough to replenish it, than that it should be a habitation of dragons, and a court for the wild beasts of the desert, Isa. 34. 13, 14. Yet God could have prevented this mischief from the beasts, Lev. 26. 6. But pride and security, and other sins that are the common effects of a settled prosperity, were the enemies more dangerous than the beasts of the field, that would be apt to increase upon them. See judges 3. 1, 4.

CHAP. VIII.

Moses had charged parents in teaching their children, to whet the word of God upon them, (ch. 6. 7) by frequent repetition of the same things, over and over again; and here he himself takes the same method of instructing the Israelites, as his children; frequently inculcating the same precepts and cautions, with the same motives, or arguments, to enforce them; that what they heard so often, might abide with them. In this chapter Moses gives them, I. General exhortations to obedience, v. 1, 6. II. A review of the great things God had done for them in the wilderness, as a good argument for obedience, v. 2—5, and v. 15, 16. III. A prospect of the good land into which God would now bring them, v. 7—9. IV. A necessary caution against the temptations of a prosperous condition, v. 10—14, and 17, 18. V. A fair warning of the fatal consequences of apostasy from God, v. 19, 20.

1. ALL the commandments which I command thee this day shall ye observe to do, that ye may live, and multiply, and go in and possess the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers. 2. And thou shalt remember all the way which the LORD thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness, to humble thee, and to prove thee, to know what was in thine heart, whether thou wouldst keep his commandments, or no. 3. And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know, that he might make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the LORD doth man live. 4. Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years. 5. Thou shalt also consider in thine heart, that, as a man chasteneth his son, so the LORD thy God chasteneth thee. 6. Therefore thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to fear him. 7. For the LORD thy God bringeth thee into a good land, a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths that spring out of valleys and hills; 8. A land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig-trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil-olive, and honey; 9. A land wherein thou shalt eat bread without scarceness, thou shalt not lack any thing in it: a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass.

The charge here given them, is the same as before, to keep and do all God's commandments. Their obedience must be, 1. Careful, observe to do. 2. Universal, to do all the commandments, v. 1. And, 3. From a good principle, with a regard to God, as the Lord, and their God, and particularly with a holy fear of him, (v. 6.) from a reverence of his majesty, a submission to his authority, and a dread of his wrath.

To engage them to this obedience, beside the great advantages of it, which he sets before them, v. 1. That they should live and multiply, and all should be well with them; he directs them,

1. To look back upon the wilderness through which God had now brought them, (v. 2.) Thou shalt remember all the way which the Lord thy God led thee these forty years in the wilderness. Now that they were come of age, and were entering upon their inheritance, they must be reminded of the discipline they had been under during their minority, and the method God had taken to train them up for himself. The wilderness was the school in which they had been for forty years boarded and taught, under tutors and governors; and this was a time to bring it all to remembrance. The occurrences of these last forty years were, 1. Very memorable, and well worthy to be remembered. 2. Very useful and profitable to be remembered, as yielding a complication of arguments for obedience. And, 3. They were recorded on purpose that they might be remembered. As the feast of the passover was a memorial of their deliverance out of Egypt, so the feast of tabernacles was of their passage through the wilderness. Note, It is very good for us to remember all the ways both of God's providence and grace, by which he has led us hitherto through this wilderness, that we may be prevailed with cheerfully to serve him and trust in him. Here let us set up our Ebenezer.

(1.) They must remember the straits they were sometimes brought into; [1.] For the mortifying of their pride; it was to kumble them, that they might not be exalted above measure with the abundance of miracles that were wrought in their favour, and that they might not be secure, and confident of being in Canaan immediately. [2.] For the manifesting of their perverseness; to prove them, that they and others might know (for God himself perfectly knew it before) all that was in their heart, and might see that God chose them, not for any thing in them that might recommend them to his favour, for their whole carriage was untoward and provoking. Many commandments God gave them, which there had been no occasion for, if they had not been led through the wilderness, as those relating to the manna, (Exod. 16. 28.) and God thereby tried them, as our first parents were tried by the trees of the garden, whether they would keep God's commandments or not. Or, God thereby proved them, whether they would trust his promises, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations, and, in dependence on his promises, obey his precepts.

(2.) They must remember the supplies which were always granted them. God himself took particular care of their food, raiment, and health; and what would they have more?

[1.] They had manna for food, v. 3. God suffered them to hunger, and then fed them with manna, that the extremity of their want might make their supply the more acceptable, and God's goodness to them therein the more remarkable. God often brings his people low, that he might have the honour of helping them. And thus the manna of heavenly comforts is given to them that hunger and thirst after righteousness, Matth. 5. 6. To the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet. It is said of the manna, that it was a sort of food which neither they nor their fathers knew. And again, v. 16. If they knew there was such a thing that fell sometimes with the dew in those countries, as some think they did, yet it was never known to fall in such vast quantities, so constantly, and at all seasons of the year, so long, and only about a certain place. These things were altogether miraculous, and without precedent; The Lord created a new thing for their supply. And hereby he taught them, that man liveth not by bread alone; though God has appointed bread for the strengthening of man's heart, and that is ordinarily made the staff of life, yet God can, when he pleases, command support and nourishment without it, and make something else very unlikely to answer the intention as well. We might live upon air, if it were sanctified for that use by the word of God; for the means God ordinarily uses he is not tied to, but can perform his kind purposes to his people without them. Our Saviour quotes this scripture in answer to that temptation of Satan, Command that these stones be made bread. "What need of that?" says Christ, "my heavenly Father can keep me alive without bread," Matth. 4. 3, 4. Let none of God's children distrust their Father, nor take any sinful indirect course for the supply of their own necessities; some way or other, God will provide for them in the way of duty and honest diligence, and verily they shall be fed. It may be applied spiritually; the word of God, as it is the revelation of God's will and grace duly received, and entertained by faith, is the food of the soul; the life which is supported by that is the life of the man, and not only that life which is supported by bread. The manna typified

Christ, the bread of life. He is the Word of God; by him we live; the Lord evermore give us that bread which endures to eternal life, and let us not be put off with the meat that perisheth!

[2.] The same clothes served them from Egypt to Canaan; at least, the generality of them. Though they had not change of raiment, yet it was always new, and waxed not old upon them, v. 4. This was a standing miracle, and the greater, if, as the Jews say, they grew with them, so as to be always fit for them. But it is plain that they brought out of Egypt bundles of clothes on their shoulders, Exod. 12. 34. which they might barter with each other as there was occasion; and those, with what they wore, sufficed till they came into a country where they could furnish themselves with new clothes.

Now, by the method God took of providing food and raiment for them, First, He humbled them. It was a mortification to them to be tied for forty years together to the same meat, without any varieties, and to the same clothes, in the same fashion. Thus he taught them that the good things he designed for them were figures of better things: and that the happiness of man consists not in being clothed in purple or fine linen, and in farjng sumptuously every day, but in being taken into covenant and communion with God, and in learning his righteous judgments. God's law, which was given to Israel in the wilderness, must be to them instead of food and raiment. Secondly, He proved them, whether they could trust him to provide for them then, when means and second causes failed. Thus he taught them to live in a dependence upon Providence, and not to perplex themselves with care, what they should eat and drink, and wherewithal they should be clothed. Christ would have his disciples learn the same lesson, Matth. 6. 25. and took a like method to teach it them, when he sent them out without purse or scrip, and yet took care that they lacked nothing, Luke, 22. 35. Thirdly, God took care of their health and ease. Though they travelled on foot in a dry country, the way rough and untrodden, yet their feet swelled not: God preserved them from taking hurt by the inconveniencies of their journey; and mercies of that kind we ought to acknowledge. Note, Those that follow God's conduct are not only safe, but easy. Our feet swell not while we keep in the way of duty; it is the way of transgression that is hard, Prov. 13. 15. God has promised to keep the feet of his saints, 1 Sam. 2. 9.

(3.) They must also remember the rebukes they had been under, v. 5. During these years of their education, they had been kept under a strict discipline, and not without need. As a man chasteneth his son, for his good, and because he loves him, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee. God is a loving tender Father to all his children, yet when there is occasion they shall feel the smart of the rod. Israel did so, they were chastened that they might not be condemned; chastened with the rod of men. Not as a man wounds and slays his enemies, whose destruction he aims at, but as a man chastens his son, whose happiness and welfare he designs: So did their God chasten them; he chastened and taught them, Ps. 94. 12. This they must consider in their heart, that is, they must own it from their own experience, that God had corrected them with a fatherly love, for which they must return to him a filial reverence and compliance. Because God has chastened thee as a father, Therefore, v. 6. thou shalt keep his commandments. This use we should make of all our afflictions; by them let us be engaged and quickened to our duty. Thus they are directed to look back upon the wilderness.

II. He directs them to look forward to Canaan, into which God was now bringing them. Look which way we will, both our reviews and our prospects will furnish us with arguments for obedience. The land which they were now going to take possession of, is here described to be a very good land, v. 7. . 9. There was every thing in it that was desirable. 1. It was well-watered, like Eden the garden of the Lord. It was a land of brooks of water, of fountains and depths, which contributed to the fruitfulness of the soil. Perhaps there was more plenty of water there now than had been in Abraham's time, the Canaanites having found and digged wells; so that Israel reaped the fruit of their industry as well as of God's bounty. 2. The ground produced great plenty of all good things, not only for the necessary support, but for the convenience and comfort, of human life. In their father's land they had bread enough; it was corn land, and a land of wheat and barley, where, with the common care and labour of the husbandman, they might eat bread without scarceness. It was a fruitful land, that was never turned into barrenness but for the iniquity of them that dwelt therein. They had not only water enough to quench their thirst, but vines, the fruit whereof was ordained to make glad the heart. And if they were desirous of dainties, they needed not to send to far countries for them, when their own was so well stocked with fig-trees, and pomegranates, olives of the best kind, and honey, or date-trees, as some think it should be read. 3. Even the bowels of its earth were very rich, though it should seem that silver and gold they had none; of these the princes of Sheba should bring presents, Ps. 72. 15. yet they had plenty of those more serviceable metals, iron and brass. Ironstone, and mines of brass were found in their hills. See Job, 28. 2.

Now observe, These things are mentioned, (1.) To shew the great difference between that wilderness through which God had led them, and the good land into which he was bringing them. Note, Those that bear the inconveniences of an afflicted state with patience and submission, are humbled by them, and prove well under them, are best prepared for better circumstances. (2.) To shew what obligations they lay under to keep God's commandments, both in gratitude for his favours to them, and from a regard to their own interest, that the favours might be continued. The only way to keep possession of this good land would be to keep in the way of their duty. (3.) To shew what a figure it was of good things to come. Whatever others saw, it is probable that Moses in it saw a type of the better country: the gospel-church is the New-Testament Canaan, watered with the Spirit in his gifts and graces, planted with the trees of righteousness, bearing the fruits of righteousness. Heaven is the good land, in which there is nothing wanting, and where there is a fulness of joy.

10. When thou hast eaten and art full, then thou shalt bless the LORD thy God for the good land which he hath given thee. 11. Beware that thou forget not the LORD thy God, in not keeping his commandments, and his judgments, and his statutes, which I command thee this day: 12. Lest when thou hast eaten and art full, and hast built goodly houses, and dwelt therein; 13. And when thy herds and thy flocks multiply, and thy silver and thy gold is multiplied, and all that thou hast is multiplied; 14. Then thine heart be lifted up, and thou forget the LORD thy God, which brought thee forth out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage; 15. Who led thee through that great and terrible wilderness, wherein were fiery serpents, and scorpions, and drought, where there was no water; who brought thee forth water out of the rock of flint; 16. Who fed thee in the wilderness with manna, which thy fathers knew not, that he might humble thee, and that he might prove thee, to do thee good at thy latter end; 17. And thou say in thine heart, My power and the might of mine hand hath gotten me this wealth. 18. But thou shalt remember the LORD thy God: for it is he that giveth thee power to get wealth, that he may establish his covenant which he sware unto thy fathers, as it is this day. 19. And it shall be, if thou do at all forget the LORD thy God, and walk after other gods, and serve them, and worship them, I testify against you this day that ye shall surely perish. 20. As the nations which the LORD destroyeth before your face, so shall ye perish; because ye would not be obedient unto the voice of the LORD your God.

Moses having mentioned the great plenty they would find in the land of Canaan, finds it necessary to caution them against the abuse of that plenty, which is a sin they would be the more prone to, now that they came into that vineyard of the Lord, immediately out of a barren desert.

He directs them to the duty of a prosperous condition, v. 10. They are allowed to eat, even to fulness; not to surfeit or excess. But let them always remember their Benefactor, the Founder of their feast, and never fail to give thanks after meat, Then thou shalt bless the Lord thy God. 1. They must take heed of eating or drinking so much as to indispose themselves for this duty of blessing God, rather they must aim to serve God therein with so much the more cheerfulness and enlargement. 2. They must not have any fellowship with those that, when they had eaten and were full, blessed false gods, as the Israelites themselves had done in their worship of the golden calf, Exod. 32. 6. 3. Whatever they had the comfort of, God must have the glory of. As our Saviour has taught us to bless before we eat, Matth. 14. 19, 20. so we are here taught to bless after meat. That is our Hosannah, God bless; this is our Hallelujah, Blessed be God. In every thing we must give thanks. From this law the religious Jews took up a laudable usage of blessing God, not only at their solemn meals, but upon other occasions; if they drank of a cup of wine they lifted up their hands and said, Blessed be he that created the fruit of the vine to make glad the heart. If they did but smell at a flower, they said, Blessed be he that made this flower sweet. 4. When they gave thanks for the fruits of the land, they must give thanks for the good land itself, which was given them by promise. From all our comfortable enjoyments, we must take occasion to thank God for comfortable settlements; and I know not but we of this nation have as much reason as they had to give thanks for a good land.

II. He arms them against the temptations of a prosperous condition, and charges them to stand upon their guard against them; "When thou art settled in goodly houses of thy own building, v. 12. (for though God gave them houses which they builded not, ch. 6. 10. those would not serve them, they must have larger and finer,) and when thou art grown rich in cattle, in silver and in gold, v. 13. as Abraham, Gen. 13. 2. when all thou hast is multiplied,

1. "Then take heed of pride. Beware lest then thy heart be lifted up," v. 14. when the estate rises, the mind is apt to rise with it, in self-conceit, self-complacency, and self-confidence. Let us therefore strive to keep the spirit low in a high condition; humility is both the ease and the ornament of prosperity. Take heed of saying, so much as in thy heart, that proud word, My power and the might of my hand hath gotten me this wealth, v. 17. Note, We must never take the praise of our prosperity to ourselves, nor attribute it to our ingenuity or industry; for bread is not always to the wise, nor riches to men of understanding, Eccles. 9. 11. It is spiritual idolatry, thus to sacrifice to our own act, Hab. 1. 16.

2. "Then take heed of forgetting God." This follows upon the lifting up of the heart; for it is through the pride of the countenance that the wicked seeks not after God, Ps. 10. 4. Those that admire themselves, despise God.

(1.) "Forget not thy duty to God," v. 11. We forget God, if we keep not his commandments; we forget his authority over us, and our obligations to him, and expectations from him, if we are not obedient to his laws. When men grow rich, they are tempted to think religion a needless thing; they are happy without it; think it a thing below them, and too hard upon them; their dignity forbids them to stoop, and their liberty forbids them to serve,

But we are basely ungrateful, if, the better God is to us, the worse we are to him.

(2.) "Forget not God's former dealings with thee. Thy deliverance out of Egypt, v. 14. The provision he made for thee in the wilderness, that great and terrible wilderness;" they must never forget the impressions which the horror of that wilderness made upon them; see Jer. 2. 6. where it is called the very shadow of death. There God preserved them from being destroyed by the fiery serpents and scorpions, though sometimes he made use of them for their correction: there he kept them from perishing for want of water, following them with water out of a rock of flint, v. 15. Out of which (says Bishop Patrick) one would rather have expected fire than water. There he fed them with manna, of which before, v. 3. taking care to keep them alive, that he might do them good at their latter end, v. 16. Note, God reserves the best till the last for his Israel. However he may seem to deal hardly with them by the way, he will not fail to do them good at their latter end.

(3.) "Forget not God's hand in thy present prosperity, v. 18. Remember, it is he that giveth thee wealth; for he giveth thee power to get wealth." See here how God's giving and our getting are reconciled, and apply it to spiritual wealth. It is our duty to get wisdom, and above all our gettings to get understanding; and yet it is God's grace that gives wisdom, and, when we have got it, we must not say, It was the might of our hand that got it, but must own it was God that gave us power to get it, and therefore to him we must give the praise, and consecrate the use of it. The blessing of the Lord on the hand of the diligent makes rich, both for this world and for the other. He giveth thee power to get wealth, not so much to gratify thee, and make thee easy, as that he may establish his covenant. All God's gifts are in pursuance of his promises.

III. He repeats the fair warning he had often given them of the fatal consequences of their apostacy from God, v. 19, 20. Observe, 1. How he describes the sin; it is forgetting God, and then worshipping other gods. What wickedness will not they fall into, that keep thoughts of God out of their minds? And when once the affections are displaced from God, they will soon be misplaced upon lying vanities. 2. How he denounces wrath and ruin against them for it; "If you do so, ye shall surely perish, and the power and might of your hands, which you are so proud of, cannot help you. Nay, you shall perish, as the nations that are driven out before you. God will make no more account of you, notwithstanding his covenant with you, and your relation to him, than he does of them, if you will not be obedient and faithful to him." They that follow others in sin, will certainly follow them to destruction. If we do as sinners do, we must expect to fare as sinners fare.

CHAP. IX.

The design of Moses in this chapter, is, to convince the people of Israel of their utter unworthiness to receive from God those great favours that were now to be conferred upon them; writing this, as it were, in capital letters at the head of their charter, Not for your sake, be it known unto you, Ezek. 36. 32. I. He assures them of victory over their enemies, v. 1. 3. II. He cautions them not to attribute their successes to their own merit, but to God's justice, which was engaged against their enemies, and his faithfulness, which was engaged to their fathers, v. 4. 6. III. To make it evident that they do no reason to boast of their own righteousness, he mentions their faults, shews Israel their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins. In general, they had been all along a provoking people, v. 7. 24. In particular, 1. In the matter of the golden calf, the story of which he largely relates, v. 8. 21. 2. He mentions some other instances of their rebellion, v. 22 23. And, 3. Returns, at v. 25. to speak of the intercession he had made for them at Horeb, to prevent their being ruined for the golden calf.

1. HEAR, O Israel: Thou art to pass over Jordan this day, to go in to possess nations greater and mightier than thyself, cities great and fenced up to heaven. 2. A people great and tall, the children of the Anakims, whom thou knowest, and of whom thou hast heard say, Who can stand before the children of Anak! 3. Understand therefore this day, that the LORD thy God is he which goeth over before thee; as a consuming fire he shall destroy them, and he shall bring them down before thy face: so shalt thou drive them out, and destroy them quickly, as the LORD hath said unto thee. 4. Speak not thou in thine heart, after that the LORD thy God hath cast them out from before thee, saying, For my righteousness the LORD hath brought me in to possess this land: but for the wickedness of these nations the LORD doth drive them out from before thee. 5. Not for thy righteousness, or for the uprightness of thine heart, dost thou go to possess their land: but for the wickedness of these nations the LORD thy God doth drive them out from before thee, and that he may perform the word which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. 6. Understand therefore, that the LORD thy God giveth thee not this good land to possess it for thy righteousness; for thou art a stiff-necked people.

The call to attention, v. 1. Hear, O Israel, intimates that this was a new discourse, delivered at some distance of time after the former, probably the next sabbath-day.

I. He represents to them the formidable strength of the enemies which they were now to encounter, v. 1. The nations they were to dispossess were mightier than themselves, not a rude and undisciplined rout, like the natives of America, that were easily made a prey of. But, should they besiege them, they would find their cities well fortified, according as the art of fortification then was; should they engage them in the field, they would find the people great and tall, of whom common fame had reported, that there was no standing before them, v. 2. This representation is much the same with that which the evil spies had made, Numb. 13. 28, 33 but made with a very different intention: that was designed to drive them from God, and to discourage their hope in him; this to drive them to God, and engage their hope in him; since no power, less than that which is almighty, could secure and succeed them.

II. He assures them of victory, by the presence of God with them, notwithstanding the strength of the enemy, v. 3. "Understand therefore what thou must trust to for success, and which way thou must look; it is the Lord thy God that goes before thee, not only as thy Captain, or Commander in chief, to give direction, but as a consuming fire, to do execution among them. Observe, He shall destroy them, and then thou shalt drive them out. Thou canst not drive them out, unless he destroy them, and bring them down. But he will not destroy them, and bring them down, unless thou set thyself in good earnest to drive them out." We must do our endeavour in dependence upon God's grace, and we shall have that grace, if we do our endeavour.

III. He cautions them not to entertain the least thought of their own righteousness, as if that had procured them this favour at God's hand. "Say not, For my righteousness, either with regard to my good character, or in recompence for any good service; the Lord hath brought me in to possess this land, v. 4. never think it is for thy righteousness, or the uprightness of thy heart, that it is for and in consideration either of thy good conversation, or of thy good disposition," v. 5. And again, v. 6. it is insisted on, because it is hard to bring people from a conceit of their own merit, and yet very necessary that it be done. "Understand, know it, and believe it, and consider it, that the Lord thy God giveth thee not this good land for thy righteousness. Hadst thou been to come to it upon that condition, thou hadst been for ever shut out of it. for thou art a stiff-necked people. Note, Our gaining possession of the heavenly Canaan, as it must be attributed to God's power, and not to our own might, so it must be ascribed to God's grace, and not to our own merit: in Christ we have both righteousness and strength; in him therefore we must glory, and not in ourselves, or any sufficiency of our own.

IV. He intimates to them the true reasons why God would take this good land out of the hands of the Canaanites, and settle it upon Israel, and they are borrowed from his own honour, not from Israel's deserts. 1. He will be honoured in the destruction of idolaters; they are justly looked upon as haters of him, and therefore he will visit their iniquity upon them. It is for the wickedness of these nations that God drives them out, v. 4. and again, v. 5. All those whom God rejects, are rejected for their own wickedness; but none of those whom he accepts, are accepted for their own righteousness. 2. He will be honoured in the performance of his promise to those that are in covenant with him: God sware to the patriarchs who loved him, and left all to follow him, that he would give this land to their seed; and therefore he would keep that promised mercy for thousands of them that loved him and kept his commandments; he would not suffer his promise to fail. It was for their fathers' sakes that they were beloved, Rom. 11. 28. Thus boasting is for ever excluded. See Eph. 1. 9, 11.

7. Remember, and forget not, how thou provokedst the LORD thy God to wrath in the wilderness: from the day that thou didst depart out of the land of Egypt, until ye came unto this place, ye have been rebellious against the LORD. 8. Also in Horeb ye provoked the LORD to wrath, so that the LORD was angry with you to have destroyed you. 9. When I was gone up into the mount to receive the tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant which the LORD made with you, then I abode in the mount forty days and forty nights, I neither did eat bread nor drink water: 10. And the LORD delivered unto me two tables of stone written with the finger of God; and on them was written according to all the words, which the LORD spake with you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly. 11. And it came to pass at the end of forty days and forty nights, that the LORD gave me the two tables of stone, even the tables of the covenant. 12. And the LORD said unto me, Arise, get thee down quickly from hence; for thy people which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt have corrupted themselves; they are quickly turned aside out of the way which I commanded them; they have made them a molten image. 13. Furthermore the LORD spake unto me, saying, I have seen this people, and, behold, it is a stiff-necked people: 14. Let me alone, that I may destroy them, and blot out their name from under heaven: and I will make of thee a nation mightier and greater than they. 15. So I turned and came down from the mount, and the mount burned with fire: and the two tables of the covenant were in my two hands. 16. And I looked, and, behold, ye had sinned against the LORD your God, and had made you a molten calf: ye had turned aside quickly out of the way which the LORD had commanded you. 17. And I took the two tables, and cast them out of my two hands, and brake them before your eyes. 18. And I fell down before the LORD, as at the first, forty days and forty nights: I did neither eat bread, nor drink water, because of all your sins which ye sinned, in doing wickedly in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger. 19. For I was afraid of the anger and hot displeasure, wherewith the LORD was wroth against you to destroy you. But the LORD hearkened unto me at that time also. 20. And the LORD was very angry with Aaron to have destroyed him: and I prayed for Aaron also the same time. 21. And I took your sin, the calf which ye had made, and burnt it with fire, and stamped it, and ground it very small, even until it was as small as dust: and I cast the dust thereof into the brook that descended out of the mount. 22. And at Taberah, and at Massah, and at Kibroth-hattaavah, ye provoked the LORD to wrath. 23. Likewise when the LORD sent you from Kadesh-barnea, saying, Go up and possess the land which I have given you; then ye rebelled against the commandment of the LORD your God, and ye believed him not, nor hearkened to his voice. 24. Ye have been rebellious against the LORD from the day that I knew you. 25. Thus I fell down before the LORD forty days and forty nights, as I fell down at the first; because the LORD had said he would destroy you. 26. I prayed therefore unto the LORD, and said, O Lord GOD, destroy not thy people and thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed through thy greatness, which thou hast brought forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand. 27. Remember thy servants, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; look not unto the stubbornness of this people, nor to their wickedness, nor to their sin: 28. Lest the land whence thou broughtest us out say, Because the LORD was not able to bring them into the land which he promised them, and because he hated them, he hath brought them out to slay them in the wilderness. 29. Yet they are thy people and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest out by thy mighty power and by thy stretched-out arm.

That they might have no pretence to think that God brought them to Canaan for their righteousness, he here shews them what a miracle of mercy it was, that they had not long ere this been destroyed in the wilderness; "Remember, and forget not, how thou provokedst the Lord thy God, v. 7. so far from purchasing his favour, that thou hast many a time laid thyself open to his displeasure." Their fathers' provocations are here charged upon them; for, if God had dealt with their fathers according to their deserts, this generation had never been, much less had they entered Canaan. We are apt to forget our provocations, especially when the smart of the rod is over, and have need to be need put in mind of them, that we may never entertain any conceit of our own righteousness. St. Paul argues from the guilt which all mankind is under, to prove that we cannot be justified before God by our own works, Rom. 3. 19, 20. If our works condemn us, they will not justify us.

1. They had been a provoking people ever since they came out of Egypt, v. 7. Forty years long, from first to last, were God and Moses grieved with them. It is a very sad character Moses now at parting leaves of them, v. 24. Ye have been rebellious since the day I knew you. No sooner were they formed into a people, than there was a faction formed among them, which upon all occasions made head against God and his government. Though the Mosaic history records little more than the occurrences of the first and last year of the forty, yet it seems, by this general account, that the rest of the years were not much better, but one continued provocation.

2. Even in Horeb they made a calf and worshipped it, v. 8, &c. That was a sin so heinous, and by several aggravations made so exceeding sinful, that they deserved upon all occasions to be upbraided with it. It was done in the very place where the law was given, by which they were expressly forbidden to worship God by images; and while the mountain was yet burning before their eyes, and Moses was gone up to fetch them the law in writing; they turned aside quickly, v. 16.

3. God was very angry with them for their sin. Let them not think that God overlooked what they did amiss, and gave them Canaan for what was good among them. No, God had determined to destroy them, v. 8. could easily have done it, and had been no loser by it; he even desired Moses to let him alone, that he might do it, v. 13, 14. By this it appeared how heinous their sin was, for God is never angry with any above what there is cause for, as men often are. Moses himself, though a friend and favourite, trembled at the revelation of God's wrath from heaven, against their ungodliness and unrighteousness, v. 19. I was afraid of the anger of the Lord; afraid perhaps not for them only, but for himself, Ps. 119. 120.

4. They had by their sin broken covenant with God, and forfeited all the privileges of the covenant, which Moses signified to them by breaking the tables, v. 17. A bill of divorce was given them, and from thenceforward they might justly have been abandoned for ever; so that their mouth was certainly stopped from pleading any righteousness of their own. God had, in effect, disowned them, when he said to Moses, v. 12. "They are thy people, they are none of mine, nor shall they be dealt with as mine."

5. Aaron himself fell under God's displeasure for it, though he was the saint of the Lord, and was only brought by surprise or terror to be confederate with them in the sin, v. 20. The Lord was very angry with Aaron. No man's place or character can shelter him from the wrath of God, if he have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness. Aaron, that should have made atonement for them, if the iniquity could have been purged away by sacrifice and offering, did himself fall under the wrath of God; so little did they consider what they did, when they drew him in.

6. It was with great difficulty, and very long attendance, that Moses himself prevailed to turn away the wrath of God, and prevent their utter ruin. He fasted and prayed full forty days and forty nights, before he could obtain their pardon, v. 18. And some think twice forty days, v. 25. Because it is said, "As I fell down before," whereas his errand, in the first forty, was not of that nature. Others think, it was but one forty, though twice mentioned, and again, ch. 10. 10. But that was enough to make them sensible how great God's displeasure was against them, and what a narrow escape they had for their lives. And in this appears the greatness of God's anger against all mankind, that no less a person than his Son, and no less a price than his own blood, would serve to turn it away. Moses here tells them the substance of his intercession for them. He was obliged to own their stubbornness, and their wickedness and their sin, v. 27.

Their character was bad indeed, when he that appeared an advocate for them could not give them a good word; and had nothing else to say in their behalf, but that God had done great things for them, which really did but aggravate their crime, v. 26. that they were the posterity of good ancestors, v. 27. which might also have been turned upon him, as making the matter worse, and not better; and that the Egyptians would reproach God if he should destroy them, as unable to perfect what he wrought for them, v. 28. a plea which might easily enough have been answered: No matter what the Egyptians say, while the heavens declare God's righteousness. So that the saving of them from ruin, at that time, was owing purely to the mercy of God, and the impertinuity of Moses, and not to any merit of their's, that could be offered so much as in mitigation of their offence.

7. To affect them the more with the destruction they were then at the brink of, he describes the destruction of the calf they had made, very particularly, v. 21. He calls it their sin: perhaps, not only because it had been the matter of their sin; but because the destroying of it was intended for a testimony against their sin; and an indication to them what the sinners themselves did deserve. They that made it were like unto it, and had no wrong done them, if they had been thus stamped to dust, and consumed, and scattered, and no remains of them left. It was infinite mercy that accepted the destruction of the idol, instead of the destruction of the idolaters.

8. Even after this fair escape that they had, in many other instances they provoked the Lord again and again. He needed only to name the place, for they carried the memorials either of the sin or the punishment in their names, v. 22. at Taberah, burning, where God set fire to them for their murmuring; at Massah, the temptation, where they challenged almighty power to help them; and at Kibroth-hattaavah, the graves of lustres, where the dainties they coveted were their poison. And, after these, their unbelief and distrust at Kadesh-barnea, which he had already told them of, ch. 1. and here mentions again, v. 23. had certainly completed their ruin, if they had been dealt with according to their own merits.

Now let them lay all this together, and it will appear, that whatever favour God should hereafter shew them, in subduing their enemies, and putting them in possession of the land of Canaan, it was not for their righteousness. It is good for us often to remember against ourselves, with sorrow and shame, our former sins, and to review the records conscience keeps of them, that we may see how much we are indebted to free grace, and may humbly own that we never merited at God's hand any thing but wrath and the curse.

CHAP. X.

Moses having, in the foregoing chapter, minded them of their own sin, as a reason why they should not depend upon their own righteousness, in this chapter sets before them God's great mercy to them, notwithstanding their provocations, as a reason why they should be more obedient for the future. I. He mentions divers tokens of God's favour and reconciliation to them, never to be forgotten. (1.) The renewing of the tables of the covenant, v. 1, 5. (2.) Giving orders for their progress toward Canaan, v. 6, 7. (3.) Choosing the tribe of Levi for his own, v. 8, 9. (4.) And continuing the priesthood after the death of Aaron, v. 6. (5.) Owning and accepting the intercession of Moses for them, v. 10, 11. II. From hence he infers what obligations they lay under to fear, and love, and serve God, which he presses upon them with many motives, v. 12. .22.

1 AT that time the Lord said unto me, Hew thee two tables of stone like unto the first, and come up unto me into the mount, and make thee an ark of wood. 2. And I will write on the tables the words that were in the first tables which thou brakest, and thou shalt put them in the ark. 3. And I made an ark of shittim-wood, and hewed two tables of stone like unto the first, and went up into the mount, having the two tables in mine hand. 4. And he wrote on the tables, according to the first writing, the ten commandments, which the LORD spake unto you in the mount out of the midst of the fire in the day of the assembly: and the LORD gave them unto me. 5. And I turned myself and came down from the mount, and put the tables in the ark which I had made; and there they be, as the LORD commanded me. 6. And the children of Israel took their journey from Beeroth of the children of Jaakan to Mosera: there Aaron died, and there he was buried; and Eleazar his son ministered in the priest's office in his stead. 7. From thence they journeyed unto Gudgodah; and from Gudgodah to Jolbath, a land of rivers of waters. 8. At that time the LORD separated the tribe of Levi, to bear the ark of the covenant of the LORD, to stand before the LORD to minister unto him, and to bless in his name, unto this day. 9. Wherefore Levi hath no part nor inheritance with his brethren; the LORD is his inheritance, according as the LORD thy God promised him. 10. And I stayed in the mount, according to the first time, forty days and forty nights; and the LORD hearkened unto me at that time also, and the LORD would not destroy thee. 11. And the LORD said unto me, Arise, take thy journey before the people, that they may go in and possess the land, which I swore unto their fathers to give unto them.

There were four things in and by which God shewed himself reconciled to Israel, and made them truly great and happy; and in which God's goodness took occasion from their badness to make himself the more illustrious.

I. He gave them his law; gave it to them in writing, as a standing pledge of his favour. Though the tables that were first written were broken, because they had broken the commandments, and God might justly break the covenant, yet, when his anger was turned away, the tables were renewed, v. 1, 2. Note, God's putting his law in our hearts, and writing it in our inward parts, is the surest evidence of our reconciliation to God, and the best earnest of our happiness in him. Moses is bid to hew the tables; for the law prepares the heart, by conviction and humiliation, for the grace of God, but it is only that grace that then writes the law in it. Moses made an ark of shittim-wood, v. 3. a plain chest, the same, I suppose, in which the tables were afterward preserved: but Bezaleel is said to make it, Exod. 37. 1. because he afterward finished it up, and overlaid it with gold. Or, Moses is said to make it, because, when he went up the second time into the mount, he ordered it to be made by Bezaleel, against he came down. And it is observable, that for this reason the ark was the first thing that God gave orders about, Exod. 25. 10. And this left an earnest to the congregation, that the tables should not miscarry this second time, as they had done the first. God will send his law and gospel to those whose hearts are prepared as arks to receive them. Christ is the Ark in which now our salvation is kept safe, that it may not be lost, as it was in the first Adam, when he had it in his own hand.

Observe, 1. What it was that God wrote on the two tables; the ten commandments, v. 4. or ten words; intimating in how little a compass they were contained: they were not ten volumes, but ten words: it was the same with the first writing, and both the same that he spoke in the mount. The second edition needed no correction or amendment: nor did what he wrote differ from what he spoke: the written word is as truly the word of God, as that which he spake to his servants the prophets. 2. What care was taken of it. These two tables, thus engraven, were faithfully laid up in the ark. And there they be, said Moses, pointing, it is probable, towards the sanctuary, v. 5. That good thing which was committed to him he transmitted them, and left it pure and entire in their hands; now let them look to it, at their peril. Thus we may say to the rising generation, "God has intrusted us with Bibles, sabbaths, sacraments, &c. as tokens of his presence and favour, and there they be; we lodge them with you." 2 Tim. 1. 13, 14.

II. He led them forward toward Canaan. Though they in their hearts turned back toward Egypt, and he might justly have chosen their delusions, v. 6, 7. he brought them to a land of rivers of water, out of a dry and barren wilderness: when that failed, then by miracles; and yet, after this, when they were brought into a little distress, we find them distrusting God, and murmuring, Num. 20. 3, 4.

III. He appointed a standing ministry among them, to deal for them in holy things. At that time, when Moses went up a second time to the mount, or soon after, he had orders to separate the tribe of Levi to God, and to his immediate service, they having distinguished themselves by their zeal against the worshippers of the golden calf, v. 8, 9. The Kohathites carried the ark; they and other Levites stood before the Lord, to minister to him in all the offices of the tabernacle; and the priests, who were of that tribe, were to bless the people. This was a standing ordinance, which had now continued almost forty years, even unto this day; and provision was made for the perpetuating of it, by the settled maintenance of that tribe, which was such as gave them great encouragement in their work, and no diversion from it. The Lord is his inheritance. Note, A settled ministry is a great blessing to a people, and a special token of God's favour. And since the particular priests could not continue, by reason of death, God shewed his care of the people in securing a succession, which Moses takes notice of here, v. 6. When Aaron died, the priesthood did not die with him, but Eleazar his son ministered in his stead, and took care of the ark, in which the tables of stone, those precious stones, were deposited, that they should suffer no damage; there they be, and he has the custody of them. Under the law, a succession in the ministry was kept up, by an entail of the office on a certain tribe and family. But now, under the gospel, when the effusion of the Spirit is more plentiful and powerful, the succession is kept up by the Spirit's operation on men's hearts, qualifying men for, and inclining men to, that work—some in every age, that the name of Israel may not be blotted out.

IV. He accepted Moses as an advocate or intercessor for them, and therefore constituted him their prince and leader, v. 10, 11. The Lord hearkened to me, and said, Arise, go before the people. It was a mercy to them, that they had such a friend, so faithful both to him that appointed him, and to them for whom he was appointed. It was fit, that he, who had saved them from ruin, by his intercession with Heaven, should have the conduct and command of them. And herein he was a type of Christ, who, as he ever lives, making intercession for us, so he has all power both in heaven and in earth.

12. And now, Israel, what doth the LORD thy God require of thee, but to fear the LORD thy God, to walk in all his ways, and to love him, and to serve the LORD thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, 13. To keep the commandments of the LORD, and his statutes, which I command thee this day for thy good? 14. Behold, the heaven and the heaven of heavens is the LORD's thy God, the earth also, with all that therein is. 15. Only the LORD had a delight in thy fathers to love them, and he chose their seed after them, even you above all people, as it is this day. 16. Circumcise therefore the foreskin of your heart, and be no more stiff-necked. 17. For the LORD your God is God of gods, and Lord of lords, a great God, a mighty, and terrible, which regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward: 18. He doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow, and loveth the stranger, in giving him food and raiment. 19. Love ye therefore the stranger: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt. 20. Thou shalt fear the LORD thy God; him shalt thou serve, and to him shalt thou cleave, and swear by his name. 21. He is thy praise, and he is thy God, that hath done for thee these great and terrible things, which thine eyes have seen. 22. Thy fathers went down into Egypt with threescore and ten persons; and now the LORD thy God hath made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude.

Here is a most pathetic exhortation to obedience, inferred from the premises, and urged with very powerful arguments, and a great deal of persuasive rhetoric. He brings it in like an orator, with an appeal to his auditors, And now, Israel, what doth the Lord thy God require of thee? v. 12. Ask what he requires; as David, Ps. 116. 12. What shall I render? When we have received mercy from God, it becomes us to inquire what returns we shall make to him. Consider what he requires, and you will find it is nothing but what is highly just and reasonable in itself, and of unspeakable benefit and advantage to you. Let us see here what he does require, and what abundant reason there is why we should do what he requires.

I. We are here most plainly directed in our duty, both to God, to our neighbour, and to ourselves.

1. We are here taught our duty to God, both in the dispositions and affections of our souls, and in the actions of our lives, our principles, and our practices. (1.) We must fear the Lord our God, v. 12. And again, v. 20. We must adore his majesty, acknowledge his authority, stand in awe of his power, and dread his wrath. This is gospel-duty, Rev. 14. 6, 7. (2.) We must love him, be well pleased that he is, desire that he may be, our's, and delight in the contemplation of him, and in communion with him. Fear him as a great God, and our Lord, love him as a good God, and our Father and Benefactor. (3.) We must walk in his ways, that is, the ways which he has appointed us to walk in. The whole course of our conversation must be conformable to his holy will. (4.) We must serve him, v. 20; serve him with all our heart and soul, v. 12. devote ourselves to his honour, put ourselves under his government, and lay out ourselves to advance all the interests of his kingdom among men. And we must be hearty and zealous in his service, engage and employ our inward man in his work, and what we do for him we must do cheerfully, and with a good will. (5.) We must keep his commandments and his statutes, v. 13. Having given up ourselves to his service, we must make his revealed will our rule in every thing; perform all he prescribes; forbear all he forbids; firmly believing that all the statutes he commands us are for our good. Beside the reward of obedience which will be our unspeakable gain, there is true honour and pleasure in obedience. It is really for our present good to be meek and humble, chaste and sober, just and charitable, patient and contented; these make us easy, and safe, and pleasant, and truly great. (6.) We must give honour to God, in swearing by his name, v. 20. so give him the honour of his omniscience, his sovereignty, his justice, as well as of his necessary existence. Swear by his name, and not by the name of any creature, or false god, whenever an oath for confirmation is called for. (7.) To him we must cleave, v. 20. Having chosen him for our God, we must faithfully and constantly abide with him, and never forsake him. Cleave to him as one we love and delight in, trust and confide in, and from whom we have great expectations.

2. We are here taught our duty to our neighbour, v. 19. Love ye the stranger. And if the stranger, much more our brethren, as ourselves. If the Israelites, that were such a peculiar people, so particularly distinguished from all people, must be kind to strangers, much more must we, that are not enclosed in such a pale; we must have a tender concern for all that share with us in the human nature, and, as we have opportunity, that is, according to their necessities and our abilities, we must do good unto all men. Two arguments are here urged to enforce this duty. (1.) God's common providence, which extends itself to all nations of men, they being all made of one blood. God loveth the stranger, v. 18. that is, he gives to all life, and breath, and all things, even to those that are Gentiles, and strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, and to Israel's God. He knows those perfectly whom we know nothing of. He gives food and raiment even to those to whom he has not shewed his word and statutes. God's common gifts to mankind oblige us to honour all men. Or, it denotes the particular care which Providence takes of strangers in distress, which we ought to praise him for, (Ps. 146. 9. The Lord preserveth the strangers,) and to imitate him, to serve him, and concur with him, therein, being forward to make ourselves instruments in his hand of kindness to strangers. (2.) The afflicted condition which the Israelites themselves had been in, when they were strangers in Egypt. They that have themselves been in distress, and have found mercy with God, should sympathize most feelingly with those that are in the like distress, and be ready to shew kindness to them. The people of the Jews, notwithstanding these repeated commands given them to be kind to strangers, conceived a rooted antipathy to the Gentiles, whom they looked upon with the utmost disdain, which made them envy them the grace of God, and the gospel of Christ, and that brought a final ruin upon themselves.

3. We are here taught our duty to ourselves, v. 16. Circumcise the foreskin of your hearts, that is, "Cast away from you all corrupt affections and inclinations which hinder you from fearing and loving God. Mortify the flesh, with the lusts of it. Away with all filthiness and superfluity of naughtiness, which obstruct the free course of the word of God to your hearts. Rest not in the circumcision of the body, which was only the sign, but be circumcised in heart, which is the thing signified." See Rom. 2. 29. The command of Christ goes further than this, and obliges us not only to cut off the foreskin of the heart, which may easily be spared, but to cut off the right hand, and to pluck out the right eye, that is an offence to us: the more spiritual the dispensation is, the more spiritual we are obliged to be, and to go the closer in mortifying sin. And be no more stiff-necked, as they had been hitherto, ch. 9. 24. "Be not any longer obstinate against divine commands and corrections, but ready to comply with the will of God in both." The circumcision of the heart makes it ready to yield to God, and draw in his yoke.

II. We are here most pathetically persuaded to our duty. Let but reason rule us, and religion will.

1. Consider the greatness and glory of God, and therefore fear him, and from that principle serve and obey him. What is it that is thought to make a man great, but great honour, power, and possessions? Think then how great the Lord our God is, and greatly to be feared. (1.) He has great honour, a name above every name, v. 17. He is God of gods, and Lord of lords. Angels are called gods, so are magistrates, and the Gentiles had gods many, and lords many, the creatures of their own fancy, but God is infinitely above all these nominal deities. What an absurdity would it be for them to worship other gods, when the God to whom they had sworn allegiance was the God of gods! (2.) He has great power. He is a mighty God and terrible, (v.17.) which regardeth not persons. He has the power of a conqueror, and so he is terrible to those that resist him and rebel against him. He has the power of a judge, and so he is just to all those that appeal to him, or appear before him. And it is as much the greatness and honour of a judge to be impartial in his justice, without respect to persons or bribes, as it is to a general to be terrible to the enemy. Our God is both. (3.) He has great possessions. Heaven and earth are his, v.14. and all the hosts and stars of both. Therefore he is able to bear us out in his service, and to make up the losses we sustain in discharging our duty to him. And yet therefore he has no need of us, or any thing we have, or can do; we are undone without him; but he is happy without us; which makes the condescensions of his grace, in accepting us and our services, truly admirable. Heaven and earth are his possession, and yet the Lord's portion is his people.

2. Consider the goodness and grace of God, and therefore love him, and from that principle serve and obey him. His goodness is his glory, as much as his greatness.

(1.) He is good to all. Whomsoever he finds miserable, to them he will be found merciful, v.18. He executes the judgment of the fatherless and widow. It is his honour to help the helpless, and to succour those that most need relief, and that men are apt to do injury to, or at least to put a slight upon. See Ps. 68. 4, 5.---146. 7, 9.

(2.) But truly God is good to Israel, in a special manner, and therefore they are under special obligations to him. "He is thy praise, and he is thy God, v.21. Therefore love him and serve him, because of the relation wherein he stands to thee. He is thy God, a God in covenant with thee, and as such he is thy praise," that is, (1.) "He puts honour upon thee; he is the God in whom, all the day long, thou mayest boast that thou knowest him, and art known of him. If he be thy God, he is thy glory." (2.) "He expects honour from thee. He is thy praise," that is, "he is the God whom thou art bound to praise; if he has not praise from thee, whence may he expect it?" He inhabits the praises of Israel.

Consider, [1.] The gracious choice he made of Israel, v.15. "He had a delight in thy fathers, and therefore chose thy seed." Not that there was any thing in them to merit his favour, or to recommend them to it, but so it seemed good in his eyes. He would be kind to them, though he had no need of them. [2.] The great things he had done for Israel, v.21, 22. He reminds them not only of what they had heard with their ears, and which their fathers had told them of, but of what they had seen with their eyes, and which they must tell their children of; particularly, that within a few generations seventy souls (for there were no more when Jacob went down into Egypt) increased to a great nation, as the stars of heaven for multitude. And the more they were in number, the more praise and service God expected from them; yet it proved, as in the old world, that, when they began to multiply, they corrupted themselves.

CHAP. XI.

With this chapter Moses concludes his preface to the repetition of the statutes and judgments which they must observe to do. He repeats the general charge, v.1. and having, in the close of the foregoing chapter, begun to mention the great things God had done among them, in this, 1. He specifies several of the great works God had done before their eyes, v.2. 7. II. He sets before them, for the future, life and death, the blessing and the curse, according as they did or did not keep God's commandments. That they should certainly prosper if they were obedient, should be blessed with plenty of all good things, v.8. 15. and with victory over their enemies, and the enlargement of their coast thereby, v.22. 25. But their disobedience would undoubtedly be their ruin, v.16, 17. III. He directs them what means to use, that they might keep in mind the but of God, v.18. 21. And, IV. Concludes all with solemnly charging them to choose which they would have, the blessing or the curse, v.26. 32.

1. THEREFORE thou shalt love the LORD thy God, and keep his charge, and his statutes, and his judgments, and his commandments, alway. 2. And know ye this day: for I speak not with your children which have not known, and which have not seen the chastisement of the LORD your God, his greatness, his mighty hand, and his stretched-out arm, 3. And his miracles, and his acts, which he did in the midst of Egypt unto Pharaoh the king of Egypt, and unto all his land; 4. And what he did unto the army of Egypt, unto their horses, and to their chariots: how he made the water of the Red sea to overflow them as they pursued after you, and how the LORD hath destroyed them unto this day; 5. And what he did unto you in the wilderness, until ye came into this place; 6. And what he did unto Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab, the son of Reuben: how the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their households, and their tents, and all the substance that was in their possession, in the midst of all Israel: 7. But your eyes have seen all the great acts of the LORD which he did.

Because God has made thee as the stars of heaven for multitude, so the chapter before concludes; therefore thou shalt love the LORD thy God, so this begins. Those whom God has built up into families, whose beginning was small, but whose latter end greatly increases, should use that as an argument with themselves, why they should serve God. Thou shalt keep his charge, that is, the oracles of his word, and ordinances of his worship, with which they were intrusted, and for which they were accountable. It is a phrase often used concerning the office of the priests and Levites, for all Israel was a kingdom of priests, a holy nation. Observe the connection of these two: Thou shalt love the Lord, and keep his charge: since love will work in obedience, and that only is acceptable obedience which flows from a principle of love, 1 John, 5.3.

He goes on to mention divers of the great and terrible works of God, which their eyes had seen, v.7. This part of his discourse he addresses to the seniors among them, the elders in age; and, probably, the elders in office were so, and were now his immediate auditors: there were some among them that could remember their deliverance out of Egypt, all above fifty, and to them he speaks this, not to the children, who knew it by hearsay only, v.2. Note, God's mercies to us when we were young, we should remember and retain the impressions of when we are old; what our eyes have seen, especially in our early days, has affected us, and should be improved by us long after.

They had seen what terrible judgments God had executed upon the enemies of Israel's peace; 1. Upon Pharaoh and the Egyptians, that enslaved them. What a fine country was ruined and laid waste by one plague after another, to force Israel's enlargement! v.3. What a fine army was entirely drowned in the Red sea, to prevent Israel's being re-enslaved! v.4. Thus did he give Egypt for their ransom, Isa. 43.3. Rather shall that famous kingdom be destroyed, than that Israel shall not be delivered. 2. Upon Dathan and Abiram, that embroiled them. Remember what he did in the wilderness, v. 5. by how many necessary chastisements (as they are called, v. 2.) they were kept from ruining themselves. Particularly, when those daring Reubenites defied the authority of Moses, and headed a dangerous rebellion against God himself, which threatened the ruin of a whole nation, and might have ended in that, if the divine power had not immediately crushed the rebellion, by burying the rebels alive, them, and all that was in their possession, v. 6. What was done against them, though misinterpreted by the disaffected party, Numb. 16. 41. was really done in mercy to Israel. To be saved from the mischiefs of insurrections at home, is as great a kindness to a people, and therefore lays under as strong obligations, as protection from the invasion of enemies abroad.

8. Therefore shall ye keep all the commandments which I command you this day, that ye may be strong, and go in and possess the land, whither ye go to possess it; 9. And that ye may prolong your days in the land, which the LORD sware unto your fathers to give unto them and to their seed, a land that floweth with milk and honey. 10. For the land, whither thou goest in to possess it, is not as the land of Egypt, from whence ye came out, where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs: 11. But the land, whither ye go to possess it, is a land of hills and valleys, and drinketh water of the rain of heaven: 12. A land which the LORD thy God careth for: the eyes of the LORD thy God are always upon it, from the beginning of the year even unto the end of the year. 13. And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto my commandments which I command you this day, to love the LORD your God, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul, 14. That I will give you the rain of your land in his due season, the first rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil. 15. And I will send grass in thy fields for thy cattle, that thou mayest eat and be full. 16. Take heed to yourselves, that your heart be not deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them; 17. And then the LORD's wrath be kindled against you, and he shut up the heaven, that there be no rain, and that the land yield not her fruit; and lest ye perish quickly from off the good land which the LORD giveth you.

Still he urges the same subject, as loath to conclude till he had gained his point. If thou wilt enter into life, if thou wilt enter into Canaan, a type of that life, and find it a good land indeed to thee, keep the commandments, keep all the commandments which I command you this day: love God, and serve him with all your heart.

I. Because this was the way to get and keep possession of the promised land. 1. It was the way to get possession, v. 8. That ye may be strong for war, and so go in and possess it. So little did they know either of hardship or hazard in the wars of Canaan, that he does not say they should go in and fight for it; no, they had nothing in effect to do but go in and possess it. He does not go about to teach them the art of war, how to draw the bow, and use the sword, and keep ranks, that they might be strong, and go in and possess the land; no, but let them keep God's commandments, and their religion, while they were true to it, will be their strength, and secure their success. 2. It was the way to keep possession, v. 9. That ye may prolong your days in this land that your eye is upon. Sin tends to the shortening of the days of particular persons, and to the shortening of the days of a people's prosperity; but obedience will be a lengthening out of their tranquillity.

II. Because the land of Canaan, into which they were going, had a more sensible dependence upon the blessing of heaven than the land of Egypt had, v. 10. . 12. Egypt was a country fruitful enough, but it was all flat, and was watered, not as other countries, with rain, (it is said of Egypt, Zech. 14. 18. that it has no rain;) but by the overflowing of the river Nile at a certain season of the year; to the improving of which there was necessary a great deal of the art and labour of the husbandman; so that in Egypt a man must bestow as much cost and pains upon a field, as upon a garden of herbs. And this made them the more apt to imagine that the power of their own hands got them this wealth. But the land of Canaan was an uneven country, a land of hills and valleys, which not only gave a more pleasing prospect to the eye, but yielded a greater variety of soils for the several purposes of the husbandman. It was a land that had no great rivers in it, except Jordan, but drank water of the rain of heaven. And so, 1. Saved them a great deal of labour. While the Egyptians were ditching and guttering in the fields up to the knees in mud, to bring water to their land, which otherwise would soon become like the heath in the wilderness, the Israelites could sit in their houses, warm and easy, and leave it to God to water their land with the former and the latter rain, which is called the river of God, (Ps. 65. 9.) perhaps in allusion to, and contempt of, the river of Egypt, which that nation was so proud of. Note, The better God has provided, by our outward condition, for our ease and convenience, the more we should abound in his service: the less we have to do for our bodies, the more we should do for God and our souls. 2. So he directed them to look upward to God, who giveth us rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, Acts, 14. 17. and promised to be himself as the dew unto Israel, Hos. 14. 5. Note, (1.) Mercies bring with them the greatest comfort and sweetness, when we see them coming from heaven, the immediate gifts of Divine Providence. (2.) The closer dependence we have upon God, the more cheerful we should be in our obedience to him. See how Moses here magnifies the land of Canaan above all other lands, that the eyes of God were always upon it, that is, they should be so, to see that nothing was wanting, while they kept close to God and duty; its fruitfulness should be, not so much the happy effect of its soil as the immediate fruit of the divine blessing; this may be inferred from its present state, for it is said to be at this day, now that God is departed from it, as barren a spot of ground as perhaps any under heaven. Call it not Naomi; call it Marah.

III. Because God would certainly bless them with an abundance of all good things, if they would love him and serve him, v. 13. . 15. I will give you the rain of your land in due season, so that they should neither want it when the ground called for it, nor have it in excess; but they should have the former rain which fell at seed-time, and the latter rain which fell before the harvest, Amos, 4. 7. This represented all the seasonable blessings which God would bestow upon them, especially spiritual comforts which should come as the latter and former rain, Hos. 6. 3. And the earth thus watered, produced, 1. Fruits for the service of man; corn, and wine, and oil, Ps. 104. 13. . 15. 2. Grass for the cattle, that they also might be serviceable to man; that he might eat of them and be full, v. 15. Godliness hath here the promise of the life that now is; but the favour of God shall put gladness into the heart, more than the increase of corn, and wine, and oil, will.

IV. Because their revolt from God to idols would certainly be their ruin, v. 16, 17. Take heed that your hearts be not deceived. All that forsake God to set their affection upon, or pay their devotion to, any creature, will find themselves wretchedly deceived to their own destruction; and this will aggravate it, that it was purely for want of taking heed. A little care would have prevented their being imposed upon by the great deceiver. To awaken them to take heed, Moses here tells them plainly, that if they should turn aside to other gods, 1. They would provoke the wrath of God against them; and who knows the power of that anger? 2. Good things would be turned away from them; the heaven would withhold its rain, and then of course the earth would not yield its fruit. 3. Evil things would come upon them, they would perish quickly from off this good land. And the better the land was, the more grievous it would be to perish from it. The goodness of the land would not be their security, when the badness of the inhabitants had made them ripe for ruin.

18. Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart and in your soul, and bind them for a sign upon your hand, that they may be as frontlets between your eyes. 19. And ye shall teach them your children, speaking of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. 20. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thine house, and upon thy gates: 21. That your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children, in the land which the LORD sware unto your fathers to give them, as the days of heaven upon the earth. 22. For if ye shall diligently keep all these commandments which I command you, to do them, to love the LORD your God, to walk in all his ways, and to cleave unto him; 23. Then will the LORD drive out all these nations from before you, and ye shall possess greater nations and mightier than yourselves. 24. Every place whereon the soles of your feet shall tread shall be your's: from the wilderness and Lebanon, from the river, the river Euphrates, even unto the uttermost sea shall your coast be. 25. There shall no man be able to stand before you: for the LORD your God shall lay the fear of you and the dread of you upon all the land that ye shall tread upon, as he hath said unto you.

Here,

I. He repeats the directions he had given for their guidance and assistance in their obedience, and for the keeping up of religion among them, v. 18. . 20. which is much to the same purport with what we had before, ch. 6. 6, &c. Let us all be directed by the three rules here given. 1. Let our hearts be filled with the word of God. Lay up these words in your heart and in your soul. The heart must be the treasury or storehouse in which the word of God must be laid up, to be used upon all occasions. We cannot expect good practices in the conversation, unless there be good thoughts, good affections, and good principles, in the heart. 2. Let our eyes be fixed upon the word of God. "Bind these words for a sign upon your hand, which is always in view, (Isa. 49. 16.) and as frontlets between your eyes, which you cannot avoid the sight of: let them be as ready and familiar to you, and have your eye as constantly upon them, as if they were written upon your door-posts. and could not be overlooked either when you go out or when you come in." Thus we must lay God's judgments before us, having a constant regard to them, as the guide of our way, as the rule of our work, Ps. 119. 30. 3. Let our tongues be employed about the word of God. Let it be the subject of our familiar discourse, wherever we are; especially with our children, who must be taught the service of God, as the one thing needful, much more needful than either the rules of decency, or the calling they must live by in this world. Great care and pains must be taken to acquaint children betimes, and to affect them with the word of God and the wondrous things of his law. Nor will any thing contribute more to the prosperity and perpetuity of religion in a nation, than the good education of children; if the seed be holy, it is the substance of a land.

II. He repeats the assurances he had before given them, in God's name, of prosperity and success, if they were obedient: 1. They should have a happy settlement, v. 21. Their days should be multiplied; and, when they were fulfilled, the days of their children likewise should be many, as the days of heaven, that is, Canaan should be sure to them and their heirs for ever, as long as the world stands, if they did not by their own sin throw themselves out of it. 2. It should not be in the power of their enemies to give them any disturbance, or make them upon any account uneasy. "If ye will keep God's commandments, and be careful to do your duty, v. 22. God will not only crown the labours of the husbandmen with plenty of the fruits of the earth, but he will own and succeed the more glorious undertakings of the men of war; victory shall attend your arms; which way soever they turn: God will drive out these nations, and put you in possession of their land," v. 23, 24. Their territories should be enlarged to the utmost extent of the promise, Gen. 15. 18. and all their neighbours should stand in awe of them, v. 25. Nothing contributes more to the making of a nation considerable abroad, valuable to its friends, and formidable to its enemies, than religion reigning in it; for who can be against those that have God for them? And he is certainly for those that are sincerely for him, Prov. 14. 34.

26. Behold, I set before you this day a blessing and a curse; 27. A blessing, if ye obey the commandments of the LORD your God, which I command you this day: 28. And a curse, if ye will not obey the commandments of the LORD your God, but turn aside out of the way which I command you this day, to go after other gods, which ye have not known. 29. And it shall come to pass, when the LORD thy God hath brought thee in unto the land whither thou goest to possess it, that thou shalt put the blessing upon mount Gerizim, and the curse upon mount Ebal. 30. Are they not on the other side Jordan, by the way where the sun goeth down, in the land of the Canaanites, which dwell in the champaign over against Gilgal, beside the plains of Moreh? 31. For ye shall pass over Jordan to go in to possess the land which the LORD your God giveth you, and ye shall possess it, and dwell therein. 32. And ye shall observe to do all the statutes and judgments which I set before you this day.

Here Moses concludes his general exhortation to obedience and his management is very affecting, and such as, one would think, should have engaged them for ever to God, and should have left impressions upon them, never to be worn out.

I. He sums up all his arguments for obedience in two words, the blessing, and the curse, v. 26. that is, the rewards and the punishments, as they stand in the promises and the threatenings, which are the great sanctions of the law, taking hold of hope and fear, those two handles of the soul, by which it is caught, held, and managed. These two, the blessing, and the curse, he set before them, that is, 1. He explained them, that they might know them; he enumerated the particulars contained both in the blessing and in the curse, that they might see the more fully how desirable the blessing was, and how dreadful the curse. 2. He confirmed them, that they might believe them; made it evident to them, by the proofs he produced of his own commission, that the blessing was not a fool's paradise, nor the curse a bugbear, but that both were real declarations of the purpose of God concerning them. 3. He charged them to choose which of these they would have. So fairly does he deal with them, and so far is he from pulling out the eyes of these men, as he was charged, Numb. 16. 14. They and we are plainly told on what terms we stand with Almighty God. (1.) If we be obedient to his laws, we may be sure of a blessing, v. 27. But, (2.) If we be disobedient, we may be as sure of a curse, v. 28. Say ye to the righteous, (for God has said it, and all the world cannot unsay it,) that it shall be well with them: But woe to the wicked, it shall be ill with them.

II. He appoints a public and solemn proclamation to be made of the blessing and curse which he had set before them, upon the two mountains of Gerizim and Ebal, v. 29, 30. We have more particular directions for this solemnity, ch. 27. 11, &c. and an account of the performance of it, Josh. 8. 33, &c. It was to be done, and was done, immediately upon their coming into Canaan, that, when they first took possession of that land, they might know upon what terms they stood. The place where this was to be done is particularly described by Moses, though he never saw it, which is one circumstance, among many, that evidences his divine instructions. It is said to be near the plain, or oaks, or meadows, of Moreh, which was one of the first places that Abraham came to in Canaan; so that, in sending them thither to hear the blessing and the curse, God reminded them of the promise he made to Abraham in that very place, Gen. 12. 6, 7. The mention of this appointment here, serves, 1. For the encouragement of their faith in the promise of God, that they should be masters of Canaan quickly. Do it (says Moses) on the other side Jordan, v. 30. for you may be confident you shall pass over Jordan, v. 31. The institution of this service, to be done in Canaan, was an assurance to them that they should be brought into possession of it, and a token, like that which God gave to Moses, Exod. 3. 12. Ye shall serve God upon this mountain. And, 2. It serves for an engagement upon them to be obedient, that they might escape that curse, and obtain that blessing, which, beside what they had already heard, they must shortly be witnesses to the solemn publication of, v. 32. "Ye shall observe to do the statutes and judgments, that ye may not in that solemnity be witnesses against yourselves."

CHAP. XII.

Moses, at this chapter, comes to the particular statutes which he had to give in charge to Israel, and he begins with those which relate to the worship of God; and particularly those which explain the second commandment, about which God is in a special manner jealous. I. They must utterly destroy all relics and remains of idolatry, v. 1. 3. II. They must keep close to the tabernacle, v. 4, 5. The former precept was intended to prevent all false worship; the latter, to preserve the worship God had instituted. By this latter law, 1. They are commanded to bring all their offerings to the altar of God, and all their holy things to the place which he should choose, v. 6, 7, 11, 12, 11, 18, 26. 28. 2. They are forbidden, in general, to do as they now did in the wilderness, v. 8. 11. And as the Canaanites had done, v. 29. 32. And, in particular, to eat the hallowed things at their own houses, v. 13, 17, 18. Or, to forsake the instituted ministry, v. 19. 3. They are permitted to eat flesh as common food at their own houses, provided they did not cut the blood, v. 15, 16. And again, v. 20. 26.

I. THESE are the statutes and judgments, which ye shall observe to do in the land, which the Lord God of thy fathers giveth thee to possess it, all the days that ye live upon the earth. 2. Ye shall utterly destroy all the places, wherein the nations which ye shall possess served their gods, upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree: 3. And ye shall overthrow their altars, and break their pillars, and burn their groves with fire; and ye shall hew down the graven images of their gods, and destroy the names of them out of that place. 4. Ye shall not do so unto the Lord your God.

From those great original truths, That there is a God, and, That there is but one God, arise those great fundamental laws, That that God is to be worshipped, and he only, and that, therefore, we are to have no other god before him: this is the first commandment, and the second is a guard upon it, or a hedge about it. To prevent a revolt to false gods, we are forbidden to worship the true God in such a way and manner as the false gods were worshipped in; and are commanded to observe the instituted ordinances of worship; that we may adhere to the proper Object of worship. For this reason, Moses is very large in his exposition of the second commandment. What is contained in this, and the four following chapters, mostly refers to that. These are the statutes and judgments which they must observe to do, v. 1. 1. In the days of their rest and prosperity, when they should be masters of Canaan. We must not think that our religion is instituted only to be our work in the years of our servitude, our entertainment in the places of our solitude, and our consolation in affliction; no, when we come to possess a good land, still we must keep up the worship of God in Canaan, as well as in a wilderness; when we are grown up, as well as when we are children; when we are full of business, as well as when we have nothing else to do. 2. All the days, as long as ye live upon the earth. While we are here in our state of trial, we must continue in our obedience, even to the end, and never leave our duty, nor grow weary of well-doing.

Now, 1. They are here charged to abolish and extirpate all those things that the Canaanites had served their idol-gods with, v. 2, 3. Here is no mention of idol-temples, which countenances the opinion some have, that the tabernacle Moses reared in the wilderness was the first habitation that ever was made for religious uses; and that from it temples took their rise. But the places that had been used, and were now to be levelled, were enclosures for their worship, on mountains and hills, (as if the height of the ground would give advantage to the ascent of their devotions,) and under green trees, either because pleasant, or because awful; whatever makes the mind easy and reverent, contracts and composes it, was thought to befriend devotion. The solemn shade and silence of a grove are still admired by those that are disposed to contemplation. But the advantages which these retirements gave to the Gentiles, in the worship of their idols, was, that they concealed those works of darkness which could not bear the light; and therefore they must all be destroyed, with the altars, pillars, and images, that had been used by the natives in the worship of their gods, so as that the very names of them might be buried in oblivion; and not only not be remembered with respect, but not remembered at all. They must thus consult, (1.) The reputation of their land, let it never be said of this holy land, that it had been thus polluted, but let all these dunghills be carried away, as things they were ashamed of. (2.) The safety of their religion; let none be left remaining, lest profane unthinking people, especially in degenerate ages, should make use of them in the service of the God of Israel. Let these pest-houses be demolished, as things they were afraid of. He begins the statutes that relate to divine worship with this, because there must first be an abhorrence of that which is evil, before there can be a steady adherence to that which is good, Rom. 12. 9. The kingdom of God must be set up, both in persons and places, upon the ruins of the devil's kingdom; for they cannot stand together, nor can there be any communion between Christ and Belial.

2. They are charged not to translate the rites and usages of idolaters into the worship of God; no, not under colour of beautifying and improving it, v. 4. Ye shall not do so to the Lord your God, that is, "You must not think to do honour to him, by offering sacrifices on mountains and hills, erecting pillars, planting groves, and setting up images; no, you must not indulge a luxurious fancy in your worship, nor think that whatever pleases that, will please God: he is above all gods, and will not be worshipped as other gods are."

5. But unto the place which the LORD your God shall choose out of all your tribes to put his name there, even unto his habitation shall ye seek, and thither thou shalt come: 6. And thither ye shall bring your burnt-offerings, and your sacrifices, and your tithes, and heave-offerings of your hand, and your vows, and your freewill-offerings, and the firstlings of your herds and of your flocks: 7. And there ye shall eat before the LORD your God, and ye shall rejoice in all that ye put your hand unto, ye and your households, wherein the LORD thy God hath blessed thee. 8. Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here this day, every man whatsoever is right in his own eyes. 9. For ye are not as yet come to the rest and to the inheritance, which the LORD your God giveth you. 10. But when ye go over Jordan, and dwell in the land which the LORD your God giveth you to inherit, and when he giveth you rest from all your enemies round about, so that ye dwell in safety; 11. Then there shall be a place which the LORD your God shall choose to cause his name to dwell there; thither shall ye bring all that I command you; your burnt-offerings, and your sacrifices, your tithes, and the heave-offering of your hand, and all your choice vows which ye vow unto the LORD: 12. And ye shall rejoice before the LORD your God, ye, and your sons, and your daughters, and your men-servants, and your maid-servants, and the Levite that is within your gates: forasmuch as he hath no part nor inheritance with you. 13. Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt-offerings in every place that thou seest: 14. But in the place which the LORD shall choose in one of thy tribes, there thou shalt offer thy burnt-offerings, and there thou shalt do all that I command thee. 15. Notwithstanding thou mayest kill and eat flesh in all thy gates, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, according to the blessing of the LORD thy God which he hath given thee: the unclean and the clean may eat thereof, as of the roe-buck, and as of the hart. 16. Only ye shall not eat the blood; ye shall pour it upon the earth as water. 17. Thou mayest not eat within thy gates thy tithe of thy corn, or of thy wine, or of thy oil, or the firstlings of thy herds or of thy flock, nor any of thy vows which thou vowest, nor thy freewill-offerings, or heave-offering of thine hand: 18. But thou must eat them before the LORD thy God in the place which the LORD thy God shall choose, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates; and thou shalt rejoice before the LORD thy God in all that thou puttest thine hands unto. 19. Take heed to thyself that thou forsake not the Levite as long as thou livest upon thy earth. 20. When the LORD thy God shall enlarge thy border, as he hath promised thee, and thou shalt say, I will eat flesh, because thy soul longeth to eat flesh; thou mayest eat flesh, whatsoever thy soul lusteth after. 21. If the place which the LORD thy God hath chosen to put his name there be too far from thee, then thou shalt kill of thy herd and of thy flock, which the LORD hath given thee, as I have commanded thee, and thou shalt eat in thy gates whatsoever thy soul lusteth after. 22. Even as the roe-buck and the hart is eaten, so thou shalt eat them: the unclean and the clean shall eat of them alike. 23. Only be sure that thou eat not the blood: for the blood is the life; and thou mayest not eat the life with the flesh. 24. Thou shalt not eat it; thou shalt pour it upon the earth as water. 25. Thou shalt not eat it; that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the LORD. 26. Only thy holy things which thou hast, and thy vows, thou shalt take, and go unto the place which the LORD shall choose: 27. And thou shalt offer thy burnt-offerings, the flesh and the blood, upon the altar of the LORD thy God: and the blood of thy sacrifices shall be poured out upon the altar of the LORD thy God, and thou shalt eat the flesh. 28. Observe and hear all these words which I command thee, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee for ever, when thou doest that which is good and right in the sight of the LORD thy God. 29. When the LORD thy God shall cut off the nations from before thee, whither thou goest to possess them, and thou succeedest them, and dwellest in their land; 30. Take heed to thyself that thou be not snared by following them, after that they be destroyed from before thee; and that thou inquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise. 31. Thou shalt not do so unto the LORD thy God: for every abomination to the LORD, which he hateth, have they done unto their gods; for even their sons and their daughters they have burnt in the fire to their gods. 32. What thing soever I command you, observe to do it: thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it.

There is not any one particular precept (as I remember) in all the law of Moses, so largely pressed and inculcated as this, by which they are all tied to bring their sacrifices to that one altar which was set up in the court of the tabernacle, and there to perform all the rituals of their religion; for, as to moral services, then, no doubt, as now, men might pray every where, as they did in their synagogues. The command to do this, and the prohibition of the contrary, are here repeated again and again, as we teach children: and yet we are sure that there is in scripture no vain repetition: but all this stress is laid upon it, 1. Because of the strange proneness there was in the hearts of the people to idolatry and superstition, and the danger of their being seduced by the many temptations which they would be surrounded with. 2. Because of the great use which the observance of this appointment would be of to them, both to prevent the introducing of corrupt customs into their worship, and to preserve among them unity and brotherly love; that, meeting all in one place, they might continue both of one way, and of one heart. 3. Because of the significancy of this appointment. They must keep to one place, in token of their belief of those two great truths which we find together, 1 Tim. 2. 5. That there is one God, and one Mediator between God and man. It not only served to keep up the notion of the unity of the Godhead, but was an intimation to them (though they could not steadfastly discern it) of the one only way of approach to God, and communion with him, in and by the Messiah.

Let us now reduce this long charge to its proper heads.

I. It is here promised, that when they were settled in Canaan, when they had rest from their enemies, and dwelt in safety, God would choose a certain place, which he would appoint to be the centre of their unity, to which they should bring all their offerings, v. 10, 11. Observe, 1. If they must be tied to one place, they should not be left in doubt concerning it, but should certainly know what place it was. Had Christ intended, under the gospel, to make any one place such a seat of power as Rome pretends to be, we should not have been left so destitute of instruction, as we are, concerning the appointed place. 2. God does not leave it to them to choose the place, lest the tribes should have quarrelled about it, each striving, for their secular advantage, to have it among them; but he reserves the choice to himself, as he does the designation of the Redeemer, and the institution of holy ordinances. 3. He does not appoint the place now, as he had appointed mounts Gerizim and Ebal, for the pronouncing of the blessings and curses, ch. 11. 29. but reserves the doing of it till hereafter, that hereby they might be made to expect further directions from heaven, and a divine conduct, after Moses should be removed.

The place which God would choose, is said to be the place where he would put his name, that is, which he would have to be called his, where his honour should dwell, where he would manifest himself to his people, and make himself known, as men do by their names, and where he would receive addresses, by which his name is both praised and called upon. It was to be his habitation, where, as King of Israel, he would keep court, and be found by all those that reverently sought him. The ark was the token of God's presence, and where that was put, there God put his name, and that was his habitation; it contained the tables of the law; for none must expect to receive favours from God's hand, but those that are willing to receive the law from his mouth. The place which God first chose for the ark to reside in, was, Shiloh: and after that place had sinned away its honours, we find the ark at Kirjath-jearim, and other places; but, at length, in David's time, it was fixed at Jerusalem, and God said concerning Solomon's temple, more expressly than ever he had said concerning any other place, This I have chosen for a house of sacrifice, 2 Chron. 7. 12. Compare ch. 6. 5. Now, under the gospel, we have no temple that sanctifies the gold, no altar that sanctifies the gift, but Christ only; and as to the places of worship, the prophets foretold that in every place the spiritual incense should be offered, Mal. 1. 11. And our Saviour has declared that those are accepted as true worshippers who worship God in sincerity and truth, without regard either to this mountain or Jerusalem, John, 4. 21.

II. They are commanded to bring all their burnt-offerings and sacrifices to this place that God would choose, v. 6. And again,

v. 11. Thither shall ye bring all that I command you. And, v. 14. There thou shalt offer thy burnt-offerings. And, v. 27. The flesh and the blood must be offered upon the altar of the Lord thy God. And of their peace-offerings, here called their sacrifices, though they were to eat the flesh, yet the blood was to be poured out upon the altar. By this they were taught that sacrifices and offerings God did not desire, nor accept, for their own sake, nor for any intrinsic worth in them, as natural expressions of homage and adoration: but that they received their virtue purely from the altar on which they were offered, as it typified Christ; whereas prayers and praises, as much more necessary and valuable, were to be offered every day by the people of God, wherever they were. A devout Israelite might honour God, and keep up communion with him, and obtain mercy from him, though he had not an opportunity, perhaps, for many months together, of bringing a sacrifice to his altar. But this signified the obligation we Christians are under, to offer up all our spiritual sacrifices to God in the name of Jesus Christ, hoping for acceptance only upon the score of his mediation, 1 Pet. 2. 5.

III. They are commanded to feast upon their hallowed things before the Lord, with holy joy. They must not only bring to the altar the sacrifices which were to be offered to God, but they must bring to the place of the altar all those things which they were appointed by the law to eat and drink, to the honour of God, in token of their communion with him, v. 6. Their tithes, heave-offerings of their hand, that is, their first-fruits, their vows, and freewill-offerings, and firstlings, all those things which were to be religiously made use of, either by themselves, or by the priests and Levites, must be brought to the place which God would choose; as all the revenues of the crown, from all parts of the kingdom, are brought into the exchequer. And, v. 7. There ye shall eat before the Lord, and rejoice in all that ye put your hands unto. And again, v. 12. Ye shall rejoice before the Lord, ye, and your sons, and your daughters. Observe here, 1. That what we do in the service of God, and to his glory, redounds to our benefit, if it be not our own fault. They that sacrifice to God are welcome to eat before him, and to feast upon their sacrifices: he sups with us, and we with him, Rev. 3. 20. If we glorify God, we edify ourselves, and cultivate our own minds, through the grace of God, by the increase of our knowledge and faith, the enlivening of devout affections, and the confirming of gracious habits and resolutions: thus is the soul nourished. 2. That work for God should be done with holy joy and cheerfulness. Ye shall eat and rejoice, v. 7. And again, v. 12. and v. 18. (1.) Now, while they were before the Lord, they must rejoice, v. 12. It is the will of God that we should serve him with gladness; none displeased him more than they that covered his altar with tears, Mal. 2. 13. See what a good Master we serve, that has made it our duty to sing at our work. Even the children and servants must rejoice with them before God, that the services of religion might be a pleasure to them, and not a task, or drudgery. (2.) They must carry away with them the grateful relish of that delight which they found in communion with God; they must rejoice in all that they put their hands unto, v. 7. Some of the comfort which they had had in the business of religion, they must take with them into their common employments; and, being thus strengthened in soul, whatever they did, they must do it heartily and cheerfully. And this holy pious joy in God and his goodness, with which we are to rejoice evermore, would be the best preservative against the sin and snare of vain and carnal mirth, and a relief against the sorrows of the world.

IV. They are commanded to be kind to the Levites. Did they feast with joy? the Levites must feast with them, and rejoice with them, v. 12. And again, v. 18. And a general caution, v. 19. Take heed that thou forsake not the Levite as long as thou livest. There were Levites that attended the altar as assistants to the priests, and these must not be forsaken, that is, the service they performed must be constantly adhered to; no other altar must be set up, than that which God appointed; for that would be to forsake the Levites. But this here seems to be spoken of the Levites that were dispersed in the country, to instruct the people in the law of God, and to assist them in their devotions; for it is the Levite within their gates that they are here commanded to make much of. It is a great mercy to have Levites near us, within our gates, that we may ask the law at their mouth, and at our feasts to be a check upon us, to restrain excesses. And it is the duty of people to be kind to their ministers that give them good instructions, and set them good examples. As long as we live, we shall need their assistance, till we come to that world where ordinances will be superseded; and therefore, as long as we live, we must not forsake the Levites. The reason given, v. 12. is, because the Levite has no part nor inheritance with you; so that he cannot grow rich by husbandry or trade; let him, therefore, share with you in the comfort of your riches. They must give the Levites their tithes and offerings, settled on them by the law, because they had no other maintenance.

V. They are allowed to eat common flesh, but not the flesh of their offerings, in their own houses, wherever they dwell. What was any way devoted to God, they must not eat at home, v. 13, 17. out what was not so devoted, they might kill, and eat of, at their pleasure, v. 15. And this permission is again repeated, v. 20. . 22. It should seem, that, while they were in the wilderness, they did not eat the flesh of any of those kind of beasts that were used in sacrifice, but what was killed at the door of the tabernacle, and part of it presented to God as a peace-offering, Lev. 17. 3, 4. But, when they came to Canaan, where they must live at a great distance from the tabernacle, they might kill what they pleased for their own use, of their flocks and herds, without bringing part to the altar. This allowance is very express, and repeated, lest Satan should take occasion, from that law which forbade the eating of their sacrifices at their own houses, to suggest to them, as he did to our first parents, hard thoughts of God, as if he grudged them the enjoyment of what he had given them; Thou mayest eat whatsoever thy soul lusteth after. There is a natural regular appetite, which it is lawful to gratify with temperance and sobriety, not taking too great a pleasure in the gratification, nor being uneasy, if it be crossed. The unclean, who might not eat of the holy things, yet might eat of the same sort of flesh when it was only used as common food. The distinction between clean persons and unclean was sacred, and designed for the preserving of the honour of their holy feasts, and therefore must not be brought into their ordinary meals.

This permission has a double restriction.

1. They must eat according to the blessing which God had given them, v. 15. Note, It is not only our wisdom, but our duty, to live according to our estates, and not to spend above what we have. As it is unjust on the one hand to hoard what should be laid out, so it is much more unjust to lay out more than we have; for, what is not our own must needs be another's, who is thereby robbed and defrauded. And this, I say, is much more unjust, because it is easier afterward to distribute what has been unduly spared, and so to make a sort of restitution for the wrong, than it is to repay to wife, and children, and creditors, what has been unduly spent. Between these two extremes let wisdom find the mean, and then let watchfulness and resolution keep it.

2. They must not eat blood, v. 16. and again, v. 23. Only be sure that thou eat not the blood; v. 24. Thou shalt not eat it; and, v. 25. Thou shalt not eat it, that it may go well with thee. When they could not bring the blood to the altar, to pour it out there before the Lord, as belonging to him, they must pour it out upon the earth, as not belonging to them, because it was the life, and therefore, as an acknowledgment, belonged to him who gives life, and, as an atonement, belonged to him to whom life is forfeited. Bishop Patrick thinks one reason why they were forbidden thus strictly the eating of blood, was, to prevent the superstitions of the old idolaters about the blood of their sacrifices, which they thought their demons delighted in, and by eating of which they imagined that they had communion with them.

VI. They are forbidden to keep up either their own corrupt usages in the wilderness, or the corrupt usages of their predecessors in the land of Canaan.

1. They must not keep up those improper customs which they had got into in the wilderness, and which were connived at in consideration of the present unsettledness of their condition, v. 8, 9. Ye shall not do after all the things that we do here this day. Never was there a better governor than Moses, and one would think never a better opportunity of keeping up good order and discipline than now among the people of Israel, when they lay so closely encamped under the eye of their governor; and yet, it seems, there was much amiss, and that many irregularities had crept in among them. We must never expect to see any society perfectly pure and right, and as it should be, till we come to the heavenly Canaan. They had sacrifices, and religious worship, courts of justice, and civil government, and, by the stoning of the man that gathered sticks on the sabbath-day, it appears there was great strictness used in guarding the most weighty matters of the law; but, being frequently upon the remove, and always at uncertainty, (1.) They could none of them observe the solemn feasts, and the rites of cleansing, with the exactness that the law required: And, (2.) Those among them that were disposed to do amiss, had opportunity given them to do it unobserved, by the frequent interruptions which their removes gave to the administration of justice. But (says Moses) when ye come to Canaan, ye shall not do as we do here. Note, When the people of God are in an unsettled condition, that may be tolerated and dispensed with which would by no means be allowed at another time. Cases of necessity are to be considered while the necessity continues; but that must not be done in Canaan which was indulged in in the wilderness. While a house is in the building, a great deal of dirt and rubbish is suffered to lie by it, which must all be taken away when the house is built. Moses was now about to lay down his life and government, and it is a comfort to him to foresee that Israel would be better in the next reign than they had been in his.

2. They must not worship the Lord by any of those rites or ceremonies which the nations of Canaan had made use of in the service of their gods, v. 29. . 32. They must not so much as inquire into the modes and forms of idolatrous worship. What good would it do to them to know those depths of Satan? Rev. 2. 24. It is best to be ignorant of that which there is danger of being infected by. They must not introduce the customs of idolaters, (1.) Because it would be absurd to make those their patterns whom God had made their slaves and captives, cut off, and destroyed from before them. The Canaanites had not flourished and prospered so much in the service of their gods, as that the Israelites should be invited to take up their customs. Those are wretchedly besotted indeed, who will walk in the way of sinners, after they have seen their end. (2.) Because some of their customs were most barbarous and inhuman, and such as trampled, not only upon the light and law of nature, but upon natural affection itself, as burning their sons and their daughters in the fire to their gods, v. 31. the very mention of which is sufficient to make it odious, and possess us with a horror of it. (3.) Because their idolatrous customs were an abomination to the Lord, and the translating of them into his worship would make even that an abomination, and an affront to him, by which they should give him honour, and by which they hoped to obtain his favour. The case is bad indeed, when the sacrifice itself is become an abomination, Prov. 15. 8. He therefore concludes, v. 32. with the same caution concerning the worship of God, which he had before given concerning the word of God, ch. 4. 2. Ye shall not add thereto any inventions of your own, under pretence of making the ordinance either more significant or more magnificent; nor diminish from it, under pretence of making it more easy and practicable, or of setting aside that which may be spared; but observe to do all that, and that only, which God has commanded. We may then hope in our religious worship to obtain the divine acceptance, when we observe the divine appointment. God will have his own work done in his own way.

CHAP. XIII.

Moses is still upon that necessary subject, concerning the peril of idolatry. In the close of the foregoing chapter, he had cautioned them against the peril that might arise from their predecessors, the Canaanites. In this chapter, he cautions them against the rise of idolatry from among themselves; they must take heed lest any should draw them to idolatry. I. By the pretence of prophecy, v. 1. .5. II. By the pretence of friendship and relation, v. 6. .11. III. By the pretence of numbers, v. 12. .18. But, in all these cases, the temptation must be resolutely resisted, and the tempters punished, and cut off.

1. IF there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, 2. And the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; 3. Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the LORD your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul. 4. Ye shall walk after the LORD your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him. 5. And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death; because he hath spoken to turn you away from the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, and redeemed you out of the house of bondage, to thrust thee out of the way which the LORD thy God commanded thee to walk in. So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee.

Here is,

I. A very strange supposition, v. 1, 2. 1. It is strange that there should arise any among themselves, especially any pretending to vision and prophecy, who should move them to go and serve other gods. Was it possible that any who had so much knowledge of the methods of divine revelation, as to be able to personate a prophet, should yet have so little knowledge of the divine nature and will, as to go himself, and entice his neighbours, after other gods? Could an Israelite ever be guilty of such impiety? Could a man of sense ever be guilty of such absurdity? We see it in our own day, and therefore may think it the less strange; multitudes that profess both learning and religion, yet exciting both themselves and others, not only to worship God by images, but to give divine honour to saints and angels, which is no better than going after other gods to serve them; such is the power of strong delusions. 2. It is yet more strange, that the sign or wonder given for the confirmation of this false doctrine should come to pass. Can it be thought that God himself should give any countenance to such a vile notion? Did ever a false prophet work a true miracle? It is only supposed here, for two reasons, (1.) To strengthen the caution here given against hearkening to such a one. "Though it were possible that he should work a true miracle, yet you must not believe him if he tells you, you must serve other gods, for the divine law against that is certainly perpetual, and unalterable." The supposition is like that, Gal. 1. 8. If we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel to you; which does not prove it possible that an angel should preach another gospel, but strongly expresses the certainty and perpetuity of that which we have received. So here, (2.) It is to fortify them against the danger of impostures, and lying wonders, (2 Thess. 2. 9.) "Suppose the credentials he produces be so artfully counterfeited, that you cannot discern the cheat, nor disprove them, yet, if they are intended to draw you to the service of other gods, that alone is sufficient to disprove them; no evidence can be admitted against so clear a truth as that of the Unity of the Godhead, and so plain a law as that of worshipping the one only living and true God." We cannot suppose that the God of truth should set his seal of miracles to a lie, to so gross a lie as is supposed in that temptation, Let us go after other gods. But, if it be asked, Why is this false prophet permitted to counterfeit this broad seal? it is answered here, v. 3. "The Lord your God proveth you. He suffers you to be set upon by such a temptation, to try your constancy, that both they that are perfect, and they that are false and corrupt, may be made manifest. It is to prove you; therefore see that you acquit yourselves in the trial, and stand your ground."

II. Here is a very necessary charge given in this case. 1. Not to yield to the temptation, v. 3. "Thou shalt not hearken to the words of that prophet. Not only thou shalt not do the thing he tempts thee to, but thou shalt not so much as patiently bear the temptation, but reject it with the utmost disdain and detestation. Such a suggestion as this is not to be so much as parleyed with, but the ear must be stopped against it; Get thee behind me, Satan;" some temptations are so grossly vile, that they will not bear a debate, nor may we so much as give them the hearing. What follows, v. 4. Ye shall walk after the Lord, may be looked upon, (1.) As prescribing a preservative from the temptation; "Keep close to your duty, and you keep out of harm's way." God never leaves us till we leave him. Or, (2.) As furnishing us with an answer to the temptation; say, "It is written, Thou shalt walk after the Lord, and cleave unto him; and therefore what have I to do with idols?" 2. Not to spare the tempter, v. 5. That prophet shall be put to death, both to punish him for the attempt he has made, (the seducer must die, though none were seduced by him: a design upon the crown is treason,) and to prevent his doing further mischief. This is called putting away the evil. There is no way of removing the guilt but by removing the guilty; if such a criminal be not punished, they that should do it make themselves responsible. And thus the mischief must be put away; the infection must be kept from spreading, by cutting off the gangrened limb, and putting away the mischief-makers. Such dangerous diseases as these must be taken in time.

6. If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; 7. Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth; 8. Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him: 9. But thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people. 10. And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die; because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage. 11. And all Israel shall hear, and fear, and shall do no more any such wickedness as this is among you.

Further provision is made, by this branch of the statute, against receiving the infection of idolatry from those that are near and dear to us.

I. It is the policy of the tempter to send his solicitations by the hand of those whom we love, whom we least suspect of any ill design upon us, and whom we are desirous to please, and apt to conform ourselves to. The enticement here is supposed to come from a brother or child, that are near by nature; from a wife or friend, that are near by choice; and are to us as our own souls, v. 6. Satan tempted Adam by Eve, and Christ by Peter. We are therefore concerned to stand upon our guard against a bad proposal, when the person that proposes it can pretend to an interest in us, that we may never sin against God, in compliment to the best friend we have in the world. The temptation is supposed to be private, he will entice thee secretly, implying, that idolatry is a work of darkness, which dreads the light, and covets to be concealed, and which the sinner promises himself, and the tempter promises him, secrecy and security in. Concerning the false gods proposed to be served, 1. The tempter suggests, that the worshipping of these gods was the common practice of the world, and, if they limited their adorations to an invisible Deity, they were singular, and like nobody, for these gods were the gods of the people round about them, and, indeed, of all the nations of the earth, v. 7. This suggestion draws many away from religion and godliness, that it is an unfashionable thing; and they make their court to the world and the flesh, because these are the gods of the people that are round about them. 2. Moses suggests, in opposition to this, that it had not been the practice of their ancestors; they are gods which thou hast not known, thou nor thy fathers. Those that are born of godly parents, and have been educated in pious exercises, when they are enticed to a vain, loose, careless way of living, should remember, that those are ways which they have not known, they nor their fathers. And will they thus degenerate?

II. It is our duty to prefer God and religion before the best friends we have in the world. 1. We must not, in complaisance to our friends, break God's law, v. 8. "Thou shalt not consent to him, nor go with him to his idolatrous worship, no, not for company, nor curiosity, or to gain a better interest in his affections." It is a general rule, If sinners entice thee, consent thou not, Prov. 1. 10. 2. We must not, in compassion to our friends, obstruct the course of God's justice. He that offers such a thing, must not only be looked upon as an enemy, or dangerous person, whom one should be afraid of, and swear the peace against, but as a criminal or traitor, whom, in zeal for our sovereign Lord, his crown and dignity, we are bound to inform against, and cannot conceal, without incurring the guilt of a great misprision, v. 9. Thou shalt surely kill him. By this law, the persons enticed were bound to prosecute the seducer, and to give evidence against him before the proper judges, that he might suffer the penalty of the law, and that without delay, which, the Jews say, is here intended in that phrase, as it is in the Hebrew, killing, thou shalt kill him: neither the prosecution nor the execution must be deferred; and he that was first in the former must be first in the latter, to shew that he stood to his testimony. "Thy hand shall be first upon him, to mark him out as an anathema; and then the hands of all the people, to put him away as an accursed thing." The death he must die was that which was looked upon among the Jews as the severest of all other: he must be stoned; and his accusation written is, that he has sought to thrust thee away, by a kind of violence, from the Lord thy God, v. 10. Those are certainly our worst enemies that would thrust us from God, our best Friend; and whatever draws us to sin, separates between us and God, it is a design upon our life, and to be resented accordingly. And, lastly, here is the good effect of this necessary execution, v. 11. All Israel shall hear, and fear. They ought to hear, and fear; for the punishment of crimes committed is designed in terrorem—to terrify, and so to prevent their repetition. And it is to be hoped they will hear, and fear, and, by the severity of the punishment, especially when it is at the prosecution of a father, a brother, or a friend, will be made to conceive a horror of the sin, as exceeding sinful, and to be afraid of incurring the like punishment themselves. Smite the scorner that sins presumptuously, and the simple that is in danger of sinning carelessly will beware.

12. If thou shalt hear say, in one of thy cities, which the LORD thy God hath given thee to dwell there, saying, 13. Certain men, the children of Belial, are gone out from among you, and have withdrawn the inhabitants of their city, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which ye have not known; 14. Then shalt thou inquire, and make search, and ask diligently; and, behold, if it be truth, and the thing certain, that such abomination is wrought among you; 15. Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly, and all that is therein, and the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword. 16. And thou shalt gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street thereof, and shalt burn with fire the city, and all the spoil thereof every whit, for the LORD thy God: and it shall be an heap for ever; it shall not be built again. 17. And there shall cleave nought of the cursed thing to thine hand: that the LORD may turn from the fierceness of his anger, and shew thee mercy, and have compassion upon thee, and multiply thee, as he hath sworn unto thy fathers; 18. When thou shalt hearken to the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep all his commandments which I command thee this day, to do that which is right in the eyes of the LORD thy God.

Here the case is put of a city revolting from its allegiance to the God of Israel, and serving other gods.

I. The crime is supposed to be committed, 1. By one of the cities of Israel, that lay within the jurisdiction of their courts; the church then judged them only that were within, 1 Cor. 5. 12, 13. And even when they were ordered to preserve their religion, in the first principles of it, by fire and sword, yet they were not allowed by fire and sword to propagate it. They that are born within the allegiance of a prince, if they take up arms against him, are dealt with as traitors; but foreign invaders are not so. The city that is here become idolatrous is supposed formerly to have worshipped the true God, but now to be withdrawn to other gods; which intimates how great the crime is, and how sore the punishment will be, of those, that, after they have known the way of righteousness, turn aside from it, 2 Pet. 2. 21. 2. It is supposed to be committed by the generality of the inhabitants of the city, for we may conclude, that, if a considerable number did retain their integrity, those only that were guilty were to be destroyed, and the city was to be spared, for the sake of the righteous in it; for shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? No doubt, he shall. 3. They are supposed to be drawn to idolatry by certain men, the children of Belial; men that would endure no yoke, so it signifies; that neither fear God nor regard man, but shake off all restraints of law and conscience, and are perfectly lost to all manner of virtue; these are they that say, "Let us serve other gods," that will not only allow, but will countenance and encourage, our immoralities. Belial is put for the devil, 2 Cor. 6. 15. and the children of Belial are his children. These withdraw the inhabitants of the city; for a little of this old leaven, when it is entertained, soon leavens the whole lump.

II. The cause is ordered to be tried with a great deal of care, v. 14. Thou shalt inquire, and make search. They must not proceed upon common fame, or take the information by hearsay, but must examine the proofs, and not give judgment against them, unless the evidence was clear, and the charge fully made out. God himself, before he destroyed Sodom, is said to come down and see whether its crimes were according to the clamour, Gen. 18. 21. In judicial processes, it is requisite that time, and care, and pains, be taken to find out the truth, and that search be made, without any passion, prejudice, or partiality. The Jewish writers say, that though particular persons, who were idolaters, might be judged by the inferior courts, the defection of a city must be tried by the great Sanhedrim; and, if it appear that they are thrust away to idolatry, they send two learned men to them, to admonish and reduce them. If they repent, all is well; if not, then all Israel must go up to war against them, to testify their indignation against idolatry, and to stop the spreading of the contagion.

III. If the crime were proved, and the criminals were incorrigible, the city was to be wholly destroyed. If there were a few righteous men in it, no doubt they would remove themselves and their families out of such a dangerous place, and then all the inhabitants, men, women, and children, must be put to the sword, v. 15. all the spoil of the city, both shop goods and the furniture of houses, must be brought into the market-place, and burned, and the city itself must be laid in ashes, and never built again, v. 16. The soldiers are forbidden, upon pain of death, to convert any of the plunder to their own use, v. 17. It was a devoted thing, and dangerous to meddle with it, as we find in the case of Achan. Now, 1. God enjoins this severity, to shew what a jealous God he is in the matters of his worship, and how great a crime it is to serve other gods. Let men know, that God will not give his glory to another, nor his praise to graven images. 2. He expects that magistrates, having their honour and power from him, should be concerned for his honour, and use their power for terror to evil doers, else they bear the sword in vain. 3. The faithful worshippers of the true God must take all occasions to shew their just indignation against idolatry, much more against atheism, infidelity, and irreligion. 4. It is here intimated, that the best expedient for the turning away of God's anger from a land, is, to execute justice upon the wicked of the land, v. 17. that the Lord may turn from the fierceness of his anger, which was ready to break out against the whole nation, for the wickedness of that one apostate city. It is promised, that, if they would thus root wickedness out of their land, God would multiply them. They might think it impolitic, and against the interest of their nation, to ruin a whole city, for a crime relating purely to religion, and that they should be more sparing of the blood of Israelites: "Fear not that," says Moses, "God will multiply you the more; the body of your nation will lose nothing by the letting-out of this corrupt blood." Lastly, Though we do not find this law put in execution in all the history of the Jewish church, (Gibeah was destroyed, not for idolatry, but immorality,) yet, for the neglect of the execution of it upon the inferior cities that served idols, God himself, by the army of the Chaldeans, put it in execution upon Jerusalem, the head city, which, for its apostacy from God, was utterly destroyed and laid waste, and lay in ruins seventy years. Though idolaters may escape the punishment from men, (nor is this law, in the letter of it, binding now, under the gospel,) yet the Lord our God will not suffer them to escape his righteous judgments. The New Testament speaks of communion with idolaters as a sin which, above any other, provokes the Lord to jealousy, and dares him, as if we were stronger than he, 1 Cor. 10. 21, 22.

CHAP. XIV.

Moses, in this chapter, teaches them, 1. To distinguish themselves from their neighbours, by a singularity, 1. In their mourning, v. 1, 2. 2. In their meat, v. 3. 21. 11. To devote themselves unto God, and, in token of that, to give him his dues out of their estates, the yearly tithe, and that, every third year, for the maintenance of their religious feasts, the Levites, and the poor, v. 22. 29.

1. YE are the children of the LORD your God: ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness between your eyes for the dead. 2. For thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God, and the LORD hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth. 3. Thou shalt not eat any abominable thing. 4. These are the beasts which ye shall eat: the ox, the sheep, and the goat, 5. The hart, and the roe-buck, and the fallow deer, and the wild goat, and the pygarg, and the wild ox, and the chamois. 6. And every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws, and cheweth the cud amongst the beasts, that ye shall eat. 7. Nevertheless these ye shall not eat of them that chew the cud, or of them that divide the cloven hoof; as the camel, and the hare, and the coney: for they chew the cud, but divide not the hoof; therefore they are unclean unto you. 8. And the swine, because it divideth the hoof, yet cheweth not the cud, it is unclean unto you: ye shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcase. 9. These ye shall eat of all that are in the waters: all that have fins and scales shall ye eat: 10. And whatsoever hath not fins and scales ye may not eat; it is unclean unto you. 11. Of all clean birds ye shall eat. 12. But these are they of which ye shall not eat: the eagle, and the ossifrage, and the ospray, 13. And the glede, and the kite, and the vulture after his kind, 14. And every raven after his kind, 15. And the owl, and the night-hawk, and the cuckow, and the hawk after his kind, 16. The little owl, and the great owl, and the swan, 17. And the pelican, and the gier-eagle, and the cormorant, 18. And the stork, and the heron after her kind, and the lapwing, and the bat. 19. And every creeping thing that flieth is unclean unto you: they shall not be eaten. 20. But of all clean fowls ye may eat. 21. Ye shall not eat of any thing that dieth of itself: thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien: for thou art an holy people unto the LORD thy God. Thou shalt not see the a kid in his mother's milk.

Moses here tells the people of Israel,

1. How God had dignified them, as a peculiar people, with three distinguishing privileges, which were their honour, and figures of those spiritual blessings in heavenly things, with which God has, in Christ, blessed us. 1. Here is election; The Lord hath chosen thee, v. 2. Not for their own merit, or for any good works foreseen, but because he would magnify the riches of his power and grace among them. He did not choose them because they were, by their own dedication and subjection, a peculiar people to him above other nations, but he chose them that they might be so by his grace; and thus were believers chosen, Eph. 1. 4. 2. Here is, adoption, v. 1. "Ye are the children of the Lord your God, formed by him into a people, owned by him as his people, nay, his family, a people near unto him, nearer than any other." Israel is my son, my first-born; not because he needed children, but because they were orphans, and needed a father. Every Israelite is, indeed, a child of God, a partaker of his nature and favour, his love and blessing: Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us! 3. Here is, sanctification, v. 2. "Thou art a holy people, separated and set apart for God, devoted to his service, designed for his praise, governed by a holy law, graced by a holy tabernacle, and the holy ordinances relating to it." God's people are obliged to be holy, and, if they are holy, are indebted to the grace of God, that makes them so. The Lord has set them apart for himself, and qualified them for his service and the enjoyment of him, and so has made them holy to himself.

II. How they ought to distinguish themselves, by a sober regularity, from all the nations that were about them. And, God having thus advanced them, let not them debase themselves by admitting the superstitious customs of idolaters, and, by making themselves like them, put themselves upon the level with them. Be ye the children of the Lord your God; so the Seventy read it, as a command, that is, "Carry yourselves as becomes the children of God, and do nothing to disgrace the honour, and forfeit the privileges, of the relation."

In two things particularly they must distinguish themselves;

In their mourning. Ye shall not cut yourselves, v. 1. This forbids, as some think, not only their cutting themselves at their funerals, either to express their grief, or with their own blood to appease the infernal deities, but their wounding and mangling themselves in the worship of their gods, as Baal's prophets did, 1 Kings, 18. 28. or their marking themselves, by incisions in their flesh, for such and such deities, which in them, above any, would be an inexcusable crime, who, in the sign of circumcision, bore about with them in their bodies the marks of the Lord Jehovah. So that,

(1.) They are forbidden to deform or hurt their own bodies, upon any account. Methinks this is like a parent's charge to his little children, that are foolish, careless, and wilful, and are apt to play with knives; Children, ye shall not cut yourselves. This is the intention of those commands which oblige us to deny ourselves; the true meaning of them, if we understood them right, would appear to be, Do yourselves no harm. And this also is the design of those providences which most cross us, to remove from us those things by which we are in danger of doing ourselves harm. Knives are taken from us, lest we cut ourselves. They that are dedicated to God, as a holy people, must do nothing to disfigure themselves; the body is for the Lord, and is to be used accordingly.

(2.) They are forbidden to disturb and afflict their own minds with inordinate grief for the loss of near and dear relations. "Ye shall not express or exasperate your sorrow, even upon the most mournful occasions, by cutting yourselves, and making baldness between your eyes, like men enraged, or resolutely hardened in sorrow for the dead, as those that have no hope," 1 Thess. 4. 13. It is an excellent passage which Mr. Ainsworth here quotes from one of the Jewish writers, who understands this as a law against immoderate grief for the death of our relations. If your father (for instance) die, you shall not cut yourselves, that is, you shall not scrow more than is meet, for you are not fatherless, you have a Father, who is great, living, and permanent, even the holy blessed God, whose children ye are, v. 1. But an infidel, (says he,) when his father dies, hath no father that can help him in time of need; for he hath said to a stock, Thou art my father, and to a stone, Thou hast brought me forth, (Jer. 2. 27.) therefore he weeps, cuts himself, and makes him bald. We, that have a God to hope in, and a heaven to hope for, must bear up ourselves with that hope under every burthen of this kind.

2. They must be singular in their meat. Many sorts of flesh, which were wholesome enough, and which other people did commonly eat, they must religiously abstain from, as unclean. This law we had before, Lev. 11. 2. where it was largely opened. It seems plainly, by the connexion here, to be intended as a mark of peculiarity; for their observance of it would cause them to be taken notice of, in all mixed companies, as a separate people, and would preserve them from mingling themselves with, and conforming themselves to, their idolatrous neighbours.

(1.) Concerning beasts, here is a more particular enumeration of those which they were allowed to eat, than was in Leviticus, to shew that they had no reason to complain of their being restrained from eating swines' flesh, and hares, and rabbits, (which were all that were then forbidden, but are now commonly used,) when they were allowed so great a variety, not only of that which we call butcher's meat, v. 4. which alone was offered in sacrifice, but of venison, which they had great plenty of in Canaan, the hart, and the roe-buck, and the fallow deer, v. 5. which, though never brought to God's altar, was allowed them at their own table. See ch. 12. 22. When of all these (as Adam of every tree of the garden) they might freely eat, those were inexcusable who, to gratify a perverse appetite, or (as should seem) in honour of their idols, and in participation of their idolatrous sacrifices, ate swines' flesh, and made broth of abominable things (made so by this law) in their vessels, Isa. 65. 4.

(2.) Concerning fish, there is only one general rule given, that whatsoever had not fins and scales (as shell-fish and eels, beside leeches and other animals in the water, that are not proper food) was unclean, and forbidden, v. 9, 10.

(3.) No general rule is given concerning fowl, but those are particularly mentioned that were to be unclean to them, and there are few or none of them which are here forbidden that are now commonly eaten; and whatsoever is not expressly forbidden is allowed, v. 11. 20. Of all clean fowls ye may eat.

They are further forbidden, [1.] To eat the flesh of any creature that died of itself, because the blood was not separated from it; and, beside the ceremonial uncleanness which it lay under, (from Lev. 11. 39.) it is not wholesome food, nor ordinarily used among us, except by the poor. [2.] To secthe a kid in its mother's milk, either to gratify their own luxury, supposing it a dainty bit, or in conformity to some superstitious custom of the heathen. The Chaldee paraphrasts read it, Thou shalt not eat flesh-meats and milk-meats together. And so it would forbid the use of butter as sauce to any flesh. Now, as to all these precepts concerning their food, First, It is plain, in the law itself, that they belonged only to the Jews, and were not moral, nor of perpetual use, because not of universal obligation; for what they might not eat themselves they might give to a stranger, a proselyte of the gate, that had renounced idolatry, and therefore was permitted to live among them, though not circumcised; or, they might sell to an alien, a mere Gentile, that came into their country for trade, but might not settle in it, v. 21. They might feed upon that which an Israelite might not touch, which is a plain instance of their peculiarity, and their being a holy people. Secondly, It is plain, in the gospel, that they are now antiquated, and repealed; for every creature of God is good, and nothing now to be refused, or called common and unclean, 1 Tim. 4. 4.

22. Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year. 23. And thou shalt eat before the LORD thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tithe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks; that thou mayest learn to fear the LORD thy God always. 24. And if the way be too long for thee, so that thou art not able to carry it; or if the place be too far from thee, which the LORD thy God shall choose to set his name there, when the LORD thy God hath blessed thee: 25. Then shalt thou turn it into money, and bind up the money in thine hand, and shalt go unto the place which the LORD thy God shall choose: 26. And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth and thou shalt eat there before the LORD thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household, 27. And the Levite that is within thy gates, thou shalt not forsake him; for he hath no part nor inheritance with thee. 28. At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates: 29. And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied; that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest.

We have here a part of the statute concerning tithes. The productions of the ground were twice tithed, so that, putting both together, a fifth part was devoted to God out of their increase, and only four parts of five were for their own common use; and they could not but own they paid an easy rent, especially since God's part was disposed of to their own benefit and advantage. The first tithe was for the maintenance of their Levites, who taught them the good knowledge of God, and ministered to them in holy things; this is supposed, as anciently due, and is entailed upon the Levites as an inheritance, by that law, Numb. 18. 24, &c. But it is the second tithe that is here spoken of, which was to be taken out of the remainder, when the Levites had had their's.

I. They are here charged to separate it, and set it apart for God, v. 22. Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed. The Levites took care of their own, but the separating of this was left to the owners themselves, the law encouraging them to be honest by reposing a confidence in them, and so trying their fear of God. They are bid to tithe truly, that is, to be sure to do it, and to do it faithfully and carefully, that God's part might not be diminished either with design or by oversight. Note, We must be sure to give God his full dues out of our estates; for, being but stewards of them, it is required that we be faithful, as those that must give account.

II. They are here directed how to dispose of it, when they had separated it. Let every man lay by as God prospers him, and gives him success, and then let him lay out in pious uses, as God gives him opportunity; and it will be the easier to lay out, and the proportion will be more satisfying, when first we have laid by. This second tithe may be disposed of,

1. In works of piety, for the first two years after the year of release. They must bring it up, either in kind, or the full value of it, to the place of the sanctuary, and there must spend it in holy feasting before the Lord. If they could do it with any convenience, they must bring it in kind, v. 23. but if not, they might turn it into money, v. 24, 25, and that money must be laid out in something to feast upon before the Lord. The comfortable cheerful using of what God has given us, with temperance and sobriety, is really the honouring of God with it. Contentment, holy joy, and thankfulness, make every meal a religious feast. The end of this law we have, v. 23. That thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always; it was to keep them right and firm to their religion, (1.) By acquainting them with the sanctuary, the holy things, and the solemn services that were there performed; what they read the appointment of in their Bibles, it would do them good to see the observance of in the tabernacle; it would make a deeper impression upon them, which would keep them out of the snares of the idolatrous customs. Note, It will have a good influence upon our constancy in religion, never to forsake the assembling of ourselves together, Heb. 10. 25. By the comfort of the communion of saints, we may be kept to our communion with God. (2.) By using them to the most pleasant and delightful services of religion. Let them rejoice before the Lord, that they may learn to fear him always. The more pleasure we find in the ways of religion, the more likely we shall be to persevere in those ways. One thing they must remember in their pious entertainments, that is, to bid their Levites welcome to them. Thou shalt not forsake the Levite, v. 27. "Let him never be a stranger to thy table, especially when thou eatest before the Lord."

2. Every third year this tithe must be disposed of at home in works of charity, v. 28, 29. Lay it up within thy own gates, and let it be given to the poor, who, knowing the provision this law had made for them, no doubt, would come to seek it; and, that they might make the poor familiar to them, and not disdain their company, they are here directed to welcome them to their houses; "Hither let them come, and eat and be satisfied." In this charitable distribution of the second tithe, they must have an eye to the poor ministers, and add to their encouragement, by entertaining them; next, to poor strangers, not only for the supply of their necessities, but to put a respect upon them, and so invite them to turn proselytes; and next, to the fatherless and widow, who, though perhaps they might have a competent maintenance left them, yet should not be supposed to live so plentifully and comfortably as they had done in months past, and therefore they were to countenance them, and help to make them easy, by inviting them to this entertainment. God has a particular care for widows and fatherless, and he requires, that we should have the same. It is his honour, and will be ours, to help the helpless. And if we thus serve God, and do good with what we have, it is promised here, that the Lord our God will bless us in all the work of our hand. Note, (1.) The blessing of God is all in all to our outward prosperity, and, without that blessing, the work of our hands which we do will bring nothing to pass. (2.) The way to obtain that blessing is to be diligent and charitable. The blessing descends upon the working hand; "Expect not that God should bless thee in thy idleness and love of ease, but in all the work of thy hand." It is the hand of the diligent, with the blessing of God upon it, that makes rich, Prov. 10. 4, 22. And it descends upon the giving hand; he that thus scatters certainly increases, and the liberal soul will be made fat. It is an undoubted truth, though little believed, that to be charitable to the poor, and to be free and generous in the support of religion, and any good work, is the surest and safest way of thriving. What is lent to the Lord will be repaid with abundant interest, Ezek. 44. 30.

CHAP. XV.

In this chapter Moses gives orders, I. Concerning the release of debts, every seventh year, v. 1. .6. with a caution, that that be no hindrance to charitable lending, v. 7. .11. II. Concerning the release of servants after seven years' service, v. 12. .18. III. Concerning the sanctification of the firstlings of cattle to God, v. 19. .23.

I. AT the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release. 2. And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother; because it is called the LORD's release; 3. Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release; 4. Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the LORD shall greatly bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it: 5. Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day. 6. For the LORD thy God blesseth thee, as he promised thee; and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee. 7. If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in thy land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother: 8. But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth. 9. Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the LORD against thee, and it be sin unto thee. 10. Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto. 11. For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy, in thy land.

Here is,

I. A law for the relief of poor debtors, such (we may suppose) as were insolvent. Every seventh year was a year of release, in which the ground rested from being tilled, and servants were discharged from their services; and, among other acts of grace, this was one, that they who had borrowed money, and had not been able to pay it before, should this year be released from it; and though, if they were able, they were afterward bound in conscience to repay it, yet from thenceforth the creditor should never recover it by law. Many good expositors think it only forbids the exacting of the debt in the year of release, because, no harvest being gathered in that year, it could not be expected that men should pay their debts then, but that afterward it might be sued for and recovered: so that the release did not extinguish the debt, but only stayed the process for a time. But others think it was release of the debt for ever; and that seems more probable; yet under certain limitations, expressed or implied. It is supposed that the debtor was an Israelite, v. 3. an alien could not take the benefit of this law, and that he was poor, v. 4. that he did not borrow for trade or purchase, but for the subsistence of his family; and that now he could not pay it without reducing himself to poverty, and coming under a necessity of seeking relief in other countries, which might be his temptation to revolt from God. The law is not, that the creditor shall not receive the debt, if the debtor, or his friends for him, can pay it; but he shall not exact it by legal process. The reasons of this law are, 1. To put an honour upon the sabbatical year, because it is called the Lord's release, v. 2. That was God's year for their land, as the weekly sabbath was God's day for themselves, their servants, and cattle; and as by the resting of their ground, so by the release of the debts, God would teach them to depend upon his providence. This year of release typified the grace of the gospel, in which is proclaimed the acceptable year of the Lord, and by which we obtain the release of our debts, that is, the pardon of our sins, and we are taught to forgive injuries, as we are and hope to be forgiven of God. 2. It was to prevent the falling of any Israelite into extreme poverty: so the margin reads, v. 4. To the end there shall be no poor among you, none miserably and scandalously poor, to the reproach of their nation and religion, the reputation of which they ought to preserve. 3. God's security is here given by a divine promise, that whatever they lost by their poor debtors, it should be made up to them in the blessing of God upon all they had and did, v. 4. 6. Let them take care to do their duty, and then God would bless them with such great increase, that what they might lose by bad debts, if they generously remitted them, should not be missed out of their stock at the year's end. Not only, the Lord shall bless thee, v. 4. but, he doth bless thee, v. 6. It is altogether inexcusable, if, though God has given us abundance, so that we have not only enough, but to spare, we are rigorous and severe in our demands from our poor brethren; for our abundance should be the supply of their wants, that at least there may not be such an inequality as is between two extremes, 2 Cor. 8. 14. They must also consider that their land was God's gift to them, that all their increase was the fruit of God's blessing upon them, and therefore that they were bound in duty to him to use and dispose of their estates as he should order and direct them. And, Lastly, if they would remit what little sums they had lent to their poor brethren, it is promised that they should be able to lend great sums to their rich neighbours, even to many nations, v. 6. and should be enriched by those loans. Thus the nations should become subject to them, and dependent on them, as the borrower is servant to the lender, Prov. 22. 7. To be able to lend, and not to have need to borrow, we must look upon a great mercy, and a good reason why we should do good with what we have, lest we provoke God to turn the scales.

II. Here is a law in favour of poor borrowers, that they might not suffer damage by the former law. Men would be apt to argue, If the case of a man be so with his debtor, that if the debt be not paid before the year of release, it shall be lost, it were better not of lend. "No," says this branch of the statute, "thou shalt not think such a thought." 1. It is taken for granted that there would be poor among them, who would have occasion to borrow, v. 7. and that there would never cease to be some such objects of charity, v. 11. The poor shall never cease out of thy land; though not such as were reduced to extreme poverty, yet such as would be behind-hand, and would have occasion to borrow; of such poor he here speaks, and such we have always with us, so that a charitable disposition may soon find a charitable occasion. 2. In such a case we are here commanded to lend or give, according to our ability, or the necessity of the case. Thou shalt not harden thy heart, nor shut thy hand, v. 7. If the hand be shut, it is a sign the heart be hardened; for, if the clouds were full of rain, they would empty themselves, Eccles. 11. 3. Bowels of compassion would produce liberal distributions, Jam. 2. 16. Thou shalt not only stretch out thy hand to him, to reach him something, but thou shalt open thy hand wide unto him, to lend him sufficient, v. 8. Sometimes there is as much charity in prudent lending as in giving, as it obliges the borrower to industry and honesty, and may put him into a way of helping himself. We are sometimes tempted to think, when an object of charity presents itself, we may choose whether we will give any thing or nothing; little or much; whereas it is here an express precept, v. 11. I command thee, not only to give, but to open thy hand wide, to give liberally. 3. Here is a caveat against that objection which might arise against charitable lending, from the foregoing law for the release of debts, v. 9. Beware that there be not a thought, a covetous, ill-natured thought, in thy Belial heart, "The year of release is at hand, and therefore I will not lend what I must then be sure to lose;" lest thy poor brother, whom thou refuseth to lend to, complain to God, and it will be a sin, a great sin to thee.

Note, (1.) The law is spiritual, and lays a restraint upon the thoughts of the heart. We mistake if we think thoughts are free from the divine cognizance and check. (2.) That is a wicked heart indeed, that raises evil thoughts from the good law of God, as their's did, who, because God had obliged them to the charity of forgiving, denied the charity of giving. (3.) We must carefully watch against all those secret suggestions which would divert us from our duty, or discourage us in it. Those that would keep from the act of sin, must keep out of their minds the very thought of sin. (4.) When we have an occasion of charitable lending, if we cannot trust the borrower, we must trust God, and lend, hoping for nothing again in this world, but expecting it will be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, Luke, 6. 35.—14. 14. (5.) It is a dreadful thing to have the cry of the poor against us, for God has his ear open to that cry, and, in compassion to them, will be sure to reckon with those that deal hardly with them. (6.) That which we think is our prudence, often proves sin to us; he that refused to lend, because the year of release was at hand, thought that he did wisely, and that men would praise him as doing well for himself, Ps. 49. 13. But he is here told that he did wickedly, and that God would condemn him as doing ill to his brother; and God is according to truth, and sin to us, will certainly be ruin to us, if it be not repented of. 4. Here is a command to give cheerfully, whatever we give in charity, v. 10. "Thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest." Be not loath to part with thy money on so good an account, nor think it lost: grudge not a kindness to thy brother; and distrust not the providence of God, as if thou shouldst want that thyself which thou givest in charity; but, on the contrary, let it be a pleasure and a satisfaction of soul to thee to think, that thou art honouring God with thy substance, doing good, making thy brother easy, and laying up for thyself a good security for the time to come. What thou doest, do freely, for God loves a cheerful giver," 2 Cor. 9. 7. 5. Here is a promise of a recompence in this life, For this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee. Covetous people say, "Giving undoes us;" no, giving cheerfully in charity will enrich us, it will fill the barns with plenty, Prov. 3. 10. and the soul with true comfort, Isa. 58. 10, 11.

12. And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee. 13. And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty: 14. Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy wine-press: of that wherewith the LORD thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him. 15. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing to day. 16. And it shall be, if he say unto thee, I will not go away from thee; because he loveth thee and thine house, because he is well with thee; 17. Then thou shalt take an awl, and thrust it through his ear unto the door, and he shall be thy servant for ever. And also unto thy maid-servant thou shalt do likewise. 18. It shall not seem hard unto thee, when thou sendest him away free from thee; for he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee, in serving thee six years: and the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all that thou doest.

Here is,

I. A repetition of the law that had been given concerning Hebrew servants, who either had sold themselves for servants, or were sold by their parents through extreme poverty, or were sold by the court of judgment for some crime committed. The law was, 1. That they should serve but six years, and in the seventh should go out free, v. 12. Compare Exod. 21. 2. And if the year of jubilee happened before he served out his time, that would be his discharge. God's Israel were a free people, and must not be compelled to perpetual slavery; thus are God's spiritual Israel called unto liberty. 2. That if, when their six years were expired, they had no mind to go out free, but would rather continue in service, as having less care, though taking more pains, than their masters; in that case, they must lay themselves under an obligation to serve for ever, that is, for life, by having their ears bored to the door-posts, v. 16, 17. Compare Exod. 21. 6. If hereby a man disgraced himself with some, as of a mean and servile spirit, that had not a due sense of the honour and pleasure of liberty; yet, we may suppose, with others he got reputation, as of a quiet, contented spirit, humble, and diligent, and loving, and not given to change.

II. Here is an addition to this law, requiring them to put some small stock into their servants' hands, to set up with for themselves, when they sent them out of their service, v. 13, 14. It was to be supposed that they had nothing of their own, and that their friends had little or nothing for them, else they would have been redeemed before they were discharged by law; they had no wages for their service, and all they got by their labour was their master's, so that their liberty would do them little good, having nothing to begin the world with, therefore they are here commanded to furnish them liberally with corn and cattle; no certain measure is prescribed, that is left to the master's generosity, who, probably, would have respect to the servant's merit and necessity; but the Jewish writers say, "He could not give less than the value of thirty shekels of silver, but as much more as he pleased." The maid-servants, though they were not to have their ears bored, if they were disposed to stay, yet if they went out free, they were to have a gratuity given them; for to that those words refer, v. 17. Unto thy maid-servant thou shalt do likewise.

The reasons for this are taken from the law of gratitude. They must do it, 1. In gratitude to God, who had not only brought them out of Egypt, (v. 15.) but brought them out greatly enriched with the spoils of the Egyptians. Let them not send their servants out empty, for they were not sent empty out of the house of bondage. God's tender care of us, and kindness to us, obliges us to be careful of, and kind to, those that have a dependence upon us. Thus we must render according to the benefit done unto us. 2. In gratitude to their servants, v. 18. "Grudge not to give him a little out of thine abundance, for he has been worth a double hired servant to thee." The days of the hireling at most were but three years, Isa. 16. 14. but he has served thee six years, and, unlike the hired servant, without any wages." Masters and landlords ought to consider what need they have of, and what ease and advantage they have by, their servants and tenants, and should not only be just but kind to them. To these reasons it is added, as before in this chapter, v. 4, 6, 10. The Lord thy God shall bless thee. Then we may expect family-blessings, the springs of family-prosperity, when we make conscience of our duty to our family-relations.

19. All the firstling males that come of thy herd and of thy flock thou shalt sanctify unto the LORD thy God: thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, nor shear the firstling of thy sheep. 20. Thou shalt eat it before the LORD thy God year by year in the place which the LORD shall choose, thou and thy household. 21. And if there be any blemish therein, as if it be lame, or blind, or have any ill blemish, thou shalt not sacrifice it unto the LORD thy God. 22. Thou shalt eat it within thy gates: the unclean and the clean person shall eat it alike, as the roe-buck, and as the hart. 23. Only thou shalt not eat the blood thereof; thou shalt pour it upon the ground as water.

Here is,

I. A repetition of the law concerning the firstlings of their cattle, that, if they were males, they were to be sanctified to the Lord, v. 19. in remembrance of, and in thankfulness for, the sparing of the first-born of Israel, when the first-born of the Egyptians, both of man and beast, were slain by the destroying angel, Exod. 13. 2, 15. on the eighth day it was to be given to God, Exod. 22. 30. and to be divided between the priest and the altar, Numb. 18. 17, 18.

2. An addition to that law, for the farther explication of it, directing them what to do with the firstlings, (1.) That were females. "Thou shalt do no work with the female firstlings of the cow, nor shear those of the sheep," v. 19. of them the learned

Bishop Patrick understands it. Though the female firstlings were not so entirely sanctified to God as the males, nor so early as at eight days old, yet they were not to be converted by the owners to their own use, as their other cattle, but must be offered to God as peace-offerings, or used in a religious feast, at the year's end, v. 20. Thou shalt eat it before the Lord thy God, as directed, ch. 12. 18. (2.) But what must they do with those that were blemished, ill blemished? v. 21. Were it male or female, it must not be brought near the sanctuary, nor used either for sacrifice or for holy feasting, for it would not be fit to honour God with, nor to typify Christ, who is a Lamb without blemish: yet it must not be reared, but killed and eaten at their own houses as common food, v. 22. Only they must be sure not to eat it with the blood, v. 23. The frequent repetition of which caution intimates what need the people had of it, and what stress God laid upon it. What a mercy it is, that we are not under this yoke! We are not dieted, as they were, we make no difference between a first calf, or lamb, and the rest that follow: let us therefore realize the gospel-meaning of this law, devoting ourselves and the first of our time and strength to God, as a kind of first-fruits of his creatures; and using all our comforts and enjoyments to his praise, and under the direction of his law, as we have them all by his gift.

CHAP. XVI.

In this chapter we have, I. A repetition of the laws concerning the three yearly feasts: in particular, That of the passover, v. 1. .8. That of pentecost, v. 9. .12. That of tabernacles, v. 13. .15. And the general law concerning the people's attendance on them, v. 16, 17. II. The institution of an inferior magistracy, and general rules of justice given to those that were called into office, v. 18. .20. III. A caveat against groves and images, v. 21, 22.

1. OBERVE the month of Abib, and keep the passover unto the LORD thy God: for in the month of Abib the LORD thy God brought thee forth out of Egypt by night. 2. Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover unto the LORD thy God, of the flock and the herd, in the place which the LORD shall choose to place his name there. 3. Thou shalt eat no leavened bread with it; seven days shalt thou eat unleavened bread therewith, even the bread of affliction; for thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt in haste: that thou mayest remember the day when thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt all the days of thy life. 4. And there shall be no leavened bread seen with thee in all thy coasts seven days; neither shall there any thing of the flesh, which thou sacrificedst the first day at even, remain all night until the morning. 5. Thou mayest not sacrifice the passover within any of thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee: 6. But at the place which the LORD thy God shall choose to place his name in, there thou shalt sacrifice the passover at even, at the going down of the sun, at the season that thou camest forth out of Egypt. 7. And thou shalt roast and eat it in the place which the LORD thy God shall choose: and thou shalt turn in the morning, and go unto thy tents. 8. Six days thou shalt eat unleavened bread: and on the seventh day shall be a solemn assembly to the LORD thy God: thou shalt do no work therein. 9. Seven weeks shalt thou number unto thee: begin to number the seven weeks from such time as thou beginnest to put the sickle to the thou shalt keep the feast of weeks unto thy God with a tribute of a freewill-offering of thine hand, which thou shalt give unto the LORD thy God, according as the LORD thy God hath blessed thee: 11. And thou shalt rejoice before the LORD thy God, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates, and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are among you, in the place which the LORD thy God hath chosen to place his name there. 12. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt: and thou shalt observe and do these statutes. 13. Thou shalt observe the feast of tabernacles seven days, after that thou hast gathered in thy corn and thy wine: 14. And thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are within thy gates. 15. Seven days shalt thou keep a solemn feast unto the LORD thy God in the place which the LORD shall choose: because the LORD thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thine hands, therefore thou shalt surely rejoice. 16. Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles: and they shall not appear before the LORD empty: 17. Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the LORD thy God which he hath given thee.

Much of the communion between God and his people Israel was kept up, and a face of religion preserved in the nation, by the three yearly feasts, the institution of which, and the laws concerning them, we have several times met with already; and here they are repeated.

1. The law of the passover; so great a solemnity, that it made the whole month, in the midst of which it was placed, considerable, v. 1. Observe the month Abib. Though one week only of that month was to be kept as a festival, yet their preparations before must be so solemn, and their reflections upon it, and improvements of it afterward, so serious, as to amount to an observation of the whole month. The month of Abib, or of new fruits, as the Chaldee translates it, answers to our March, (or part of March, and part of April,) and was, by a special order from God, in remembrance of the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, made the beginning of their year, Exod. 12. 2. which before was reckoned to begin in September.

This month they were to keep the passover, in remembrance of their being brought out of Egypt by night, v. 1. The Chaldee paraphrasts expound it, "Because they came out of Egypt by day-light," there being an express order, that they should not stir out of their doors till morning, Exod. 12. 22. one of them expounds it thus: "He brought thee out of Egypt, and did wonders by night." The other, "and thou shalt eat the passover by night." The laws concerning it are, that God should choose, v. 2. and in no other place, v. 5. . 7. The passover was itself a sacrifice; hence Christ as our Passover is said to be sacrificed for us, 1 Cor. 5. 7. and many other sacrifices were offered during the seven days of the feast, Numb. 28. 19, &c. which are included here, for they are said to be sacrificed of the flock and the herd, whereas the passover itself was only of the flock, either a lamb or a kid: now no sacrifice was accepted but from the altar that sanctified it, it was therefore necessary that they should go up to the place of the altar; for though the pascal lamb was entirely eaten by the owners, yet it must be killed in the court, the blood sprinkled, and the inwards burned upon the altar. By confining them to the appointed place, he kept them to the appointed rule, which they would have been apt to vary from, and to introduce foolish inventions of their own, had they been permitted to offer these sacrifices within their own gates, from under the inspection of the priests. They were also hereby directed to have their eye up unto God in the solemnity, and the desire of their hearts toward the remembrance of his name, being appointed to attend there where he had chosen to place his name, v. 2, and 6. But, when the solemnity was over, they might turn and go unto their tents, v. 7. Some think that they might, if they pleased, return the very morning after the pascal lamb was killed and eaten, the priests and Levites being sufficient to carry on the rest of the week's work; but the first day of the seven is so far from being the day of their dispersion, that it is expressly appointed for a holy convocation, Lev. 23. 7. Numb. 28. 18. therefore we must take it as Jonathan's paraphrase expounds it, in the morning after the end of the feast thou shalt go to thy cities. And it was the practice to keep together the whole week, 2 Chron. 35. 17.

2. That they must eat unleavened bread for seven days, and no leavened bread must be seen in all their coasts, v. 3, 4, 8. The bread they were confined to is here called bread of affliction, because neither grateful to the taste, nor easy of digestion, and therefore proper to signify the heaviness of their spirits in their bondage, and to keep in remembrance the haste in which they came out, the case being so urgent, that they could not stay for the leavening of the bread they took with them for their march. The Jewish writers tell us, that the custom at the passover supper was, that the master of the family brake this unleavened bread, and gave to every one a piece of it, saying, This is, that is, this signifies, represents, or commemorates, (which explains that saying of our Saviour, This is my body,) the bread of affliction, which your fathers did eat in the land of Egypt. The gospel-meaning of this feast of unleavened bread the apostle gives us, 1 Cor. 5. 7. Christ our passover being sacrificed for us, and we having participated of the blessed fruits of that sacrifice to our comfort, let us keep the feast in a holy conversation, free from the leaven of malice toward our brethren, and hypocrisy toward God, and with the unleavened bread of sincerity and love. Lastly, "Observe concerning the passover, for what end it was instituted, that thou mayest remember the day when thou camest forth out of Egypt, not only on the day of the passover, or during the seven days of the feast, but all the days of thy life, v. 3. as a constant inducement to obedience." Thus we celebrate the memorial of Christ's death at certain times, that we may remember it at all times, as a reason why we should live to him that died for us and rose again.

II. Seven weeks after the passover, the feast of pentecost was to be observed, concerning which they are here directed, 1. From whence to number their seven weeks, from the time thou beginnest to put the sickle to the corn, v. 9. that is, from the morrow after the first day of the feast of unleavened bread, for on that day (though it is probable the people did not begin their harvest till the feast was ended) messengers were sent to reap a sheaf of barley, which was to be offered to God as the first-fruits, Lev. 23. 10. Some think it implies a particular care which Providence would take of their land with respect to the weather, that their harvest should be always ripe and ready for the sickle just at the same time. 2. How they were to keep this feast. (1.) They must bring an offering unto God, v. 10. It is here called a tribute of a freewill-offering. It was required of them as a tribute to their Sovereign Lord and Owner, under whom they held all they had;

and yet, because the law did not determine the quantum, but it was left to every man's generosity to bring what he chose, and whatever he brought he must give cheerfully; it is therefore called a freewill-offering. It was a grateful acknowledgment of the goodness of God to them in the mercies of these corn-harvests now finished, and therefore must be according as God had blessed them. Where God sows plentifully, he expects to reap accordingly. (2.) They must rejoice before God, v. 11. Holy joy is the heart and soul of thankful praises, which are as the language and expression of holy joy. They must rejoice in their receivings from God, and in their returns of service and sacrifice to him; our duty must be our delight as well as our enjoyment. They must have their very servants to rejoice with them, "for remember (v. 12.) that thou wast a bondman, and wouldest have been very thankful if thy taskmasters would have given thee some time and cause for rejoicing; and thy God did bring thee out to keep a feast with gladness; therefore be pleasant with thy servants, and make them easy." And, it should seem, those general words, Thou shalt observe and do these statutes, are added here for a particular reason, because this feast was kept in remembrance of the giving of the law upon mount Sinai, fifty days after they came out of Egypt; now the best way of expressing our thankfulness to God for his favour to us in giving us his law, is, to observe and do according to the precepts of it.

III. They must keep the feast of tabernacles, v. 13. . 15. Here is no repetition of the law concerning the sacrifices that were to be offered in great abundance at this feast, which we had at large, Numb. 29. 12, &c. because the care of these belonged to the priests and Levites, who had not so much need of a repetition as the people had, and because the spiritual part of the service, which consisted in holy joy, was most pleasing to God, and was to be the perpetual duty of a gospel-conversation, which this feast was typical of. Observe, what stress is laid upon it here, Thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, v. 14. and because the Lord shall bless thee, thou shalt surely rejoice, v. 15. Note, 1. It is the will of God that his people should be a cheerful people. If they that were under the law must rejoice before God, much more must we, that are under the grace of the gospel, which makes it our duty, not only, as here, to rejoice in our feasts, but to rejoice evermore; to rejoice in the Lord always. 2. When we rejoice in God ourselves, we should do what we can to assist others also to rejoice in him, by comforting the mourners, and supplying the necessitous, that even the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, may rejoice with us. See Job, 29. 13. 3. We must rejoice in God, not only because of what we have received, and are receiving from him daily, but because of what he has promised, and we expect to receive yet further from him: Because he shall bless thee, therefore thou shalt rejoice. Those that make God their joy, may rejoice in hope, for he is faithful that has promised.

Lastly, The laws concerning the three solemn feasts are summed up, v. 16, 17. as often before, Exod. 23. 16, 17.—34. 23. The general commands concerning them are, 1. That all the males must then make their personal appearance before God, that, by their frequent meeting to worship God, at the same place, and by the same rule, they might be kept faithful and constant to that holy religion which was established among them. 2. That none must appear before God empty, but every man must bring some offering or other, in token of a dependence upon God, and gratitude to him. And God was not unreasonable in his demands; let every man but give as he was able, and no more was expected. The same is still the rule of charity, 1 Cor. 16. 2. They that give to their power shall be accepted, but they that give beyond their power are accounted worthy of double honour, 2 Cor. 8. 3. as the poor widow that gave all she had, Luke, 21. 4.

18. Judges and officers shalt thou make thee in all thy gates, which the LORD thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes: and they shall judge the people with just judgment. 19. Thou shalt not wrest judgment; thou shalt not respect persons, neither take a gift: for a gift doth blind the eyes of the wise, and pervert the words of the righteous. 20. That which is altogether just shalt thou follow, that thou mayest live, and inherit the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. 21. Thou shalt not plant thee a grove of any trees near unto the altar of the LORD thy God, which thou shalt make thee. 22. Neither shalt thou set thee up any image; which the LORD thy God hateth.

Here is,

1. Care taken for the due administration of justice among them, that controversies might be determined, matters in variance adjusted, the injured righted, and the injurious punished. While they were encamped in the wilderness, they had judges and officers according to their numbers, rulers of thousands and hundreds, Exod. 18. 25. When they came to Canaan, they must have them according to their towns and cities, in all their gates; for the courts of judgment sat in the gates.

Now, (1.) Here is a commission given to these inferior magistrates, "Judges, to try and pass sentence, and officers, to execute their sentences, shalt thou make thee." However the persons were pitched upon, whether by the nomination of their Sovereign, or by the election of the people, the powers were ordained of God, Rom. 13. 1. And it was a great mercy to the people thus to have justice brought to their doors, that it might be more expeditious and less expensive; a blessing, which we of this nation ought to be very thankful for. Pursuant to this law, beside the great Sanhedrim that sat at the sanctuary, consisting of seventy elders, and a president, there was in the larger cities, such as had in them above 120 families, a court of twenty-three judges; in the smaller cities, a court of three judges. See this law revived by Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. 19. 5, 8.

(2.) Here is a command given to these magistrates to do justice in the execution of the trust reposed in them. Better not judge at all, than not judge with just judgment; according to the direction of the law, and the evidence of the fact. The judges are here cautioned not to do wrong to any, (v. 19.) nor to take any gifts, which would tempt them to do wrong. This law had been given before; (Exod. 23. 8.) and they are charged to do justice to all, (v. 20.) "That which is altogether just shalt thou follow. Adhere to the principles of justice; act by the rules of justice, countenance the demands of justice, imitate the patterns of justice, and pursue with resolution that which appears to be just. Justice, justice, shalt thou follow." This is that which the magistrate is to have in his eye, on this he must be intent, and to this all personal regards must be sacrificed, to do right to all, and wrong to none.

2. Care taken for the preventing of all conformity to the idolatrous customs of the heathen, v. 21, 22. They must not only not join with the idolaters in their worships, not visit their groves, nor bow before the images which they had set up, but, (1.) They must not plant a grove, nor so much as a tree, near God's altar, lest they should make it look like the altars of the false gods. They made groves the places of their worship, either to make it secret, but that which is true and good, desires the light rather; or to make it solemn, but the worship of the true God has enough in itself to make it so, and needs not the advantage of such a circumstance. (2.) They must not set up any image, statue, or pillar, to the honour of God, for it is a thing which the Lord hates; nothing belies or reproaches him more, or tends more to corrupt and debauch the minds of men, than representing and worshipping by an image that God who is an infinite and eternal Spirit.

CHAP. XVII.

The charge of this chapter is, I. Concerning the purity and perfection of all those animals that were offered in sacrifices, v. 1. II. Concerning the punishment of those that worshipped idols, v. 2—7. III. Concerning appeals from the inferior courts to the great Sanhedrim, v. 8—13. IV. Concerning the choice and duty of a king, v. 14—20.

1. THOU shalt not sacrifice unto the LORD thy God any bullock, or sheep, wherein is blemish, or any evil-favouredness: for that is an abomination unto the LORD thy God. 2. If there be found among you, within any of thy gates which the LORD thy God giveth thee, man or woman, that hath wrought wickedness in the sight of the LORD thy God, in transgressing his covenant, 3. And hath gone and served other gods and worshipped them, either the sun, or moon, or any of the host of heaven, which I have not commanded; 4. And it be told thee, and thou hast heard of it, and inquired diligently, and, behold, it be true, and the thing certain, that such abomination is wrought in Israel; 5. Then shalt thou bring forth that man or that woman, which have committed that wicked thing, unto thy gates, even that man or that woman, and shalt stone them with stones, till they die. 6. At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall he that is worthy of death, be put to death: but at the mouth of one witness, he shall not be put to death. 7. The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the hands of all the people. So thou shalt put the evil away from among you.

Here is,

1. A law for preserving the honour of God's worship, by providing that no creature that had any blemish, should be offered in sacrifice to him, v. 1. This caveat we have often met with. Thou shalt not sacrifice that which has any blemish, which renders it unsightly, or any evil matter or thing, (as the following word might better be rendered,) any sickness or weakness, though not discernable at first view: it is an abomination to God. God is the best of beings, and therefore whatsoever he is served with, ought to be the best in its kind. And the Old-Testament sacrifices in a special manner must be so, because they were types of Christ, who is a Lamb without blemish or spot, (1 Pet. 1. 19.) perfectly pure from all sin and all appearance of it. In the latter times of the Jewish church, when by the captivity in Babylon they were cured of idolatry, yet they were charged with profaneness in the breach of this law, inasmuch as they offered the blind and the lame and the sick for sacrifice, Mal. 1. 8.

2. A law for the punishing of those that worshipped false gods. It was made a capital crime to seduce others to idolatry, (ch. 13.) here it is made no less to be seduced. If the blind thus mislead the blind, both must fall into the ditch. Thus God would possess them with a dread of that sin, which they must conclude exceeding sinful, when so many sanguinary laws were made against it, and would deter those from it that would not otherwise be persuaded against it: and yet the law which works death, proved ineffectual.

See here, (1.) What the crime was, against which this law was levelled, serving or worshipping other gods, v. 3. That which was the most ancient and plausible idolatry, is specified, worshipping the sun, moon, and stars; and if that was so detestable a thing, much more was it so to worship stocks and stones, or the representations of mean and contemptible animals. Of this it is said, [1.] That it is what God had not commanded. He had again and again forbidden it; but it is thus expressed, to intimate that if there had been no more against it, this had been enough, (for in the worship of God, his institution and appointment must be our rule and warrant,) and that God never commanded his worshippers to debase themselves so far as to do homage to their fellow-creatures: had God commanded them to do it, they might justly have complained of it as a reproach and disparagement to them; yet when he has forbidden it, they will, from a spirit of contradiction, put this indignity upon themselves. [2.] That it is wickedness in the sight of God, v. 2. Be it never so industriously concealed, he sees it, and be it never so ingeniously palliated, he hates it: it is a sin in itself exceeding heinous, and the highest affront that can be offered to Almighty God. [3.] That it is a transgression of the covenant. It was on this condition that God took them to be his peculiar people, that they should serve and worship him only as their God, so that if they gave to any other the honour which was due to him alone, the covenant was void, and all the benefit of it forfeited. Other sins were transgressions of the command, but this was a transgression of the covenant. It was spiritual adultery, which breaks the marriage-bond. [4.] That it is abomination in Israel, v. 4. Idolatry was bad enough in any, but it was particularly abominable in Israel, a people so blessed with peculiar discoveries of the will and favour of the only true and living God.

(2.) How it must be tried. Upon information given of it, or any ground of suspicion that any person whatsoever, man or woman, had served other gods, [1.] Inquiry must be made, v. 4. Though it appears not certain at first, it may afterward upon search appear so; and if it can possibly be discovered, it must not be unpunished: if not, yet the very inquiry concerning it would possess the country with a dread of it. [2.] Evidence must be given in, v. 6. How heinous and dangerous soever the crime is, yet they must not punish any for it, unless there were good proof against them, by two witnesses at least. They must not, under pretence of honouring God, wrong an innocent man. This law, which requires two witnesses in case of life, we had before, Numb. 35. 30. it is quoted, Matth. 18. 16.

(3.) What sentence must be passed and executed. So great a punishment as death, so great a death as stoning, must be inflicted on the idolater, be it man or woman, for the infirmity of the weaker sex would be no excuse, v. 5. The place of execution must be the gate of the city, that the shame might be the greater to the criminal, and the warning the more public to all others. The hands of the witnesses, in this as in other cases, must be first upon him, that is, they must cast the first stone at him, thereby avowing their testimony, and solemnly imprecating the guilt of his blood upon themselves if their evidence were false. This custom might be of use to deter men from false witness-bearing. The witnesses are really, and therefore it was required that they should be actually, the death of the malefactor. But they must be followed, and the execution completed, by the hands of all the people, who were thus to testify their detestation of the crime, and to put the evil away from among them, as before, ch. 13. 9.

8. If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, between blood and blood, between plea and plea, and between stroke and stroke, being matters of controversy within thy gates: then shalt thou arise, and get thee up into the place which the LORD thy God shall choose; 9. And thou shalt come unto the priests the Levites, and unto the judge that shall be in those days, and inquire; and they shall show thee the sentence of judgment: 10. And thou shalt do according to the sentence, which they of that place which the LORD shall choose, shall shew thee: and thou shalt observe to do according to all that they inform thee: 11. According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do: thou shalt not decline from the sentence which they shall shew thee, to the right hand nor to the left. 12. And the man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken unto the priest that standeth to minister there before the LORD thy God, or unto the judge, even that man shall die: and thou shalt put away the evil from Israel. 13. And all the people shall hear, and fear, and do no more presumptuously.

Courts of judgment were ordered to be erected in every city, (ch. 16. 18.) and they were empowered to hear and determine causes according to law, both those which we call pleas of the crown, and those between party and party; and we may suppose, that ordinarily they ended the matters that were brought before them, and their sentence was definitive; but,

1. It is here taken for granted, that sometimes a case might come into their court too difficult for those inferior judges to determine, who could not be thought to be so learned in the laws as those that presided in the higher courts. So that (to speak in the language of our law) they must find a special verdict, and take time to advise before the giving of judgment; (v. 8.) If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment, which it would be no dishonour to the judges to own the difficulty of, suppose it between blood and blood, the blood of a person which cried, and the blood of him that was charged with the murder, which was demanded; when it was doubtful upon the evidence, whether it was wilful or casual; or between plea and plea, the plea, that is, the bill, or declaration, of the plaintiff, and the plea of the defendant; between stroke and stroke, in actions of assault and battery; in these and the like cases, though the evidence were plain, yet doubts might arise about the sense and meaning of the law, and the application of it to the particular case.

2. These difficult cases, which hitherto had been brought to Moses, according to Jethro's advice, were, after his death, to be brought to the supreme power, wherever it was lodged, whether in a judge, when there was such an extraordinary person raised up, and qualified for that great service, as Othniel, Deborah, Gideon, &c. or in the High-priest, when he was by the eminency of his gifts called of God to preside in public affairs, as Eli; or, (if no singular person were marked by heaven for this honour,) then in the priests and Levites, (or in the priests, who were Levites of course,) who not only attended the sanctuary, but met in council, to receive appeals from the inferior courts, who might reasonably be supposed, not only to be best qualified by their learning and experience, but to have the best assistance of the divine Spirit for the deciding of doubts, v. 9, 11, 12. They are not appointed to consult the Urim and Thummim, for it is supposed that that was to be consulted only in cases relating to the public, either the body of the people, or the prince: but in ordinary cases, the wisdom and integrity of those that sat at the stern, must be relied on, their judgment concerning the meaning of the law must be acquiesced in, and the sentence must be passed accordingly: and though their judgment had not the divine authority of an oracle, yet, beside the moral certainty it had, as the judgment of knowing, prudent, and experienced men, it had the advantage of a divine promise, implied in those words, (v. 9.) They shall show thee the sentence of judgment; it had also the support of a divine institution, by which they were made the supreme judicature of the nation.

3. The definitive sentence given by the judge, priest, or great council, must be obeyed by the parties concerned, upon pain of death. Thou shalt do according to their sentence, (v. 10.) thou shalt observe to do it, thou shalt not decline from it, (v. 11.) to the right hand or to the left. Note, It is for the honour of God and the welfare of a people, that the authority of the higher power be supported, and the due order of government observed; that those be obeyed, who are appointed to rule, and that every soul be subject to them in all those things that fall within their commission. Though the party thought himself injured by the sentence, (as every man is apt to be partial in his own cause,) yet he must needs be subject, must stand to the award, how displeasing soever, and bear, or lose, or pay, according to it, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake. But if an inferior judge contradict the sentence of the higher court, and will not execute the orders of it, or a private person refuse to conform himself to their sentence, the contumacy must be punished with death, though the matter were never so small in which the opposition was made, That man shall die, and all the people shall hear and fear, v. 12, 13. See here, 1. The evil of disobedience: rebellion, and stubbornness, from a spirit of contradiction and opposition to God, or those in authority under him, from a principle of contempt and self-willedness, are as witchcraft and idolatry. To differ in opinion from weakness and infirmity may be excused, and must be borne with; but to do presumptuously, in pride and wickedness, (as the ancient translations explain it,) this is to take up arms against the government, and is an affront to him by whom the powers that be are ordained. 2. The design of punishment; that others may hear and fear, and not do the like. Some would be so considerate as to infer the heinousness of the offence from the grievousness of the penalty, and therefore would detest it; and others would so far consult their own safety, as to cross their humours by conforming to the sentence, rather than to sin against their own heads, and forfeit their lives by going contrary to it. From this law the apostle infers the soreness of the punishment they will be thought worthy of, that trample on the authority of the Son of God, Heb. 10. 28, 29.

14. When thou art come unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me; 15. Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the LORD thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee: thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother. 16. But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the LORD hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way. 17. Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, that his heart turn not away: neither shall he greatly multiply to himself silver and gold. 18. And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites: 19. And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the LORD his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them: 20. That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left: to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel.

After the laws which concerned subjects, fitly followed the laws which concern kings; for they that rule others must themselves remember that they are under command. Here are laws given,

I. To the electors of the empire, what rules they must go by in making their choice, v. 14, 15. 1. It is here supposed that the people would, in process of time, be desirous of a king, whose royal pomp and power would be thought to make their nation look great among their neighbours. Their having a king is neither promised as a mercy, nor commanded as a duty, (nothing could be better for them than the divine regimen they were under,) but it is permitted them, if they desired it: if they would but take care to have the ends of government answered, and God's laws duly observed and put in execution, they should not be tied to any one form of government, but should be welcome to have a king. Though something irregular is supposed to be the principle of the desire, that they might be like the nations, (whereas God many ways distinguished them from the nations,) yet God would indulge them in it, because he intended to serve his own purposes by it, in making the regal government typical of the kingdom of the Messiah. 2. They are directed in their choice. If they will have a king over them, as God foresaw they would, (though it does not appear that ever the motion was made till almost 400 years after,) then they must, (1.) Ask counsel at God's mouth, and make him king whom God shall choose; and happy it was for them that they had an oracle to consult in so weighty an affair, and a God to choose for them who knows infallibly what every man is, and will be. Kings are God's vicegerents, and therefore it is fit that he should have the choosing of them: God had himself been in a particular manner Israel's King, and if they set another over them, under him, it was necessary that he should nominate the person. Accordingly, when the people desired a king, they applied themselves to Samuel, a prophet of the Lord; and afterward David, Solomon, Jeroboam, Jehu, and others, were chosen by the prophets; and the people are reprov'd for not observing this law, Hos. 8. 4. They have set up kings, but not by me. In all cases, God's choice, if we can but know it, should direct, determine, and overrule our's. (2.) They must not choose a foreigner, under pretence of strengthening their alliances, or of the extraordinary fitness of the person, lest a strange king should introduce strange customs or usages, contrary to those that were established by the divine law: but he must be one from among thy brethren, that he may be a type of Christ, who is bone of our bone, Heb. 2. 14.

II. Laws are here given to the prince that should be elected, for the due administration of the government.

1. He must carefully avoid every thing that would divert him from God and religion. Riches, honours, and pleasures are the three great hindrances of godliness, (the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life,) especially to those in high stations: against these therefore the king is here warned. (1.) He must not gratify the love of honour by multiplying horses, v. 16. He that rode upon a horse (a stately creature) in a country where asses and mules were generally used, looked very great; and therefore, though he might have horses for his own saddle, and chariots, yet he must not set servants on horseback, Eccl. 10. 7. nor have many horses for his officers and guards; when God was their King, his judges rode on asses, Judg. 5. 10.—12. 14. nor must he multiply horses for war, lest he should trust too much to them, Ps. 20. 7.—33. 17. Hos. 14. 3. The reason here given against his multiplying horses, is, because it would produce a greater correspondence with Egypt, (which furnished Canaan with horses, 1 Kings, 10. 28, 29.) than it was fit that the Israel of God should have, who were brought thence with such a high hand. Ye shall return no more that way; for fear of being infected with the idolatries of Egypt, (Lev. 18. 3.) to which they were very prone. Note, We should take heed of that commerce or conversation by which we are in danger of being drawn into sin. If Israel must not return to Egypt, they must not trade with Egypt; Solomon got no good by it. (2.) He must not gratify the love of pleasure by multiplying wives, v. 17. as Solomon did to his undoing, 1 Kings, 11. 1. that his heart, being set upon them, turn not away from business, and every thing that is serious, and especially from the exercise of piety and devotion, to which nothing is a greater enemy than the indulgence of the flesh. (3.) He must not gratify the love of riches by greatly multiplying silver and gold. A competent treasure is allowed him, and he is not forbidden to be a good husband of it, but, [1.] He must not greatly multiply money so as to oppress his people by raising it, (as Solomon seems to have done, 1 Kings 12. 4.) nor so as to deceive himself, by trusting to it and setting his heart upon it, Ps. 62. 10. [2.] He must not multiply it to himself. David multiplied silver and gold, but it was for the service of God, (1 Chron. 29. 4.) not for himself; for his people, not for his own family.

2. He must carefully apply himself to the law of God, and make that his rule. This must be to him better than all riches, honours, and pleasures, than many horses or many wives, better than thousands of gold and silver.

(1.) He must write himself a copy of the law out of the original, which was in the custody of the priests that attended the sanctuary, v. 18. Some think that he was to write only this book of Deuteronomy, which is an abstract of the law, and the precepts of which, being mostly moral and judicial, concerned the king, more than the laws in Leviticus and Numbers, which, being ceremonial, concerned chiefly the priests. Others think that he was to transcribe all the five books of Moses, which are called the law; and which were preserved together as the foundation of their religion. Now, [1.] Though the king might be presumed to have very fair copies by him from his ancestors, yet beside those, he must have one of his own: it might be presumed that theirs were worn with constant use, he must have a fresh one to begin the world with. [2.] Though he had secretaries about him whom he might employ to write this copy, and who perhaps could write a better hand than he, yet he must do it himself, with his own hand, for the honour of the law, and that he might think no act of religion below him, to inure himself to labour and study, and especially that he might thereby be obliged to take particular notice of every part of the law, and by writing it might imprint it in his mind. Note, It is of great use for each of us to write down what we observe as most affecting and edifying to us, out of the scriptures and good books, and out of the sermons we hear. A prudent pen may go far toward making up the deficiencies of memory, and the furnishing of the treasures of the good householder with things new and old. [3.] He must do this even when he sits upon the throne of his kingdom; provided that he had not done it before. When he begins to apply himself to business, he must apply himself to this in the first place. He that sits upon the throne of a kingdom, cannot but have his hands full. The affairs of his kingdom both at home and abroad call for a large share of his time and thoughts, and yet he must write himself a copy of the law. Let not those who call themselves men of business, think that this will excuse them from making religion their business; nor let great men think it any disparagement to them, to write for themselves those great things of God's law which he hath written to them. Hos. 8. 12.

(2.) Having a Bible by him of his own writing, he must not think it enough to keep it in his cabinet, but he must read therein all the days of his life, v. 19. It is not enough to have Bibles, but we must use them, use them daily, as the duty and necessity of every day require: our souls must have their constant meals of that manna; and if well digested, it will be true nourishment and strength to them. As the body is receiving benefit by his food continually, and not only when it is eating, so is the soul, by the word of God, if it meditate therein day and night, Ps. 1. 2. And we must persevere in the use of the written word of God as long as we live. Christ's scholars never learn above their Bibles, but will have a constant occasion for them, till they come to that world where knowledge and love with both be made perfect.

(3.) His writing and reading were all nothing, if he did not reduce to practice what he wrote and read, v. 19, 20. The word of God is not designed merely to be an entertaining subject of speculation, but to be a commanding rule of conversation. Let him know,

[1.] What dominion his religion must have over him, and what influence it must have upon him. First, It must possess him with a very reverent and awful regard to the divine majesty and authority. He must learn (and thus the most learned must be ever learning) to fear the Lord his God; and as high as he is, must remember that God is above him, and whatever fear his subjects owe to him, that, and much more, he owes to God as his King. Secondly, It must engage him to a constant observance of the law of God, and a conscientious obedience to it, as the effect of that fear. He must keep all the words of this law, (he is custos utriusque tabule—the keeper of both tables,) not only to take care that others do them, but to do them himself as an humble servant to the God of heaven, and a good example to his inferiors. Thirdly, It must keep him humble; how much soever he is advanced, let him keep his spirit low, and let the fear of his God prevent the contempt of his brethren; and let not his heart be lifted up above them, so as to carry himself haughtily or disdainfully toward them, and to trample upon them; let him not conceit himself better than they, because he is greater, and makes a fairer show, but let him remember that he is the minister of God to them for good, (major singulis, but minor universis—greater than any one, but less than the whole.) It must prevent his errors, either on the right hand, or on the left, (for there are errors on both hands,) and keep him right, in all instances, to his God and to his duty.

[2.] What advantage his religion would be of to him. They that fear God and keep his commandments, will certainly fare the better for it in this world. The greatest monarch in the world may receive more benefit by religion, than by all the wealth and power of his monarchy. It will be of advantage, First, To his person. He shall prolong his days in his kingdom. We find in the history of the kings of Judah, that, generally, the best reigns were the longest, except when God shortened them for the punishment of the people; as Josiah's. Secondly, To his family; his children shall also prosper. Entail religion upon posterity, and God will entail a blessing upon it.

CHAP. XVIII.

In this chapter, I. The rights and revenues of the church are settled, and rules given concerning the Levites' ministrations and maintenance, v. 1—8. II. The caution against the idolatrous abominable customs of the heathen is repeated, v. 9—14. III. A promise is given them of the spirit of prophecy to continue among them, and to centre at last in Christ the Great Prophet, v. 15—18. Wrath threatened against those that despise prophecy, (v. 19.) or counterfeit it, (v. 20.) and a rule given for the trial of it, v. 21, 22.

1. THE priests the Levites, and all the tribe of Levi, shall have no part nor inheritance with Israel: they shall eat the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and his inheritance. 2. Therefore shall they have no inheritance among their brethren: the LORD is their inheritance, as he hath said unto them. 3. And this shall be the priest's due from the people, from them that offer a sacrifice, whether it be ox or sheep; and they shall give unto the priest the shoulder, and the two cheeks, and the maw. 4. The first-fruits also of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the first of the fleece of thy sheep, shalt thou give him. 5. For the LORD thy God hath chosen him out of all thy tribes, to stand to minister in the name of the LORD, him and his sons for ever. 6. And if a Levite come from any of thy gates out of all Israel, where he sojourned, and come with all the desire of his mind unto the place which the LORD shall choose; 7. Then he shall minister in the name of the LORD his God, as all his brethren the Levites do, which stand there before the LORD. 8. They shall have like portions to eat, beside that which cometh of the sale of his patrimony.

Magistracy and ministry are two divine institutions of admirable use for the support and advancement of the kingdom of God among men; laws concerning the former we had in the close of the foregoing chapter, directions are in this given concerning the latter. Landmarks are here set between the estates of the priests and those of the people.

I. Care is taken that the priests entangle not themselves with the affairs of this life, nor enrich themselves with the wealth of this world; they have better things to mind. They shall have no part nor inheritance with Israel, that is, no share either in the spoils taken in war, or in the land that was to be divided by lot, v. 1. Their warfare and husbandry are both spiritual, and enough to fill their hands both with work and profit, and to content them. The Lord is their inheritance, v. 2. Note, Those that have God for their inheritance, according to the new covenant, should not be greedy of great things in the world; neither gripe what they have, nor grasp at more, but look upon all present things with the indifference which becomes those that believe God to be all-sufficient.

II. Care is likewise taken that they want not any of the comforts and conveniences of this life. Though God, who is a Spirit, is their inheritance, it does not therefore follow that they must live upon the air: No,

1. The people must provide for them. They must have their due from the people, v. 3. Their maintenance must not depend upon the generosity of the people, but they must be by law entitled to it. He that is taught in the word ought, in justice, to communicate to him that teaches him; and he that has the benefit of solemn religious assemblies, to contribute to the comfortable support of those that preside in such assemblies. (1.) The priests, who in their courses served at the altar, had their share of the sacrifices, namely, the peace-offerings, that were brought while they were in waiting; beside the breast and shoulder, which were appointed them before, Lev. 7. 32. 34. the cheeks and maw are here ordered to be given them; so far was the law from diminishing what was already granted, that it gave them an augmentation. (2.) The first-fruits which arose within such a precinct were brought in, as it should seem, to the priests that resided among them, for their maintenance in the country; the first of their corn and wine for food, and the first of their fleece for clothing, v. 4. for the priests, who were employed to teach others, ought themselves to learn, having food and raiment, to be therewith content. The first-fruits were devoted to God, and he constituted the priests his receivers; and if God reckons what is, in general, given to the poor, lent to him, to be repaid with interest, much more what is, in particular, given to poor ministers. There is a good reason given for this constant charge upon their estates, v. 5. because the Levites were chosen of God, and his choice must be owned and countenanced, and those honoured by us whom he honours; and because they stood to minister, and ought to be recompensed for their attendance and labour, especially since it was in the name of the Lord, by his warrant, in his service, and for his praise, and this charge entailed upon their seed for ever; those who were thus engaged, and thus employed, ought to have all due encouragement given them, as some of the most needful useful members of their commonwealth.

2. The priests must not themselves stand in one another's light. If a priest, that by the law was obliged to serve at the altar, only in his turn, and was paid for that, should, out of his great affection to the sanctuary, devote himself to a constant attendance there, and quit the ease and pleasure of the city in which he had his lot, for the satisfaction of serving the altar, the priests, whose turn it was to attend, must admit him both to join in the work. and to share in the wages, and not grudge him either the honour of the one, or the profit of the other, though it might seem to break in upon them, v. 6. 8. Note, A hearty pious zeal to serve God and his church, though it may a little encroach upon a settled order, and there may be somewhat in it that looks irregular, yet ought to be gratified, and not discouraged. He that appears to have a hearty affection to the sanctuary, and loves dearly to be employed in the service of it, in God's name let him minister, he shall be as welcome to God as the Levites whose course it was to minister, and should be so to them. The settling of the courses was intended rather to secure those to the work that were not willing to do so much, than to exclude any that were willing to do more. And he that thus serves as a volunteer shall have as good pay as the pressed men, beside that which comes of the sale of his patrimony. The church of Rome obliges those who leave their estates, to go into a monastery, to bring the profits of their estate with them into the common stock of the monastery, for gain is their godliness; but here it is ordered that the pious devotee should reserve to himself the produce of his patrimony; for religion and the ministry were never appointed of God, however they have been abused by men, to serve a secular interest.

9. When thou art come into the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations of those nations.

10. There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, 11. Or a charmer, or a consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer. 12. For all that do these things are an abomination unto the LORD: and because of these abominations the LORD thy God doth drive them out from before thee. 13. Thou shalt be perfect with the LORD thy God. 14. For these nations, which thou shalt possess, hearkened unto observers of times, and unto diviners: but as for thee, the LORD thy God hath not suffered thee so to do.

One would not think there had been so much need, as it seems there was, to arm the people of Israel against the infection of the idolatrous customs of the Canaanites. Was it possible that a people so blessed with divine institutions should ever admit the brutish and barbarous inventions of men and devils? Were they in any danger of making those their tutors and directors in religion, whom God had made their captives and tributaries? It seems they were in danger, and therefore, after many the like cautions, they are here charged not to do after the abominations of those nations, v. 9.

I. Some particulars are specified: as, 1. The consecrating of their children to Moloch, an idol that represented the sun, by making them to pass through the fire, and sometimes consuming them as sacrifices in the fire, v. 10. See the law against this, before, Lev. 18. 21. 2. Using arts of divination, to get the unnecessary knowledge of things to come; enchantments, witchcrafts, charms, &c. by which the power and knowledge peculiar to God were attributed to the devil, to the great reproach both of God's counsels and of his providence, v. 10, 11. One would wonder that such arts and works of darkness, so senseless and absurd, so impious and profane, could be found in a country where divine revelation shone so clear; yet we find remains of them even there where Christ's holy religion is known and professed; such are the powers and policies of the rulers of the darkness of this world. But let those that give heed to fortune-tellers, or go to wizards for the discovery of things secret, that use spells for the cure of diseases, are in any league or acquaintance with familiar spirits, or form a confederacy with those that are—let them know that they can have no fellowship with God while thus they have fellowship with devils. It is amazing to think that there should be any pretenders of this kind in such a land and day of light as we live in.

II. Some reasons are given against their conformity to the customs of the Gentiles. 1. Because it would make them abominable to God. The things themselves being hateful to him, those that do them are an abomination; and miserable is that creature that is become odious to its Creator, v. 12. See the malignity and mischievousness of sin: that must needs be an evil thing indeed, which provokes the God of mercy to detest the work of his own hands. 2. Because these abominable practices had been the ruin of the Canaanites, which ruin they were not only the witnesses but the instruments of. It would be the most inexcusable folly, as well as the most unpardonable impiety, for them to practise themselves those very things for which they had been employed so severely to chastise others. Did the land spew out the abominations of the Canaanites, and shall Israel lick up the vomit? 3. Because they were better taught, v. 13, 14. It is an argument like that of the apostle against Christians walking as the Gentiles walked, Eph. 4. 17, 18, 20. Ye have not so learned Christ. "It is true, these nations, whom God gave up to their own hearts' lusts, and suffered to walk in their own ways, Acts, 14, 16. did thus corrupt themselves; but thou art not thus abandoned by the grace of God, the Lord thy God has not suffered thee to do so, thou art instructed in divine things, and hast fair warning given thee of the evil of those practices; and therefore, whatever others do, it is expected that thou shouldst be perfect with the Lord thy God," that is, "that thou shouldst give divine honours to him, to him only, and to no other, and not mix any of the superstitious customs of the heathen with his institutions." One of the Chaldee paraphrasts here takes notice of God's furnishing them with the oracle of Urim and Thummim, as a preservative from all unlawful arts of divination. They were fools, who would go to consult the father of lies, when they had such a ready way of consulting the God of truth.

15. The LORD thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet from the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me; unto him ye shall hearken; 16. According to all that thou desiredst of the LORD thy God in Horeb in the day of the assembly, saying, Let me not hear again the voice of the LORD my God, neither let me see this great fire any more, that I die not. 17. And the LORD said unto me, They have well spoken that which they have spoken. 18. I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him. 19. And it shall come to pass, that whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him. 20. But the prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name, which I have not commanded him to speak, or that shall speak in the name of other gods, even that prophet shall die. 21. And if thou say in thine heart, How shall we know the word which the LORD hath not spoken? 22. When a prophet speaketh in the name of the LORD, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the LORD hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously: thou shalt not be afraid of him.

Here is,

I. The promise of the Great Prophet, with a command to receive him, and hearken unto him. Now,

1. Some think it is the promise of a succession of prophets, that should for many ages be kept up in Israel. Beside the priests and Levites, their ordinary ministers, whose office it was to teach Jacob God's law, they should have prophets, extraordinary ministers, to reprove them for their faults, remind them of their duty, and to foretell things to come, judgments for warning, and deliverances for their comfort. Having these prophets, (1.) They need not use divinations, nor consult with familiar spirits, for they might inquire of God's prophets even concerning their private affairs, as Saul did when he was in quest of his father's asses, 1 Sam. 9. 6. (2.) They could not miss the way of their duty through ignorance or mistake, nor differ in their opinions about it, having prophets among them, whom, in every difficult doubtful case, they might advise with, and appeal to. These prophets were like unto Moses in some respects, though far inferior to him, Deut. 34. 10.

2. Whether a succession of prophets be included in this promise or not, we are sure that it is primarily intended as a promise of Christ, and it is the clearest promise of him that is in all the law of Moses. It is expressly applied to our Lord Jesus as the Messiah promised, Acts, 3. 22.—7. 37. and the people had an eye to this promise when they said concerning him, This is of a truth that Prophet that should come into the world, John, 6. 14. and it was his Spirit that spake in all the other prophets, 1 Pet. 1. 11. Observe,

(1.) What it is that is here promised concerning Christ; what God promised Moses at mount Sinai, which he relates, v. 18. he promised the people, v. 15. in God's name, [1.] That there should come a Prophet, great above all the prophets, by whom God would make known himself and his will to the children of men, more fully and clearly than ever he had done before. He is the Light of the world, as prophecy was of the Jewish church, John, 8. 12. He is the Word by whom God speaks to us, John, 1. 1. Heb. 1. 2. [2.] That God would raise him up from the midst of them. In his birth he should be one of that nation, should live among them, and be sent to them. In his resurrection he should be raised up at Jerusalem, and from thence his doctrine should go forth to all the world: thus God, having raised up his Son Christ Jesus, sent him to bless us. [3.] That he should be like unto Moses, only as much above him as the other prophets came short of him. Moses was such a prophet as was a lawgiver to Israel, and their deliverer out of Egypt; and so was Christ, he not only teaches, but rules and saves; Moses was the founder of a new dispensation, by signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds; and so was Christ, by which he proved himself a Teacher come from God. Was Moses faithful? So was Christ; Moses as a servant, but Christ as a Son. [4.] That God would put his words in his mouth, v. 18. What messages God had to send to the children of men, he would send them by him, and give him full instructions what to say and do as a prophet. Hence our Saviour says, John, 7. 16. My doctrine is not mine originally, but his that sent me. So that this great promise is performed; this Prophet is come, even Jesus, it is he that should come, and we are to look for no other.

(2.) The agreeableness of this designed dispensation to the people's avowed choice and desire at mount Sinai, v. 16, 17. There God had spoken to them in thunder and lightning, out of the midst of the fire and thick darkness: every word made their ears tingle and their hearts tremble, so that the whole congregation was ready to die with fear: in this fright they begged hard that God would not speak to them in this manner any more, (they could not bear it, it would overwhelm and distract them,) but that he would speak to them by men like themselves, by Moses now, and afterward by other prophets like unto him. "Well," says God, "it shall be so; they shall be spoken to by men, whose terrors shall not make them afraid;" and, to crown the favour beyond what they were able to ask or think, in the fulness of time, the Word itself was made flesh, and they saw his glory as of the only-begotten of the Father, not, as at mount Sinai, full of majesty and terror, but full of grace and truth, John, 1. 14. Thus, in answer to the request of those who were struck with amazement by the law, God promised the incarnation of his Son, though we may suppose it far from the thoughts of them that made that request.

(3.) A charge and command given to all people to hear and believe, hear and obey, this Great Prophet here promised; Unto him ye shall hearken, v. 15. and whoever will not hearken to him shall be surely and severely reckoned with for his contempt, v. 19. I will require it of him. God himself applied this to our Lord Jesus in the voice that came out of the excellent glory, Matth. 17. 5. Hear ye him; that is, This is he concerning whom it was said by Moses of old, Unto him ye shall hearken; and Moses and Elias then stood by, and assented to it. The sentence here passed, on those that hearken not to this Prophet, is repeated and ratified in the New Testament, He that believeth not the Son, the wrath of God abideth on him, John, 3. 36. And how shall we escape, if we urn away from him that speaketh from heaven? Heb. 12. 25. The Chaldee paraphrase here reads it, My Word shall require it of him; which can be no other than a divine person, Christ the eternal Word, to whom the Father has committed all judgment, and by whom he will at the last day judge the world. Whoever turns a deaf ear to Jesus Christ shall find that it is at his peril; the same that is the Prophet is to be his Judge. John, 12. 48.

II. Here is a caution against false prophets.

1. By way of threatening against the pretenders themselves, v. 20. Whoever sets up for a prophet, and produces either a commission from a false god, as the prophets of Baal, or a false and counterfeit commission from the true God, shall be deemed and adjudged guilty of high treason against the crown and dignity of the King of kings, and that traitor shall be put to death, (v. 20.) namely, by the judgment of the great Sanhedrim, which, in process of time, sat at Jerusalem: and therefore our Saviour says, that a prophet could not perish but at Jerusalem, and lays the blood of the prophets at Jerusalem's door, Luke, 13. 33, 34. whom therefore God himself would punish; yet there false prophets were supported.

2. By way of direction to the people, that they might not be imposed upon by pretenders; of which there were many, as appears, Jer. 23. 25. Ezek. 13. 6. 1 Kings, 22. 6. It is a very proper question which they are supposed to ask, v. 21. Since it is so great a duty to hearken to the true prophets, and yet there is so much danger of being misled by false prophets, How shall we know the word which the Lord has not spoken? By what marks may we discover a cheat? Note, It highly concerns us to have a right touchstone wherewith to try the word we hear, that we may know what that word is, which the Lord has not spoken. Whatever is directly repugnant to sense, to the light and law of nature, and to the plain sense of the written word, we may be sure, is not that which the Lord has spoken; nor that which gives countenance and encouragement to sin, or has a manifest tendency to the destruction of piety or charity; far be it from God that he should contradict himself. The rule here given, in answer to this inquiry, was adapted chiefly to that state, v. 22. If there was any cause to suspect the sincerity of a prophet, let them observe, if he gave them any sign, or foretold something to come, and the event was not according to his prediction, they might be sure he was not sent of God. This does not refer so much to the foretelling of mercies and judgments, (though as to those, and the difference between the predictions of mercies and judgments, there is a rule of discerning between truth and falsehood laid down by the prophet, Jer. 28. 8, 9.) but rather to the giving of signs on purpose to confirm their mission. Though the sign did come to pass, yet that would not serve to prove their mission, if they called them to serve other gods; that point had been already settled, Deut. 13. 1. 3. But if the sign did not come to pass, that would serve to disprove their mission. "When Moses cast his rod upon the ground, (it is Bishop Patrick's explication of this,) and said it would become a serpent, if it had not accordingly been turned into a serpent, Moses had been a false prophet: if, when Elijah called for fire from heaven to consume the sacrifice, none had come, he had been no better than the prophets of Baal." Samuel's mission was proved by this, That God let none of his words fall to the ground,

1 Sam. 3. 19, 20. And by the miracles Christ wrought, especially by that great sign he gave of his resurrection the third day, which came to pass as he foretold, it appeared that he was a Teacher come from God.

Lastly. They are bid not to be afraid of a false prophet; that is, not to be afraid of the judgments such a one might denounce to amuse people and strike terror upon them; nor to be afraid of executing the law upon him, when, upon a strict and impartial scrutiny, it appeared that he was a false prophet. This command not to fear a false prophet, implies that a true prophet, who proved his commission by clear and undeniable proofs, was to be feared, and it was at their peril if they offered him any violence, or put any slight upon him.

CHAP. XIX.

The laws which Moses had hitherto been repeating, and urging, mostly concerned the acts of religion and devotion toward God; but here he comes more fully to prove the duties of righteousness between man and man. This chapter relates, I. To the sixth commandment, Thou shalt not kill, v. 1. 13. II. To the eighth commandment, Thou shalt not steal, v. 14. III. To the ninth commandment, Thou shalt not bear false witness, v. 15. 21.

1. WHEN the LORD thy God hath cut off the nations, whose land the LORD thy God giveth thee, and thou succeedest them, and dwellest in their cities, and in their houses;

2. Thou shalt separate three cities for thee in the midst of thy land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it. 3. Thou shalt prepare thee a way, and divide the coasts of thy land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee to inherit, into three parts, that every slayer may flee thither. 4. And this is the case of the slayer, which shall flee thither, that he may live: Whoso killeth his neighbour ignorantly, whom he hated not in time past;

5. As when a man goeth into the wood with his neighbour to hew wood, and his hand fetcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve, and lighteth upon his neighbour, that he die; he shall flee unto one of those cities, and live: 6. Lest the avenger of the blood pursue the slayer, while his heart is hot, and overtake him, because the way is long, and slay him; whereas he was not worthy of death, inasmuch as he hated him not in time past. 7. Wherefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt separate three cities for thee. 8. And if the LORD thy God enlarge thy coast, as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, and give thee all the land which he promised to give unto thy fathers; 9. If thou shalt keep all these commandments to do them, which I command thee this day, to love the LORD thy God, and to walk ever in his ways; then shalt thou add three cities more for thee, beside these three: 10. That innocent blood be not shed in thy land, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and so blood be upon thee. 11. But if any man hate his neighbour, and lie in wait for him, and rise up against him, and smite him mortally that he die, and fleeth into one of these cities: 12. Then the elders of his city shall send and fetch him thence, and deliver him into the hand of the avenger of blood, that he may die. 13. Thine eye shall not pity him, but thou shalt put away the guilt of innocent blood from Israel, that it may go well with thee.

It was one of the precepts given to the sons of Noah, that whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, that is, by the avenger of blood, Gen. 9. 6. Now here we have the law settled between blood and blood, between the blood of the murdered and the blood of the murderer, and effectual provision made.

1. That the cities of refuge should be a protection to him that slew another casually, so that he should not die for that as a crime, which was not his voluntary act, but only his unhappiness. The appointment of these cities of refuge we had before, Exod. 21. 13. and the law laid down concerning them at large, Numb. 35. 10, &c. It is here repeated, and direction is given concerning three things.

1. The appointing of three cities in Canaan for this purpose. Moses had already appointed three on that side Jordan which he saw the conquest of; and now he bids them, when they were settled in the other part of the country, to appoint three more, v. 1. .3, 7. The country was to be divided into three districts, as near as might be equal, and a city of refuge in the centre of each, so that every corner of the land might have one within reach. Thus Christ is not a Refuge at a distance, which we must ascend to heaven, or go down to the deep for, but the word is nigh us, and Christ in the word, Rom. 10. 8. The gospel brings salvation to our door, and there it knocks for admission. And, to make the flight of the delinquent the more easy, the way must be prepared that led to the city of refuge. Probably, they had causeways or street-ways leading to those cities, and the Jews say, that the magistrates of Israel, upon one certain day in the year, sent out messengers to see that those roads were in good repair, and they were to remove stumbling-blocks, mend bridges that were broken, and, where two ways met, they were to set up a Mercurial post, with a finger to point the right way, on which was engraven in great letters, Miklat, Miklat; Refuge, Refuge. In allusion to this, gospel-ministers are to shew people the way to Christ, and to assist and direct them in flying by faith to him for refuge. They must be ready to remove their prejudices, and help them over their difficulties. And, blessed be God, the way of holiness, to all that seek it faithfully, is a highway so plain, that the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein.

2. The use to be made of these cities, v. 4. .6. (1.) It is supposed, it might so happen that a man might be the death of his neighbour without any design upon him, (either from a sudden passion, or malice prepense,) but purely by accident, as by the flying off of an axe-head, which is the instance here given, with which every case of this kind was to be compared, and by it adjudged. See how human life lies exposed daily, and what deaths we are often in, and what need therefore we have to be always ready, our souls being continually in our hands. How are the sons of men snares in an evil time, when it falls suddenly upon them! (Eccles. 9. 12.) An evil time indeed it is, when this happens, not only to the slain but to the slayer. (2.) It is supposed, that the relations of the person slain would be forward to avenge the blood; in affection to their friend, and in zeal for public justice. Though the law did not allow the avenging of any other affront or injury with death, yet the avenger of blood, the blood of a relation, shall have great allowances made for the heat of his heart, upon such a provocation as that, and his killing the manslayer, though he was so by accident only, should not be accounted murder, if he did it before he got to the city of refuge, though it is owned he was not worthy of death. Thus would God possess people with a great horror and dread of the sin of murder: if mere chance-medley did thus expose a man, surely he that wilfully does violence to the blood of any person, whether from an old grudge, or upon a sudden provocation, must flee to the pit, and let no man stay him, Prov. 28. 17. yet the New Testament represents the sin of murder as more heinous and more dangerous than even this law does, 1 John, 3. 15. Ye know that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him. (3.) It is provided, that, if an avenger of blood should be so unreasonable as to demand satisfaction for blood shed by accident only, then the city of refuge should protect the slayer. Sins of ignorance indeed do expose us to the wrath of God, but there is relief provided, if by faith and repentance we make use of it. Paul, that had been a persecutor, obtained mercy, because he did it ignorantly; and Christ prayed for his crucifiers, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.

3. The appointing of three cities more for this use, in case God should hereafter enlarge their territories, and the dominion of their religion; that all those places which came under the government of the law of Moses in other instances, might enjoy the benefit of that law in this instance, v. 8. .10. Here is, (1.) An intimation of God's gracious intention to enlarge their coast, as he promised to their fathers; if they did not by their disobedience forfeit the promise, the condition of which is here carefully repeated, that, if it were not performed, the reproach might lie upon them, and not on God. He promised to give it, if thou shalt keep all these commandments; not otherwise. (2.) A direction to them to appoint three cities more in their new conquests, which, the number intimates, should be as large as those their first conquests were; wherever the border of Israel went, this privilege must attend it, that innocent blood be not shed; v. 10. Though God is the Saviour and Preserver of all men, and has a tender regard to all lives, yet the blood of Israelites is in a particular manner precious to him, Ps. 72. 14. The learned Ainsworth observes, that the Jewish writers themselves own, that, the condition not being performed, the promise of the enlarging of their coast was never fulfilled; so that there was no occasion for ever adding these three cities of refuge; yet the holy blessed God (say they) did not command it in vain, for in the days of Messiah the Prince, three other cities shall be added to these six: they expect it to be fulfilled in the letter, but we know that in Christ it has its spiritual accomplishment, for the borders of the gospel Israel are enlarged, according to the promise; and in Christ, the Lord our Righteousness, refuge is provided for those that by faith fly unto him.

11. It is provided, that the cities of refuge should be no sanctuary or shelter to a wilful murderer, but even thence he should be fetched, and delivered to the avenger of blood, v. 11. .13. 1. This shews that wilful murder must never be protected by the civil magistrate; he bears the sword of justice in vain, if he suffers those to escape the edge of it that lie under the guilt of blood, which he by office is the avenger of. During the dominion of the papacy here in our own land, before the Reformation, there were some churches, and religious houses, (as they called them,) that were made sanctuaries for the protection of all sorts of criminals that fled to them, wilful murderers not excepted, so that (as Stamford says, in his Pleas of the Crown, lib. 2. ch. 33.) the government follows not Moses but Romulus, and it was not till about the latter end of the Henry Eighth's time that this privilege of sanctuary for wilful murder was taken away; when in that, as in other cases, the word of God came to be regarded more than the dictates of the see of Rome. And some have thought it would be a completing of that instance of reformation, if the benefit of clergy were taken away for manslaughter, that is, the killing of a man upon a small provocation, since this law allowed refuge only in case of that which our law calls chance-medley. 2. It may be alluded to, to shew that in Jesus Christ there is no refuge for presumptuous sinners, that go on still in their trespasses. If we thus sin wilfully, sin, and go on in it, there remains no sacrifice, Heb. 10. 26. Those that flee to Christ from their sins, shall be safe in him, but not those that expect to be sheltered by him in their sins. Salvation itself cannot save such, divine justice will fetch them even from the city of refuge, the protection of which they are not entitled to.

14. Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, which they of old time have set in thine inheritance, which thou shalt inherit in the land that the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it. 15. One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established. 16. If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong; 17. Then both the men, between whom the controversy is, shall stand before the LORD, before the priests and the judges, which shall be in those days; 18. And the judges shall make diligent inquisition: and, behold, if the witness be a false witness, and hath testified falsely against his brother; 19. Then shall ye do unto him, as he had thought to have done unto his brother: so shalt thou put the evil away from among you. 20. And those which remain shall hear, and fear, and shall henceforth commit no more any such evil among you. 21. And thine eye shall not pity; but life shall go for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.

Here is a statute for the preventing of frauds and perjuries; for the divine law takes care of men's rights and properties, and has made a hedge about them. Such a friend is it to human society, and men's civil interest.

I. A law against frauds, v. 14. 1. Here is an implicit direction given to the first planters of Canaan, to fix landmarks, according to the distribution of the land to the several tribes and families by lot. Note, It is the will of God that every one should know his own; and that all good means should be used to prevent encroachments, and the doing and suffering of wrong. When right is settled, care must be taken that it be not afterward unsettled: and that, if possible, no occasion of dispute may arise. 2. An express law to posterity not to remove those landmarks, which were thus fixed at first, by which a man secretly got that to himself which was his neighbour's. This, without doubt, is a moral precept, and still binding, and to us it forbids, (1.) The invading of any man's right, and taking to ourselves that which is not our own, by any fraudulent arts or practices, as by forging, concealing, destroying, or altering, deeds and writings, which are our landmarks, to which appeals are made; or by shifting hedges, meer-stones, and boundaries. Though the landmarks were set by the hand of man, yet he was a thief and a robber, by the law of God, that removed them. Let every man be content with his own lot, and just to his neighbour's, and then we shall have no landmarks removed. (2.) It forbids the sowing of discord among neighbours, and doing any thing to occasion strife and law-suits; which is done (and it is very ill done) by confounding those things which should determine disputes, and decide controversies. And, (3.) It forbids breaking in upon the settled order and constitution of civil government, and the altering of ancient usages without just cause. This law supports the honour of prescriptions. Consuetudo facit jus—Custom is to be held as law.

II. A law against perjuries, which enacts two things: 1. That a single witness should never be admitted to give evidence in a criminal cause, so as that sentence should be passed on his testimony, v. 15. This law we had before, Numb. 35. 30. and in this book, ch. 17. 6. This was enacted in favour to the prisoner, whose life and honour should not lie at the mercy of a particular person that had a pique against him; and for caution to the accuser, not to say that which he could not corroborate by the testimony of another. It is a just shame which this law put upon mankind as false and not to be trusted; every man is by it suspected: and it is the honour of God's grace, that the record he has given concerning his Son is confirmed both in heaven and in earth by three witnesses, 1 John, 5. 7. Let God be true, and every man a liar, Rom. 3. 4.

2. That a false witness should incur the same punishment which was to have been inflicted upon the person he accused, v. 16. .21. (1.) The criminal here is a false witness, who is said to rise up against a man, not only because all witnesses stood up when they gave in their evidence, but because a false witness did indeed rise up as an enemy and an assailant against him whom he accused. If two, or three, or many witnesses, concurred in a false testimony, they were all liable to be prosecuted upon this law. (2.) The person wronged or brought into peril, by the false testimony, is supposed to be the appellee, v. 17. And yet if the person were put to death upon the evidence, and afterward it appeared to be false, any other person, or the judges themselves, ex officio—by virtue of their office, might call the false witness to account. (3.) Causes of this kind, having more than ordinary difficulty in them, were to be brought before the supreme court, the priest and judges, who are said to be before the Lord, because as other judges sat in the gates of their cities, so these at the gate of the sanctuary, ch. 17. 12. (4.) There must be great care in the trial, v. 18. A diligent inquisition must be made into the characters of the persons, and all the circumstances of the case, which must be compared, that the truth might be found out; which, where it is thus faithfully and impartially inquired into, Providence, it may be hoped, will particularly advance the discovery of. (5.) If it appeared that a man had knowingly and maliciously borne false witness against his neighbour, though the mischief he designed him thereby was not effected, he shall undergo the same penalty which his evidence would have brought his neighbour under, v. 19. Nec lex est justior ulla—Nor could any law be more just. If the crime he accused his neighbour of, was to be punished with death, the false witness must be put to death; if with stripes, he must be beaten; if with a pecuniary mulct, he was to be fined the same sum. And because to those who consider not the heinousness of the crime, and the necessity of making this provision against it, it might seem hard to punish a man so severely for a few words speaking, especially when no mischief did actually follow, it is added, v. 21. Thine eye shall not pity. No man needs to be more merciful than God. The benefit that will accrue to the public from this severity will abundantly recompense it, v. 20. They that remain shall hear, and fear. Such exemplary punishments will be warnings to others not to attempt any such mischief, when they see how he that made the pit, and digged it, is fallen into the ditch which he made.

CHAP. XX.

This chapter settles the militia, and establishes the laws and ordinances of war, I. Relating to the soldiers. 1. Those must be encouraged that were drawn up to battle, v. 1. .1. 2. Those must be dismissed, and sent back again, whose private affairs called for their attendance at home, (v. 5. .7.) or whose weakness and timidity unfitted them for service in the field, v. 8, 9. II. Relating to the enemies they made war with, 1. The treaties they must make with the cities that were fur off, v. 10. .15. 2. The destruction they must make of the people into whose hand they were going, v. 16. .18. 3. The care they must take, in besieging cities, not to destroy the fruit-trees, v. 19, 20.

1. WHEN thou goest out to battle against thine enemies, and seest horses, and chariots, and a people more than thou, be not afraid of them: for the LORD thy God is with thee, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. 2. And it shall be, when ye are come nigh unto the battle, that the priest shall approach and speak unto the people, 3. And shall say unto them, Hear, O

Israel, ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies: let not your hearts faint, fear not, and do not tremble, neither be ye terrified because of them; 4. For the LORD your God is he that goeth with you, to fight for you against your enemies, to save you. 5. And the officers shall speak unto the people, saying, What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it? let him go and return to his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man dedicate it. 6. And what man is he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it? let him also go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man eat of it. 7. And what man is there that hath betrothed a wife, and hath not taken her? let him go and return unto his house, lest he die in battle, and another man take her. 8. And the officers shall speak further unto the people, and they shall say, What man is there that is fearful and faint-hearted? let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren's heart faint as well as his heart. 9. And it shall be, when the officers have made an end of speaking unto the people, that they shall make captains of the armies to lead the people.

Israel was at this time to be considered rather as a camp, than as a kingdom, entering upon an enemy's country, and not yet settled in a country of their own; and, beside the war they were now entering upon in order to their settlement, even after their settlement, they could neither protect nor enlarge their coast, without hearing the alarms of war; it was therefore needful that they should have direction given them in their military affairs; and in these verses they are directed in managing, marshalling, and drawing up, their own forces. And it is observable, that the discipline of war here prescribed, is so far from having any thing in it harsh or severe, as is usual in martial law, that the intent of the whole is, on the contrary, to encourage the soldiers, and to make their service easy to them.

I. They that were disposed to fight, must be encouraged, and animated against their fears.

1. Moses here gives a general encouragement, which the leaders and commanders in the war must take to themselves, v. 1. "Be not afraid of them. Though the enemy have ever so much the advantage, (being more than thou,) and though their armies be made up, in a great measure, of horses and chariots which thou art not allowed to multiply, yet decline not coming to a battle with them, dread not the issue, nor doubt of success." Two things they must encourage themselves with in their wars, provided they kept close to their God and their religion, otherwise they forfeited these encouragements. (1.) The presence of God with them. "The Lord thy God is with thee, and therefore thou art not in danger, nor needest thou be afraid." See Isa. 41. 10. (2.) The experience they and their fathers had had of God's power and goodness, in bringing them out of the land of Egypt, in defiance of Pharaoh and all his hosts, which was not only in general a proof of the divine omnipotence, but to them in particular, a pledge of what God would do further for them. He that saved them from those greater enemies, would not suffer them to be run down by those that were every way less considerable, and thus to have all he had done for them, undone again.

2. This encouragement must be particularly addressed to the common soldiers by a priest appointed, and, the Jews say, anointed, for that purpose, whom they call the Anointed of the war, a very proper title for our anointed Redeemer, the Captain of our salvation. This priest, in God's name, was to animate the people; and who so fit to do that, as he whose office it was as priest to pray for them? For the best encouragements arise from the precious promises made to the prayer of faith. This priest must, (1.) Charge them not to be afraid, (v. 3.) for nothing weakens the hands so much as that which makes the heart tremble, v. 3. There is need of precept upon precept to this purport, as there is here. Let not your hearts be tender, (so the word is,) to receive all the impressions of fear, but let a believing confidence in the power and promise of God harden them. Fear not, and do not make haste, (so the word is,) for he that believeth, doth not make more haste than good speed. "Do not make haste either rashly to anticipate your advantages, or basely to fly off upon every disadvantage." (2.) He must assure them of the presence of God with them, to own and plead their righteous cause, and not only to save them from their enemies, but to give them victory over them, v. 4. Note, Those have no reason to fear, that have God with them. The giving of this encouragement by a priest, one of the Lord's ministers, intimates, [1.] That it is very fit that armies should have chaplains, not only to pray for them, but to preach to them, both to reprove that which would hinder their success, and to raise their hopes of it. [2.] That it is the work of Christ's ministers to encourage his good soldiers in their spiritual conflicts with the world and the flesh, and to assure them of a conquest, yea, more than a conquest, through Christ that loved us.

II. They that were indisposed to fight must be discharged; whether the indisposition did arise,

1. From the circumstances of a man's outward condition. As, (1.) If he had lately built or purchased a new house, and had not taken possession of it, had not dedicated it, (v. 5.) that is, made a solemn festival for the entertainment of his friends, that came to him to welcome him to his house; let him go home and take the comfort of that which God has blessed him with, till, by enjoying it for some time, he become less fond of it, and consequently less disturbed in the war by the thoughts of it, and more willing to die, and leave it. For that is the nature of all our worldly enjoyments, that they please us best at first; after a while we see the vanity of them. Some think that this dedication of their houses was a religious act, and that they took possession of them with prayers and praises, with a solemn devoting of themselves and all their enjoyments to the service and honour of God; David penned the 39th Psalm, on such an occasion, as appears by the title. Note, He that has a house of his own, should dedicate it to God, by setting up and keeping up the fear and worship of God in it, that he may have a church in his house; and nothing should be suffered to divert a man from this. Or, (2.) If a man had been at a great expense to plant a vineyard, and longed to eat of the fruit of it, which, for the first three years, he was forbidden to do, by that law, (Lev. 19. 23, &c.) let him go home, if he has a mind, and gratify his own humour with the fruits of it, v. 6. See how indulgent God is to his people in innocent things, and how far from being a hard Master. Since we naturally covet to eat the labour of our hands, rather than an Israelite should be crossed therein, his service in war shall be dispensed with. Or, (3.) If a man had made up his mind to be married, and the marriage were not solemnized, he was at liberty to return, (v. 7.) as also to tarry at home for one year after marriage, (ch. 24. 5.) for the terrors of war would be disagreeable to a man who had just welcomed the soft scene of domestic attachment. And God would not be served in his wars by pressed men, that were forced into the army against their will, but they must all be perfectly volunteers, (Ps. 110. 3.) Thy people shall be willing. In running the christian race, and fighting the good fight of faith, we must lay aside every weight and all that which would clog and divert our minds, and make us unwilling. The Jewish writers agree that this liberty to return, was allowed only in those wars which they made voluntarily, (as Bishop Patrick expresses it,) not those which were made by the divine command against Amalek and the Canaanites, in which every man was bound to fight.

2. If a man's indisposition to fight arose from the weakness and timidity of his own spirit, he had leave to return from the war, v. 8. This proclamation Gideon made to his army, and it detached above two-thirds of them, Judg. 7. 3. Some make the fearfulness and faint-heartedness, here supposed, to arise from the terrors of an evil conscience, which would make a man afraid to look death and danger in the face. It was then thought that men of loose and profligate lives would not be good soldiers, but must needs be both cowards in an army, and curses to it, the shame and trouble of the camp; and, therefore, those who were conscious to themselves of notorious guilt were shaken off. But it seems rather to be meant of a natural fearfulness. It was partly in kindness to them that they had their discharge; (though shamed, they were eased;) but much more in kindness to the rest of the army, who were hereby freed from the incumbrance of such as were useless and unserviceable, while the danger of infection from their cowardice and flight was prevented; that is the reason here given, Lest his brethren's heart fail as well as his heart. Fear is catching, and in an army is of most pernicious consequence. We must take heed that we fear not the fear of them that are afraid, Isa. 8. 12.

Lastly, It is here ordered, that, when all the cowards were dismissed, then captains should be nominated, v. 9. for it was in a special manner necessary that the leaders and commanders should be men of courage. That reform therefore must be made, when the army was first mustered and marshalled. The soldiers of Christ have need of courage, that they may quit themselves like men, and endure hardness like good soldiers, especially the officers of his army.

10. When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it. 11. And it shall be, if it make thee answer of peace, and open unto thee, then it shall be, that all the people that is found therein shall be tributaries unto thee, and they shall serve thee. 12. And if it will make no peace with thee, but will make war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it: 13. And when the LORD thy God hath delivered it into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword: 14. But the women, and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself; and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies, which the LORD thy God hath given thee. 15. Thus shalt thou do unto all the cities which are very far off from thee, which are not of the cities of these nations. 16. But of the cities of these people, which the LORD thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth: 17. But thou shalt utterly destroy them; namely, the Hittites, and the Amorites, the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; as the LORD thy God hath commanded thee: 18. That they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods; so should ye sin against the LORD your God. 19. When thou shalt besiege a city a long time, in making war against it to take it, thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof by forcing an axe against them:

for thou mayest eat of them, and thou shalt not cut them down (for the tree of the field is man's life) to employ them in the siege: 20. Only the trees which thou knowest that they be not trees for meat, thou shalt destroy and cut them down; and thou shalt build bulwarks against the city that maketh war with thee, until it be subdued

They are here directed what method to take in dealing with the cities, (those only are mentioned, v. 10. but doubtless the armies in the field, and the nations they had occasion to deal with, are likewise intended,) upon which they made war. They must not make a descent upon any of their neighbours, till they had first given them fair notice, by a public manifesto, or remonstrance, stating the ground of their quarrel with them. In dealing with the worst of enemies, the laws of justice and honour must be observed; and as the sword must never be taken in hand without cause, so not without cause shewn. War is an appeal, in which the merits of the cause must be set forth.

1. Even to the proclamation of war must be subjoined a tender of peace, if they would accept of it upon reasonable terms; that is, (say the Jewish writers,) "upon condition that they renounce idolatry, worship the God of Israel, as proselytes of the gate that were not circumcised, pay to their new masters a yearly tribute, and submit to their government:" on these terms the process of war should be stayed, and their conquerors, upon this submission, were to be their protectors, v. 10, 11. Some think that even the seven nations of Canaan were to have this offer of peace made them; and the offer was no jest or mockery, though it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should not accept it, Josh. 11. 20. Others think that they are excluded, v. 16. not only from the benefit of that law, v. 13. which confines military execution to the males only, but from the benefit of this also, which allows not to make war till peace was refused. And I see not how they could proclaim peace to those who by the law were to be utterly rooted out, and to whom they were to shew no mercy, ch. 7. 2. But for any other nation which they made war upon, either for the enlarging of their coast, the avenging of any wrong done, or the recovery of any right denied, they must first proclaim peace to them. Let this shew, 1. God's grace in dealing with sinners: though he might most justly and easily destroy them, yet, having no pleasure in their ruin, he proclaims peace, and beseeches them to be reconciled; so that they who lie most obnoxious to his justice, and ready to fall as sacrifices to it, if they make him an answer of peace, and open to him, upon condition that they will be tributaries and servants to him, shall not only be saved from ruin, but incorporated with his Israel, as fellow-citizens with the saints. 2. Let it shew us our duty in dealing with our brethren: if any quarrel happen, let us not only be ready to hearken to the proposals of peace, but forward to make such proposals. We should never make use of the law, till we have first tried to accommodate matters in variance amicably, and without expence and vexation. We must be for peace, whoever are for war.

II. If the offers of peace were not accepted, then they must proceed to push on the war. And let those to whom God offers peace know, that, if they reject the offer, and take not the benefit of it within the time limited, judgment will rejoice against mercy in the execution, as much as now mercy rejoices against judgment in the reprieve. In this case, here, 1. There is a promise implied, that they should be victorious. It is taken for granted, v. 13. that the Lord their God would deliver it into their hands. Note, Those enterprises which we undertake by a divine warrant, and prosecute by a divine direction, we may expect to succeed in. If we take God's method, we shall have his blessing. 2. They are ordered, in honour to the public justice, to put all the soldiers to the sword, for them I understand by every male, v. 13. all that arms, (as all then did, that were able.) But the spoil they are allowed to take to themselves, v. 14. in which were reckoned the women and children. Note, A justifiable property is acquired in that which is won in lawful war; God himself owns the title, The Lord thy God gives it thee, and therefore he must be owned in it, Ps. 44. 3.

III. The nations of Canaan are excepted from the merciful provisions made by this law. Remnants might be left of the cities that were very far off, v. 15. because by them they were not in so much danger of being infected with idolatry: nor was their country so directly and immediately intended in the promise. But of the cities which were given to Israel for an inheritance, no remnants must be left of their inhabitants, v. 16. for it put a slight upon the promise to admit Canaanites to share with them in the peculiar land of promise. And for another reason they must be utterly destroyed, v. 17. Because, since it could not be expected that they should be cured of their idolatry, if they were left with that plague-sore upon them, they would be in danger of infecting God's Israel, who were too apt to take the infection, v. 18. They will teach you to do after their abominations, to introduce their customs into the worship of the God of Israel, and by degrees to forsake him, and to worship false gods; for those that dare violate the second commandment will not long keep to the first. Strange worship open the door to strange deities.

Lastly. Care is here taken, that in the besieging of cities there should not be any destruction made of fruit-trees, v. 19, 20. In those times, when besiegers forced their way, not, as now, with bombs and cannon ball, but with battering rams, they had occasion for much timber in carrying on their sieges: now, because in the heat of war men are not apt to consider, as they ought, the public good, it is expressly provided that fruit-trees should not be used as timber-trees. That reason, for the tree of the field is man's, (the word life we supply,) all the ancient versions, the Septuagint, Targums, &c. read, For is the tree of the field a man? Or, The tree of the field is not a man, that it should come against thee in the siege, or, retire from thee into the bulwark. "Do not brutishly vent thy rage against the trees that can do thee no harm." But our translation seems most agreeable to the intent of the law; and it teaches us, 1. That God is a better friend to man than he is to himself; and God's law, which we are apt to complain of as a heavy yoke, consults our interest and comfort, while our own appetites and passions, which we are so indulgent of, are really enemies to our welfare. The intent of many of the divine precepts is, to restrain us from destroying that which is our life and food. 2. That armies, and their commanders, are not allowed to make what desolation they please in the countries that are the seat of war. Military rage must always be checked and ruled with reason. War, though carried on with never so much caution, is destructive enough, and should not be made more so than is absolutely necessary. Generous spirits will shew themselves tender, not only of men's lives, but of their livelihoods: for though the life is more than meat, yet it will soon be nothing without meat. 3. The Jews understand this as a prohibition of all willful waste upon any account whatsoever. No fruit-tree is to be destroyed, unless it be barren, and cumber the ground. "Nay," they maintain, "whoso willfully breaks vessels, tears clothes, stops wells, pulls down buildings, or destroys meat, transgresses this law, Thou shalt not destroy." Christ took care that the broken meat should be gathered up, that nothing might be lost. Every creature of God is good, and as nothing is to be refused, so nothing is to be abused. We may live to want what we carelessly waste.

CHAP. XXI.

In this chapter provision is made, I. For the putting away of the guilt of blood from the land, when he that shed it was fled from justice, v. 1. 9. II. For the preserving of the honour of a captive maid, v. 10. 14. III. For the securing of the right of a first-born son, though he were not a favourite, v. 15. 17. IV. For the restraining and punishing of a rebellious son, v. 18. 21. V. For the maintaining of the honour of human bodies; which must not be hanged in chains, but decently buried, even the bodies of the worst malefactors, v. 22, 23.

1. IF one be found slain in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee to possess it, lying in the field, and it be not known who hath slain him: 2. Then thy elders and thy judges shall come forth, and they shall measure unto the cities which are round about him that is slain: 3. And it shall be, that the city which is next unto the slain man, even the elders of that city shall take an heifer, which hath not been wrought with, and which hath not drawn in the yoke; 4. And the elders of that city shall bring down the heifer unto a rough valley, which is neither eared nor sown, and shall strike off the heifer's neck there in the valley: 5. And the priests the sons of Levi shall come near; for them the LORD thy God hath chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of the LORD; and by their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried: 6. And all the elders of that city, that are next unto the slain man, shall wash their hands over the heifer that is beheaded in the valley: 7. And they shall answer and say, Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it. 8. Be merciful, O LORD, unto thy people Israel, whom thou hast redeemed, and lay not innocent blood unto thy people of Israel's charge. And the blood shall be forgiven them. 9. So shalt thou put away the guilt of innocent blood from among you, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the LORD.

Care had been taken by some preceding laws for the vigorous and effectual prosecution of a wilful murderer, ch. 19. 11, &c. the putting of whom to death was the putting away of the guilt of blood from the land; but if that could not be done, the murderer not being discovered, they must not think that the land was in no danger of contracting any pollution, because it was not through any neglect of their's that the murderer was unpunished; no, a great solemnity is here provided for the putting away of the guilt, as an expression of their dread and detestation of that sin.

I. The case supposed is, that one is found slain, and it is not known who slew him, v. 1. The providence of God has sometimes wonderfully brought to light these hidden works of darkness, and by strange occurrences the sin of the guilty has found them out: insomuch that it is become a proverb, Murder will out; but it is not always so; now and then the devil's promises of secrecy and impunity in this world are made good; yet it is but for a while: there is a time coming, when secret murders will be discovered; the earth shall disclose her blood, Isa. 26. 21. upon the inquisition which justice makes for it; and an eternity coming, when they that escaped punishment from men will lie under the righteous judgment of God. And the impunity with which so many murders and other wickednesses are committed in this world, makes it necessary that there should be a day of judgment, to require that which is past, Eccl. 3. 15.

II. Directions are given concerning what is to be done in this case. It is taken for granted that a diligent search had been made for the murderer, witnesses examined, and circumstances strictly inquired into, that if possible they might find out the guilty person; but if, after all, they could not trace it out, nor fasten the charge upon any, then,

1. The elders of the next city (that had a court of three-and-twenty in it) were to concern themselves about this matter. If it were doubtful which city was next, the great Sanhedrim were to send commissioners to determine that matter, by an exact measure, v. 2, 3. Note, Public persons must be solicitous about the public good: and those that are in power and reputation in cities must lay out themselves to redress grievances, and reform what is amiss in the country and neighbourhood that lie about them. Those that are next to them should have the largest share of their good influence, as ministers of God for good.

2. The priests and Levites must assist and preside in this solemnity, v. 5. that they might direct the management of it in all points according to the law, and particularly might be the people's mouth to God in the prayer that was to be put up on this sad occasion, v. 8. God being Israel's King, his ministers must be their magistrates, and by their word, as the mouth of the court, and learned in the laws, every controversy must be tried. It was their privilege that they had such guides, overseers, and rulers, and their duty to make use of them upon all occasions, especially in sacred things, as this was.

3. They were to bring a heifer down into a rough and unoccupied valley, and to kill it there, v. 3, 4. This was not a sacrifice, (for it was not brought to the altar,) but a protestation, that thus they would put the murderer to death, if they had him in their hands. The heifer must be one that had not drawn in the yoke, to signify (say some) that the murderer was a son of Belial; it must be brought into a rough valley, to signify the horror of the fact, and that the defilement which blood brings upon a land turns it into barrenness. And the Jews say, that, unless, after this, the murderer was found out, this valley, where the heifer was killed, was never to be tilled or sown.

4. The elders were to wash their hands in water over the heifer that was killed, and to profess not only that they had not shed this innocent blood themselves, but that they knew not who had, (v. 6, 7.) nor had knowingly concealed the murderer, helped him to make his escape, or had been any way aiding or abetting. To this custom David alludes, Ps. 26. 6. I will wash my hands in innocency; but if Pilate had an eye to it, Matth. 27. 24. he wretchedly misapplied it, when he condemned Christ, knowing him to be innocent, and yet acquitted himself from the guilt of innocent blood. Protestatio non valet contra factum—Protestations are of no avail, when contradicted by fact.

5. The priests were to pray to God for the country and nation, that God would be merciful to them, and not bring upon them the judgments which the connivance at the sin of murder would deserve, v. 8. It might be presumed that the murderer was either one of their city, or was now harboured in their city; and therefore they must pray that they might not fare the worse for his being among them, Numb. 16. 22. Be merciful, O Lord, to thy people Israel. Note, When we hear of the wickedness of the wicked, we have need to cry earnestly to God for mercy for our land; which groans and trembles under it. We must empty the measure by our prayers, which others are filling by their sins.

Now this solemnity was appointed, (1.) That it might give occasion to common and public discourse concerning the murder, which perhaps might some way or other occasion the discovery of it. (2.) That it might possess people with a dread of the guilt of blood, which defiles not only the conscience of him that sheds it, (this should engage us all to pray with David, Deliver me from blood-guiltiness,) but the land in which it is shed. It cries to the magistrate for justice on the criminal; and, if that cry be not heard, it cries to heaven for judgment on the land. If there must be so much care employed to save the land from guilt, when the murderer was not known, it was certainly impossible to secure it from guilt, if the murderer was known, and yet protected. All would be taught, by this solemnity, to use their utmost care and diligence to prevent, discover, and punish murder. Even the heathen mariners dreaded the guilt of blood, Jonah, 1. 14. (3.) That we might all learn to take heed of partaking in other men's sins, and making ourselves necessary to them ex post facto—after the fact, by countenancing the sin or sinner, and not witnessing against it in our places. We have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, if we do not reprove them rather, and bear our testimony against them; the repentance of the church of Corinth, for the sin of one of their members, produced such a carefulness, such a clearing of themselves, such a holy indignation, fear, and revenge, (2 Cor. 7. 11.) as were signified by the solemnity here appointed.

10. When thou goest forth to war against thine enemies, and the LORD thy God hath delivered them into thine hands, and thou hast taken them captive, 11. And seest among the captives a beautiful woman, and hast a desire unto her, that thou wouldest have her to thy wife; 12. Then thou shalt bring her home to thine house; and she shall shave her head, and pare her nails; 13. And she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her, and shall remain in thine house, and bewail her father and her mother a full month: and after that thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife. 14. And it shall be, if thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go whither she will; but thou shalt not sell her at all for money, thou shalt not make merchandise of her, because thou hast humbled her.

By this law a soldier is allowed to marry his captive, if he pleased. For the hardness of their hearts, Moses gave them this permission, lest, if they had not liberty given them to marry such, they should have taken liberty to defile themselves with them, and by such wickedness the camp would have been troubled. The man is supposed to have a wife already, and to take this wife for a secondary wife, as the Jews called them. This indulgence of men's inordinate desires, in which their hearts walked after their eyes, is by no means agreeable to the law of Christ, which therefore in this respect, among others, far exceeds in glory the law of Moses. The gospel permits not him that has one wife to take another, for from the beginning it was not so: the gospel forbids looking upon a woman, though a beautiful one, to lust after her, and commands the mortifying and denying of all irregular desires, though it be as uneasy as the cutting off of a right hand; so much does our holy religion, more than that of the Jews, advance the honour, and support the dominion, of the soul over the body, the spirit over the flesh, consonant to the glorious discovery it makes of life and immortality, and the better hope.

But though military men were allowed this liberty, yet care is here taken that they should not abuse it, that is,

1. That they should not abuse themselves, by doing it too hastily, though the captive was never so desirable. "If thou wouldest have her to thy wife, v. 10, 11. it is true, thou needest not ask her parents' consent, for she is thy captive, and is at thy disposal, but, 1. Thou shalt have no familiar intercourse, till thou hast married her." This allowance was designed to gratify, not a filthy brutish lust, in the heat and fury of its rebellion against reason and virtue, but an honourable and generous affection to a comely and amiable person, though in distress; therefore he may make her his wife if he will, but he must not deal with her as with a harlot. 2. "Thou shalt not marry her of a sudden, but keep her a full month in thy house," v. 12, 13. This he must do, either, (1.) That he may try to take his affection off from her; for he must know, that though, in marrying her, he does not do ill, (so the law then stood,) yet, in letting her alone, he does much better. Let her therefore shave her head, that he might not be enamoured with her locks, and let her nails grow, (so the margin reads it,) to spoil the branty of her hand. Quicquid amas, cupias non placuisse nimis—We should mo- derote our affection for those things which we are tempted to love inordinately. Or rather, (2.) This was done in token of her renouncing idolatry, and becoming a proselyte to the Jewish religion. The shaving of her head, the paring of her nails, and the changing of her apparel, signified her putting off the former conversation, which was corrupt in her ignorance, that she might become a new creature. She must remain in his house to be taught the good knowledge of the Lord, and worship of him: the Jews say, that if she refused, and continued obstinate in idolatry, he must not marry her. Note, The professors of religion must not be unequally yoked with unbelievers, 2 Cor. 6. 14.

11. It is likewise provided that they should not abuse the poor captive. 1. She must have time to bewail her father and mother, from whom she was separated, and without whose consent and blessing she is now likely to be married, and perhaps to a common soldier of Israel, though in her country never so nobly born and bred. To force a marriage till these sorrows were digested, and in some measure got over, and she was better reconciled to the land of her captivity, by being better acquainted with it, would be very unkind. She must not bewail her idols, but be glad to part with them; to her near and dear relations only her affection must be thus indulged. 2. If, upon second thoughts, he that had brought her to his house with a purpose to marry her, changed his mind and would not marry her, he might not make merchandise of her, as of his other prisoners, but must give her liberty to return, if she pleased, to her own country, because he had humbled her, and afflicted her, by raising expectations, and then disappointing them, (v. 14.) having made a fool of her, he might not make a prey of her. This intimates, how binding the laws of justice and honour are, particularly in the pretensions of love, the courting of affections, and the promises of marriage, which are to be looked upon as solemn things, that have something sacred in them, and therefore are not to be jested with.

15. If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have borne him children, both the beloved, and the hated; and if the first-born son be hers, that was hated: 16. Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved first-born before the son of the hated, which is indeed the first-born: 17. But he shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the first-born, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath: for he is the beginning of his strength, the right of the first-born is his.

This law restrains men from disinheriting their eldest sons, out of mere caprice, and without just provocation.

1. The case here put, (v. 15.) is very instructive. 1. It shows the great mischief of having more wives than one, which the law of Moses did not restrain, probably, in hopes that men's own experience of the great inconvenience of it in families, would at last put an end to it, and make them a law to themselves. Observe the supposition here, If a man have two wives, it is a thousand to one but one of them is beloved and the other hated, that is manifestly loved less, as Leah was by Jacob, and the effect of this cannot but be strifes and jealousies, envy, confusion, and every evil work, which could not but create a constant uneasiness and vexation to the husband, and involve him both in sin and trouble. Those do much better consult their own ease and satisfaction, who adhere to God's law, than those who indulge their own lusts. 2. It shows now Providence commonly sides with the weakest, and gives more abundant honour to that part which lacked; for the first-born son is here supposed to be hers that was hated, it was so in Jacob's family, because the Lord saw that Leah was hated, Gen. 29. 31. The great Householder wisely gives to each his dividend of comfort; if one had the honour to be the beloved wife, it often proved that the other had the honour to be the mother of the first-born.

2. The law in this case is still binding to parents; they must give their children their right without partiality. In the case supposed, the eldest son, though the son of the less beloved wife, must have his birth-right privilege, which was a double portion of the father's estate, because he was the beginning of his strength, that is, in him his family began to be strengthened, and his quiver began to be filled with the arrows of a mighty man, (Ps. 127. 4.) and therefore the right of the first-born is his, v. 16, 17. Jacob had indeed deprived Reuben of his birth-right, and given it to Joseph, but it was because Reuben had forfeited the birth-right by his incest, not because he was the son of the hated; now lest that which Jacob did justly, should be drawn into a precedent, for others to do the same thing unjustly, it is here provided that when the father makes his will, or otherwise settles his estate, the child shall not fare the worse for the mother's unhappiness in having less of her husband's love, for that was not the child's fault. Note, (1.) Parents ought to make no other difference in dispensing their affections among their children, than what they see plainly God makes in dispensing his grace among them. (2.) Since it is the providence of God that makes heirs, the disposal of providence in that matter must be acquiesced in, and not opposed. No son should be abandoned by his father, till he manifestly appear to be abandoned of God, which is hard to say of any while there is life.

18. If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them: 19. Then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place; 20. And they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard. 21. And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die: so shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear, and fear. 22. And if a man have committed a sin worthy of death, and he be to be put to death, and thou hang him on a tree: 23. His body shall not remain all night upon the tree, but thou shalt in any wise bury him that day; (for he that is hanged, is accursed of God;) that thy land be not defiled, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance.

Here is,

1. A law for the punishing of a rebellious son. Having in the former law provided, that parents should not deprive their children of their right, it was fit that it should next be provided, that children withdraw not the honour and duty which are owing to their parents, for there is no partiality in the divine law.

Observe, 1. How the criminal is here described. He is a stubborn and rebellious son, v. 18. No child was to fare the worse for the weakness of his capacity, the slowness or dulness of his understanding, but for his wilfulness and obstinacy. If he carry himself proudly and insolently toward his parents, contemn their authority, slight their reproofs and admonitions, disobey the express commands they give him for his own good, hate to be reformed by the correction they give him, shame their family, grieve their hearts, waste their substance, and threaten to ruin their estate by riotous living; this is a stubborn and rebellious son. He is particularly supposed, (v. 20.) to be a glutton or drunkard. This intimates either, (1.) That these were sins which his parents did in a particular manner warn him against, and therefore that in these instances there was a plain evidence that he did not obey their voice. Lemuel had this charge from his mother, Prov. 31. 4. Note, In the education of children, great care should be taken to suppress all inclinations to drunkenness, and to keep them out of the way of temptations to it: in order hereunto, they should be possessed betimes with a dread and detestation of that beastly sin, and taught betimes to deny themselves. Or, (2.) That his being a glutton and a drunkard was the cause of his insolence and obstinacy toward his parents. Note, There is nothing that draws men into all manner of wickedness, and hardens them in it, more certainly and fatally, than drunkenness does. When men take to drink, they forget the law, (Prov. 31. 5.) even that fundamental law of honouring parents.

2. How this criminal is to be proceeded against. His own father and mother are to be his prosecutors, v. 19, 20. They might not put him to death themselves, but they must complain of him to the elders of the city, and the complaint must needs be made with a sad heart, This our son is stubborn and rebellious. Note, Those that give up themselves to vice and wickedness, and will not be reclaimed, forfeit their interest in the natural affections of their nearest relations; the instruments of their being justly become the instruments of their destruction. The children that forget their duty, must thank themselves, and not blame their parents, if they are regarded with less and less affection. And how difficult soever tender parents now find it to reconcile themselves to the just punishment of their rebellious children, in the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, all natural affection will be so entirely swallowed up in divine love, that they will acquiesce even in the condemnation of those children, because God will be therein for ever glorified.

3. What judgment is to be executed upon him; he must be publicly stoned to death by the men of his city, v. 21. And thus, (1.) The paternal authority was supported, and God, our common Father, shewed himself jealous for it, it being one of the first and most ancient streams derived from him that is the Fountain of all power. (2.) This law, if duly executed, would early destroy the wicked of the land, Ps. 101. 8. and prevent the spreading of the gangrene, by cutting off the corrupt part betimes; for those that were bad members of families would never make good members of the commonwealth. (3.) It would strike an awe upon children, and frighten them into obedience to their parents, if they would not otherwise be brought to their duty, and kept in it. All Israel shall hear. The Jews say, "The elders that condemned him, were to send notice of it in writing all the nation over, In such a court, such a day, we stoned such a one, because he was a stubborn and rebellious son." And I have sometimes wished, that as in all our courts there is an exact record kept of the condemnation of criminals, in perpetuum rei memoriam—that the memorial may never be lost, so there might be public and authentic notice given in print to the kingdom, of such condemnations, and the executions upon them, by the elders themselves, in terrorem—that all may hear and fear.

II. A law for the burying of the bodies of malefactors that were hanged, v. 22. The hanging of them by the neck till the body was dead, was not used at all among the Jews, as with us; but of such as were stoned to death, if it were for blasphemy, or some other very execrable crime, it was usual, by order of the judges, to hang up the dead bodies upon a post, for some time, as a spectacle to the world, to express the ignominy of the crime, and to strike the greater terror upon others, that they might not only hear and fear, but see and fear. Now it is here provided, that, whatever time of the day they were thus hung up, at sun-set they should be taken down and buried, and not left to hang out all night; sufficient (says the law) to such a man is this punishment; hitherto let it go, but no further. Let the malefactor and his crime be hid in the grave.

Now, 1. God would thus preserve the honour of human bodies, and tenderness toward the worst of criminals. The time of exposing dead bodies thus, is limited, for the same reason that the number of stripes was limited by another law, lest thy brother seem vile unto thee. Punishing beyond death God reserves to himself; as for man, there is no more that he can do. Whether therefore the hanging of malefactors in chains, and setting up their heads and quarters, be decent among Christians that look for the resurrection of the body, may perhaps be worth considering. 2. Yet it is plain there was something ceremonial in it; by the law of Moses, the touch of a dead body was defiling, and therefore dead bodies must not be left hanging up in the country, because, by the same rule, that would defile the land. But, 3. There is one reason here given which has reference to Christ, He that is hanged is accursed of God, that is, it is the highest degree of disgrace and reproach that can be done to a man, and proclaims him under the curse of God as much as any external punishment can. They that see him thus hang between heaven and earth will conclude him abandoned of both, and unworthy of either; and therefore let him not hang all night, for that will carry it too far. Now the apostle, shewing how Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, by being himself made a curse for us, illustrates it by comparing this brand here put on him that was hanged on a tree, with the death of Christ, Gal. 3. 13. Moses, by the Spirit, uses this phrase of being accursed of God, when he means no more than being treated most ignominiously, that it might afterward be applied to the death of Christ, and might shew that in it he underwent the curse of the law for us, which is a great enhancement of his love, and a great encouragement to our faith in him. And (as the excellent Bishop Patrick well observes) this passage is applied to the death of Christ, not only because he bare our sins, and was exposed to shame, as these malefactors were that were accursed of God, but because he was in the evening taken down from the cursed tree and buried, (and that by the particular care of the Jews, with an eye to this law, John, 19, 31.) in token that now, the guilt being removed, the law was satisfied, as it was when the malefactor had hanged till sun-set; it demanded no more. Then he ceased to be a curse, and those that are his. And as the land of Israel was pure and clean, when the dead body was buried, so the church is washed and cleansed by the complete satisfaction which thus Christ made.

CHAP. XXII.

The laws of this chapter provide, I. For the preservation of charity and good neighbourhood, in the care of strayed or fallen cattle, v. 1. 4. II. For the preservation of order and distinction; that men and women should not wear one another's clothes, v. 5. and that other needless mixtures should be avoided, v. 9. 11. III. For the preservation of birds, v. 6, 7. IV. Of life, v. 8. V. Of the commandments, v. 12. VI. Of the reputation of a wife abused, if she were innocent, v. 13. 19. but for her punishment, if guilty, v. 20, 21. VII. For the preservation of the chastity of wives, v. 22. Virgins betrothed, v. 23. 27. or not betrothed, v. 28, 29. And, lastly, against incest, v. 30.

1. THOU shalt not see thy brother's ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt in any case bring them again unto thy brother. 2. And if thy brother be not nigh unto thee, or if thou know him not, then thou shalt bring it unto thine own house, and it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it, and thou shalt restore it to him again. 3. In like manner shalt thou do with his ass; and so shalt thou do with his raiment; and with all lost things of thy brother's, which he hath lost, and thou hast found, shalt thou do likewise: thou mayest not hide thyself. 4. Thou shalt not see thy brother's ass or his ox fall down by the way, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt surely help him to lift them up again.

The kindness that was commanded to be shown in reference to an enemy, (Exod. 23. 4, &c.) is here required to be much more done for a neighbour, though he were not an Israelite, for the law is consonant to natural equity.

1. That strayed cattle should be brought back, either to the owner, or to the pasture out of which they had gone astray, v. 1, 2. This must be done, in pity to the very cattle, which, while they wandered, were exposed; and in civility and respect to the owner, nay, and in justice to him, for it was doing as we would be done by, which is one of the fundamental laws of equity. Note, Religion teaches us to be neighbourly, and to be ready to do all good offices, as we have opportunity, to all men. In doing this, (1.) They must not mind trouble, but if they knew not who the owner was, must take it home, and feed it till the owner was found. If such care must be taken of a neighbour's ox or ass going astray, much more of himself going astray from God and his duty; we should do our utmost to convert him, (Jam. 5. 19.) and restore him, considering ourselves, Gal. 6. 1.

2. That lost goods should be brought to the owner, v. 3. The Jews say, "He that found the lost goods, was to give public notice of them by the common crier three or four times," according to the usage with us; if the owner could not be found, he that found the goods, might convert them to his own use; but (say some learned writers in this case) he would do very well to give the value of the goods to the poor.

3. That cattle in distress should be helped, v. 4. This must be done, both in compassion to the brute-creatures, for a merciful man regardeth the life of a beast, though it be not his own, and in love and friendship to our neighbour, not knowing how soon we may have occasion for his help. If one member may say to another, "I have at present no need of thee," it cannot say, "I never shall."

5. The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman's garment; for all that do so are abomination unto the LORD thy God. 6. If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way on any tree, or on the ground, whether they be young ones, or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young. 7. But thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee, that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days. 8. When thou buildest a new house, then thou shalt make a battlement for thy roof, that thou bring not blood upon thine house, if any man fall from thence. 9. Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with divers seeds; lest the fruit of thy seed which thou hast sown, and the fruit of thy vineyard, be defiled. 10. Thou shalt not plough with an ox and an ass together. 11. Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woollen and linen together. 12. Thou shalt make thee fringes upon the four quarters of thy vesture, wherewith thou coverest thyself.

Here are several laws in these verses, which seem to stoop very low, and to take cognizance of things mean and minute; men's laws commonly do not so; De minimis non curat lex—The law takes no cognizance of little things; but because God's providence extends itself to the smallest affairs, his precepts do so, that even in them we may be in the fear of the Lord, as we are under his eye and care. And yet the significance and tendency of these statutes, which seem little, are such, that, notwithstanding their minuteness, being found among the things of God's law, which he has written to us, they are to be accounted great things.

I. The distinction of sexes by the apparel is to be kept up, for the preservation of our own and our neighbour's chastity, v. 5. Nature itself teaches that a difference be made between them in their hair, (1 Cor. 11. 14.) and by the same rule in their clothes, which therefore ought not to be confounded, either in ordinary wear, or occasionally. To befriend a lawful escape or concealment, it may be done; but whether for sport, or in the acting of plays, is justly questionable. 1. Some think it refers to the idolatrous custom of the gentiles: in the worship of Venus, women appeared in armour, and men in women's clothes; this, as other such superstitious usages, is here said to be an abomination to the Lord. 2. It forbids the confounding of the dispositions and affairs of the sexes: men must not be effeminate, nor do the women's work in the house, nor must women be viragos, pretend to teach or usurp authority, 1 Tim. 2. 11, 12. 3. Probably, this confounding of garments had been used to gain opportunity of committing uncleanness, and is therefore forbidden: for those that would be kept from sin, must keep themselves from all occasions of it and approaches to it.

II. In taking a bird's-nest, the dam must be let go, v. 6, 7. The Jews say, "This is the least of all the commandments of the law of Moses," and yet the same promise is here made to the observance of it, that is made to the keeping of the fifth commandment, which is one of the greatest, that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days: for as disobedience in a small matter, shows a very great contempt of the law; so obedience in a small matter shows a very great regard to it. He that let go a bird out of his hand, (which was worth two in the bush,) purely because God bid him, in that made it to appear that he esteemed all God's precepts concerning all things to be right, and that he could deny himself rather than sin against God. But doth God take care for birds? 1 Cor. 9. 9. Yes, certainly; and perhaps to this law our Saviour alludes, Luke 12. 6. Are not five sparrows sold for two farthings, and not one of them is forgotten before God? This law, 1. Forbids us to be cruel to the brute-creatures, or to take a pleasure in destroying them. Though God has made us wiser than the fowls of heaven, and given us dominion over them, yet we must not abuse them, nor rule them with rigour. Let go the dam to breed again; destroy it not, for a blessing is in it, Isa. 65. 8. 2. It teaches us compassion to those of our own kind, and to abhor the thought of every thing that looks barbarous and cruel, and ill-natured, especially toward those of the weaker and tender sex, which always ought to be treated with the utmost respect, in consideration of the sorrows wherein they bring forth children. It is spoken of as an instance of the most inhuman cruelty, that the mother was dashed to pieces upon her children, (Hos. 10. 14.) and that the women with child were ript up, Amos 1. 13. 3. It further intimates, that we must not take advantage against any, from their natural affection, and the tenderness of their disposition, to do them an injury. The dam could not have been taken, if her concern for her eggs or young (unlike to the ostrich) had not detained her upon the nest, when otherwise she could easily have secured herself by flight. Now, since it is a thousand pities that she should fare the worse for that which is her praise, the law takes care that she shall be let go. The remembrance of this may, perhaps, some time or other, keep us from doing a hard or unkind thing to those whom we have at our mercy.

III. In building a house, care must be taken to make it safe, that none might receive mischief by falling from it, v. 8. The roofs of their houses were flat for people to walk on, as appears by many scriptures; now, lest any, through carelessness, should fall off them, they must compass them with battlements, which (the Jews say) must be three feet and a half high; if this were not done, and mischief followed, the owner, by his neglect, brought the guilt of blood upon his house. See here, 1. How precious men's lives are to God, who protects them, not only by his providence, but by his law. 2. How precious, therefore, they ought to be to us, and what care we should take to prevent hurt from coming to any person. The Jews say, that, by the equity of this law, they were obliged (and so are we too) to fence, or remove, every thing by which life may be endangered, as to cover draw-wells, keep bridges in repair, and the like; lest, if any perish through our omission, their blood be required at our hand.

IV. Odd mixtures are here forbidden, v. 9, 10. Much of this we met with before, Lev. 19. 19. There appears not any thing at all of moral evil in these things, and therefore we now make no conscience of sowing wheat and rye together, ploughing with horses and oxen together, and wearing linsey-woolsey garments; but hereby is forbidden, either, 1. A conformity to some idolatrous customs of the heathen. Or, 2. That which is contrary to the plainness and purity of an Israelite. They must not gratify their own vanity and curiosity, by putting those things together which the Creator, in infinite wisdom, had made asunder: they must not be unequally yoked with unbelievers; nor mingle themselves with the unclean, as an ox with an ass. Nor must their profession and appearance in the world be motley, or party-coloured, but all of a piece, all of a kind.

V. The law concerning fringes upon their garments, and memorandums of the commandments, which we had before, Numb. 15. 38, 39. is here repeated, v. 12. By these they were distinguished from other people, so that it might be said, upon the first sight, There goes an Israelite; which taught them not to be ashamed of their country, or the peculiarities of their religion, how much soever their neighbours looked upon them and it with contempt; and they were also put in mind of the precepts, upon the particular occasions to which they had reference; and perhaps the law is repeated here, because the precepts immediately foregoing seemed so minute, that they were in danger of being overlooked and forgotten. The fringes will remind you not to make your garments of linen and woollen, v. 11.

13. If any man take a wife, and go in unto her, and hale her, 14. And give occasions of speech against her, and bring up an evil name upon her, and say, I took this woman, and when I came to her, I found her not a maid: 15. Then shall the father of the damsel, and her mother, take and bring forth the tokens of the damsel's virginity unto the elders of the city in the gate: 16. And the damsel's father shall say unto the elders, I gave my daughter unto this man to wife, and he hateth her; 17. And, lo, he hath given occasions of speech against her, saying, I found not thy daughter a maid; and yet these are the tokens of my daughter's virginity. And they shall spread the cloth before the elders of the city. 18. And the elders of that city shall take that man and chastise him; 19. And they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father of the damsel, because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin of Israel: and she shall be his wife; he may not put her away all his days. 20. But if this thing be true, and the tokens of virginity be not found for the damsel: 21. Then they shall bring out the damsel to the door of her father's house, and the men of her city shall stone her with stones that she die: because she hath wrought folly in Israel, to play the whore in her father's house: so shalt thou put evil away from among you. 22. If a man be found lying with a woman married to an husband, then they shall both of them die, both the man that lay with the woman, and the woman: so shalt thou put away evil from Israel. 23. If a damsel that is a virgin be betrothed unto an husband, and a man find her in the city, and lie with her; 24. Then ye shall bring them both out unto the gate of that city, and ye shall stone them with stones that they die; the damsel, because she cried not, being in the city; and the man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife: so thou shalt put away evil from among you. 25. But if a man find a betrothed damsel in the field, and the man force her, and lie with her: then the man only that lay with her shall die. 26. But unto the damsel thou shalt do nothing; there is in the damsel no sin worthy of death: for as when a man riseth against his neighbour, and slayeth him, even so is this matter: 27. For he found her in the field, and the betrothed damsel cried, and there was none to save her. 28. If a man find a damsel that is a virgin, which is not betrothed, and lay hold on her, and lie with her, and they be found; 29. Then the man that lay with her shall give unto the damsel's father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife; because he hath humbled her, he may not put her away all his days. 30. A man shall not take his father's wife, nor discover his father's skirt.

These laws relate to the seventh commandment, laying a restraint, by laying a penalty, upon those fleshly lusts which war against the soul.

I. If a man, lusting after another woman, to get rid of his wife, slander her, and falsely accuse her, as not having the virginity she pretended to when he married her, upon the disproof of his slander, he must be punished, v. 13. 19. What the meaning of that evidence is, by which the husband's accusation was to be proved false, the learned are not agreed, nor is it at all necessary to inquire—they for whom this law was intended no doubt understood it: it is sufficient for us to know, that this wicked husband, who had thus endeavoured to ruin the reputation of his own wife, was to be scourged, and fined, and bound out from ever divorcing the wife he had thus abused, v. 13, 19. Upon this dislike of her, he might have divorced her, if he had pleased, by the permission of the law, ch. 24. 1. but then he must have given her her dowry: if, therefore, to save that, and to do her the greater mischief, he would thus destroy her good name, it was fit that he should be severely punished for it, and for ever after forfeit the permission to divorce her. Observe, 1. The nearer any are in relation to us, the greater sin it is to belie them, and blemish their reputation. It is spoken of as a crime of the highest nature to slander their own mother's son, (Ps. 50. 20.) who is next to thyself, much more to slander thine own wife, or thine own husband, that is thyself. It is an ill bird indeed that defiles its own nest. 2. Chastity is honour as well as virtue, and that which gives occasion for the suspicion of it, is as great a reproach and disgrace as any other whatsoever: in this matter, therefore, above any thing, we should be highly tender, both of our own good name, and that of others. 3. Parents must look upon themselves as concerned to vindicate the reputation of their children, for it is a branch of their own.

II. If the woman, that was married as a virgin, were not found to be one, she was to be stoned to death at her father's door, v. 20, 21. If the uncleanness had been committed before she was betrothed, it would not have been punished as a capital crime; but she must die for the abuse she put upon him whom she married, being conscious to herself of her being defiled, while she made him believe her to be a chaste and modest woman. But some think that her uncleanness was punished with death, only in case it was committed after she was betrothed, supposing there were few come to maturity but what were betrothed, though not yet married. Now, 1. This gave a powerful caution to young women to flee fornication, since, however concealed before, so as not to mar their marriage, it would, very likely, be discovered after, to their perpetual infamy and utter ruin. 2. It is intimated to parents, that they must by all means possible preserve their children's chastity, by giving them good advice and admonition, setting them good examples, keeping them from bad company, praying for them, and laying them under needful restraints; because, if the children committed lewdness, the parents must have the grief and shame of the execution at their own door. That phrase of jolly wrought in Israel, was used concerning this very crime in the case of Dinah, Gen. 34. 7. All sin is folly, uncleanness especially; but, above all, uncleanness in Israel, by profession a holy people.

III. If any man, single or married, lay with a married woman, they were both to be put to death, v. 22. This law we had before, Lev. 20. 10. For, a married man to lie with a single woman was not a crime of so high a nature, nor was it punished with death, because not introducing a spurious brood into families, under the character of legitimate children.

IV. If a damsel were betrothed and not married, she was from under the eye of her intended husband, and therefore she and her chastity were taken under the special protection of the law. 1. If her chastity were violated by her own consent, she was to be put to death, and her adulterer with her, v. 23, 24. And it shall be presumed that she consented, if it were done in the city, or in any place where, had she cried out, help might speedily have come in to prevent the injury offered her. Qui tacet, consentire videtur—Silence implies consent. Note, It may be presumed that those willingly yield to a temptation, (whatever they pretend,) who will not use the means and helps they might be furnished with to avoid and overcome it. Nay, her being found in the city, a place of company and diversion, when she should have kept under the protection of her father's house, was an evidence against her, that she had not that dread of the sin, and the danger of it, which became a modest woman. Note, They that needlessly expose themselves to temptation, justly suffer for the same, if, ere they are aware, they be surprised and caught by it. Dinah lost her honour, to gratify her curiosity with a sight of the daughters of the land. By this law the Virgin Mary was in danger of being made a public example, that is, of being stoned to death, but that God, by an angel, cleared the matter to Joseph. 2. If she were forced, and never consented, he that committed the rape was to be put to death, but the damsel was to be acquitted, v. 25. 27. Now, if it were done in the field, out of the hearing of neighbours, it shall be presumed that she cried out, but there was none to save her; and, besides, her going into the field, a place of solitude, did not so much expose her. Now, by this law, it is intimated to us, (1.) That we shall suffer only for the wickedness we do, not for that which is done unto us. That is no sin, which has not more or less of the will in it. (2.) That we must presume the best concerning all persons, unless the contrary do appear; not only charity but equity teaches us to do so. Though none heard her cry, yet, because none could hear it if she did, it shall be taken for granted that she did. This rule we should go by in judging of persons and actions, believe all things, and hope all things. (3.) That our chastity should be as dear to us as our life; when that is assaulted, it is not at all improper to cry Murder, Murder, for, as when a man riseth against his neighbour and slayeth him, even so is this matter. (4.) By way of allusion to this, see what we are to do when Satan sets upon us with his temptations; wherever we are, let us cry aloud to Heaven for help, (Succurre, Domine, vim patior—Help me, O Lord, for I suffer violence,) and there we may be sure to be heard, and answered, as Paul was, My grace is sufficient for thee.

V. If a damsel, not betrothed, be thus abused by violence, he that abused her should be fined, the father should have the fine; and if he and the damsel did consent, he should be bound to marry her, and never to divorce her, how much soever she was below him, and how displeasing soever she might afterward be to him as Tamar was to Amnon, after he had forced her, v. 28, 29. This was to deter men from such vicious practices, which it is a shame that we are necessitated to read and write of.

VI. The law against a man's marrying his father's widow, or having any undue familiarity with his father's wife, is here repeated, v. 30. from Lev. 18. 8. And, probably, it is intended (as Bishop Patrick notes) for a short memorandum to them, carefully to observe all the laws there made against incestuous marriages, this being specified, which is the most detestable of all; it is that of which the apostle says, It is not so much as named among the Gentiles, 1 Cor. 5. 1.

CHAP. XXIII.

The laws of this chapter provide, I. For the preserving of the purity and honour of the families of Israel, by excluding such as would be a disgrace to them, v. 1. 8. II. For the preserving of the purity and honour of the camp of Israel when it was abroad, v. 9. 14. III. For the encouraging and entertaining of proselytes, v. 15, 16. IV. Against whoredom, v. 17, 18. V. Against usury, v. 19, 20. VI. Against the breach of vows, v. 21. 23. VII. What liberty a man might take in his neighbour's field and vineyard, and what not, v. 24, 25.

1. HE that is wounded in the stones, or hath his privy member cut off, shall not enter into the congregation of the LORD. 2. A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the LORD; even to his tenth generation shall he not enter into the congregation of the LORD. 3. An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the LORD; even to their tenth generation shall they not enter into the congregation of the LORD for ever: 4. Because they met you not with bread and with water in the way, when ye came forth out of Egypt; and because they hired against thee Balaam the son of Beor of Pethor of Mesopotamia, to curse thee. 5. Nevertheless the LORD thy God would not hearken unto Balaam; but the LORD thy God turned the curse into a blessing unto thee, because the LORD thy God loved thee. 6. Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever. 7. Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite; for he is thy brother: thou shalt not abhor an Egyptian; because thou wast a stranger in his land. 8. The children that are begotten of them shall enter into the congregation of the LORD in their third generation.

Interpreters are not agreed what is here meant by entering into the congregation of the Lord, which is here forbidden to eunuchs and to bastards, Ammonites and Moabites, for ever, but to Edomites and Egyptians only till the third generation. 1. Some think they are hereby excluded from communicating with the people of God in their religious services; though eunuchs and bastards were owned as members of the church, and the Ammonites and Moabites might be circumcised and proselyted to the Jewish religion, yet they, and their families, must lie for some time under marks of disgrace, remembering the rock whence they were hewn, and must not come so near the sanctuary as others might, nor have so free a communion with Israelites. 2. Others think they are hereby excluded from bearing office in the congregation: none of these must be elders or judges, lest the honour of the magistracy should thereby be stained. 3. Others think they are excluded only from marrying with Israelites. Thus the learned Bishop Patrick inclines to understand it; yet, we find, that when this law was put in execution after the captivity, they separated from Israel, not only the strange wives, but all the mixed multitude, see Neh. 13. 1. . 3. With the daughters of these nations, (though out of the nations of Canaan,) it should seem, the men of Israel might marry, if they were completely proselyted to the Jewish religion; but with the men of these nations the daughters of Israel might not marry, nor could the men be naturalized, except as here excepted.

It is plain, in general, that disgrace is here put,

(1.) Upon bastards and eunuchs, v. 1, 2. By bastards here, the Jewish writers understand, not all that were born of fornication, or out of marriage, but all that were of those incestuous mixtures which are forbidden, Lev. 18. And though it was not the fault of the issue, yet, to deter people from those unlawful marriages, and unlawful lusts, it was very convenient that their posterity should thus be made infamous. By this rule, Jephthah, though the son of a harlot, a strange woman, (Judg. 11. 1, 2.) yet was not a bastard in the sense of this law. And, as for the eunuchs, though by this law they seemed to be cast out of the vineyard as dry trees, which they complain of, Isa. 56. 3. yet it is there promised, v. 5. that, if they took care of their duty to God, as far as they were admitted, by keeping his sabbaths, and choosing the things that pleased him, the want of this privilege should be made up to them, with such spiritual blessings as would entitle them to an everlasting name.

(2.) Upon Ammonites and Moabites, the posterity of Lot, who, for his outward convenience, had separated himself from Abraham, Gen. 13. 11. And we do not find that he or his ever joined themselves again to the children of the covenant. They are here cut off to the tenth generation, that is, (as some think it is explained,) for ever. Compare Neh. 13. 1. The reason of this quarrel, which Israel must have with them, so as not to seek their peace, v. 6. is, because of the unkindness they had now lately done to the camp of Israel, notwithstanding the orders God had given, not to distress or vex them, Deut. 2. 9, 19. [1.] It was bad enough that they did not meet them with bread and water in the way, v. 4. that they did not, as allies, or at least as neutral states, bring victuals into their camp, which they should have been duly paid for. It was well that God's Israel did not need their kindness, God himself following them with bread and water. However, this omission of the Ammonites should be remembered against their nation in future ages. Note, God will certainly reckon, not only with those that oppose his people, but with those that do not help and further them, when it is in the power of their hand to do it. The charge at the great day is for an omission, I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat. [2.] The Moabites had done worse, they hired Balaam to curse them, v. 4. It is true, God turned the curse into a blessing, v. 5. not only changing the word in Balaam's mouth, but making that really turn to the honour and advantage of Israel which was designed for their ruin. But, though the design was defeated, and overruled for good, the Moabites' wickedness was not the less provoking. God will deal with sinners, not only according to their deeds, but according to their endeavours, Ps. 28. 4.

(3.) The Edomites and Egyptians have not so deep a mark of displeasure put upon them, as the Moabites and Ammonites had. If an Edomite or Egyptian turned proselyte, his grand-children should be looked upon as members of the congregation of the Lord, to all intents and purposes, v. 7, 8. We should think that the Edomites had been more injurious to the Israelites than the Ammonites, and deserved as little favour from them, Numb. 20. 20. and yet "Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite, as thou must an Ammonite, for he is thy brother." Note, The unkindness of near relations, though by many worst taken, yet should with us, for that reason, because of the relation, be first forgiven, and then, as to the Egyptians, here is a strange reason given why they must not be abhorred, "Thou wast a stranger in their land, and therefore, though hardly used there, be civil to them, for old acquaintance sake." They must not remember their bondage in Egypt, for the keeping up of any ill-will to the Egyptians, but only for the magnifying of God's power and goodness in their deliverance.

9. When the host goeth forth against thine enemies, then keep thee from every wicked thing. 10. If there be among you any man, that is not clean by reason of uncleanness that chanceth him by night, then shall he go abroad out of the camp, he shall not come within the camp: 11. But it shall be, when evening cometh on, he shall wash himself with water: and when the sun is down, he shall come into the camp again. 12. Thou shalt have a place also without the camp, whither thou shalt go forth abroad: 13. And thou shalt have a piddle upon thy weapon; and it shall be, when thou wilt ease thyself abroad, thou shalt dig therewith, and shalt turn back and cover that which cometh from thee: 14. For the LORD thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp, to deliver thee, and to give up thine enemies before thee; therefore shall thy camp be holy: that he see no unclean thing in thee, and turn away from thee.

Israel was now encamped, and this vast army was just entering upon action, which was likely to keep them together for a long time, and therefore it was fit to give them particular directions for the good ordering of their camp. And the charge is, in one word, to be clean. They must take care to keep their camp pure from moral, ceremonial, and natural, pollution.

1. From moral pollution, v. 9. When the host goeth forth against thine enemy, then look upon thyself as in a special manner engaged to keep thyself from every evil thing. (1.) The soldiers themselves must take heed of sin, for sin takes off the edge of valour; guilt makes men cowards. They that put their lives in their hands are concerned to make and keep their peace with God, and preserve a conscience void of offence; then may they look death in the face without terror. Soldiers, in executing their commission, must keep themselves from gratifying the lusts of malice, covetousness, or uncleanness, for those are wicked things; must keep themselves from the idols, or accursed things, they found in the camps they plundered. (2.) Even they that tarried at home, the body of the people, and every particular person, must at that time especially keep from every wicked thing, lest by sin they provoke God to withdraw his presence from the host, and give victory to the enemy, for the correcting of his own people. Times of war should be times of reformation, else how can we expect God should hear and answer our prayers for success? Ps. 66. 18. See 1 Sam. 7. 3.

2. From ceremonial pollution, which might befall a person, when unconsciously of it, for which he was bound to wash his flesh in water, and look upon himself as unclean until the even, Lev. 15. 16. A soldier, notwithstanding the constant service and duty he had to do in the camp, must be so far from looking upon himself as discharged from the observance of that ceremony, that more was required from him than at another time; had he been at his own house, he needed only to wash his flesh, but, being in the army, he must go abroad out of the camp, as one concerned to keep it pure, and ashamed of his own impurity, and not return till after sun-set, v. 10, 11. By this trouble and reproach, which even involuntary pollutions exposed men to, they were taught to keep up a very great dread of all fleshly lusts. It were well if military men would consider this.

3. From natural pollution; the camp of the Lord must have nothing offensive in it, v. 12, 14. It is strange that the divine law, or at least the solemn order and direction of Moses, should extend to a thing of this nature; but the design of it was to teach them, (1.) Modesty and a good decorum; nature itself teaches them thus to distinguish themselves from beasts that know no shame. (2.) Cleanliness, and (though not niceness, yet) neatness, even in their camp. Impurity is offensive to the senses God has endued us with, prejudicial to the health, a wrong to the comfort of human life, and an evidence of a careless slothful temper of mind. (3.) Purity from the pollutions of sin; if there must be this care taken to preserve the body clean and sweet, much more should we be solicitous to keep the mind so. (4.) A reverence of the divine majesty. This is the reason here given; for the Lord thy God walketh by his ark, the special token of his presence, in the midst of thy camp; with respect to that external symbol this external purity is required, which (though not insisted on in the letter when that reason ceases, yet) teaches us to preserve inward purity of soul, in consideration of the eye of God, which is always upon us. By this expression of respect to the presence of God among them, they were taught both to fortify themselves against sin, and to encourage themselves against their enemies with the consideration of that presence. (5.) A regard one to another. The filthiness of one is noisome to many; this law of cleanliness therefore teaches us not to do that which will be justly offensive to our brethren, and grieve them. It is a law against nuisances.

15. Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee: 16. He shall dwell with thee, even among you, in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him. 17. There shall be no whore of the daughters of Israel, nor a sodomite of the sons of Israel. 18. Thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore, or the price of a dog, into the house of the LORD thy God for any vow: for even both these are abomination unto the LORD thy God. 19. Thou shalt not lend upon usury to thy brother; usury of money, usury of victuals, usury of any thing that is lent upon usury: 20. Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it. 21. When thou shalt vow a vow unto the LORD thy God, thou shalt not slack to pay it: for the LORD thy God will surely require it of thee; and it would be sin in thee. 22. But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee. 23. That which is gone out of thy lips thou shalt keep and perform; even a freewill-offering, according as thou hast vowed unto the LORD thy God, which thou hast promised with thy mouth. 24. When thou comest into thy neighbour's vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes thy fill at thine own pleasure; but thou shalt not put any in thy vessel. 25. When thou comest into the standing corn of thy neighbour, then thou mayest pluck the ears with thine hand; but thou shalt not move a sickle unto thy neighbour's standing corn.

Orders are here given about five several things which have no relation one to another.

I. The land of Israel is here made a sanctuary, or city of refuge, for servants that were wronged and abused by their masters, and fled thither for shelter from the neighbouring countries, v. 15, 16. We cannot suppose that they were hereby obliged to give entertainment to all the unprincipled men that ran from service; Israel needed not (as Rome at first did) to be thus peopled. But, 1. They must not deliver up the trembling servant to his enraged master, till upon trial it appeared that the servant had wronged his master, and was justly liable to punishment. Note, It is an honourable thing to shelter and protect the weak, provided they be not wicked. God allows his people to patronise the oppressed. The angel bid Hagar return to her mistress, and St. Paul sent Onesimus back to his master Philemon, because they had neither of them any cause to go away, nor were either of them exposed to any danger in returning. But the servant here is supposed to escape, that is, to run for his life, to the people of Israel, of whom he had heard (as Ben-hadad of the kings of Israel, 1 Kings, 20. 31.) that they were a merciful people, to save himself from the fury of a tyrant; and in that case to deliver him up, is to throw a lamb into the mouth of a lion. 2. If it appeared that the servant was abused, they must not only protect him, but, supposing him willing to embrace their religion, they must give him all the encouragement that might be, to settle among them. Care is taken both that he should not be imposed upon in the place of his settlement—let it be that which he shall choose, and where it liketh him best; and that he should not exchange one hard master for many—thou shalt not oppress him. Thus would he soon find a comfortable difference between the land of Israel and other lands, and would choose it to be his rest for ever. Note, Proselytes and converts to the truth should be treated with particular tenderness, that they may have no temptation to return.

II. The land of Israel shall be no shelter for the unclean; no whore, no sodomite, must be suffered to live among them, v. 17, 18. neither a whore nor a whoremonger. No houses of uncleanness must be kept either by men or women. Here is, 1. A good reason intimated why there should be no such wickedness tolerated among them; they were Israelites. That seems to have an emphasis laid upon it. For a daughter of Israel to be a whore, or a son of Israel a whoremonger, is to reproach the stock they are come of, the people they belong to, and the God they worship. It is bad in any, but worst in Israelites, a holynation, 2 Sam. 13. 12. 2. A just mark of displeasure put upon this wickedness, that the hire of a whore, that is, the money she gets by her whoring, and the price of a dog, that is, of the sodomite, pimp, or whoremonger, (so I incline to understand it, for such are called dogs, Rev. 22. 15.) the money he gets by these lewd and villanous practices, no part of it shall be brought into the house of the Lord (as was commonly done by the prostitutes among the Gentiles) for any vow. This intimates, (1.) That God would not accept of any offering at all from such wicked people; they had nothing to bring an offering of, but what they got by their wickedness, and therefore their sacrifice could not but be an abomination to the Lord, Prov. 15. 8. (2.) That they should not think, by making and paying vows, and bringing offerings to the Lord, to obtain leave to go on in this sin, as (it should seem) some that followed that trade suggested to themselves, when their offerings were admitted, Prov. 7. 14, 15. This day have I paid my vows, therefore came I forth to meet thee. Nothing should be accepted in commutation of penance. (3.) That we cannot honour God with our substance, unless it be honestly and honourably come by. It must not only be considered what we give, but how we got it; God hates robbery for burnt-offerings, and uncleanness too.

III. The matter of usury is here settled, v. 19, 20. (1.) They must not lend upon usury to an Israelite. They had and held their estates immediately from and under God, who, while he distinguished them from all other people, might have ordered, had he so pleased, that they should have all things in common among themselves, but instead of that, and in token of their joint interest in the good land he had given them, he only appointed them, as there was occasion, to lend to one another without interest; which, among them, would be little or no loss to the lender, because their land was so divided, their estates were so little, and there was so little of merchandise among them, that it was seldom or never that they had occasion to borrow any great sums, except for the subsistence of their families, when the fruits of their ground had met with any disaster, or the like; and in such a case, for a small matter to insist upon usury, would have been very barbarous. Where the borrower gets, or hopes to get, it is just that the lender should share in the gain; but to him that borrows for his necessary food, pity should be showed, and we must lend, hoping for nothing again, if we have wherewithal to do it, Luke 6. 35. (2.) They might lend upon usury to a stranger, who was supposed to live by trade, and (as we say) by turning the penny, and therefore got by what he borrowed, and came among them in hopes to do so. By this it appears that usury is not in itself oppressive; for they must not oppress a stranger, and yet might exact usury from him.

IV. The performance of the vows wherewith we have bound our souls, is here required; and it is a branch of the law of nature, v. 21—23. (1.) We are here left at our liberty whether we will make vows or no. If thou shalt forbear to vow, (some particular sacrifice and offering, more than was commanded by the law,) it shall be no sin to thee. God had already signified his readiness to accept a free-will-offering thus vowed, though it were but a little fine flour, (Lev. 2. 4, &c.) which was encouragement enough to those who were so inclined. But lest the priests, who had the largest share of those vows and voluntary offerings, should sponge upon the people, by pressing it upon them as their duty to make such vows, beyond their ability and inclination, they are here expressly told that it should not be reckoned a sin in them, if they did not make any such vows, as it would be if they omitted any of the sacrifices that God had particularly required. For (as Bishop Patrick well expresses it) God would have men to be easy in his service, and all their offering to be free and cheerful. (2.) We are here laid under the highest obligations, when we have made a vow, to perform it, and to perform it speedily; Thou shalt not slack to pay it; lest if it be delayed beyond the first opportunity, the zeal abate, the vow be forgotten, or something happen to disable thee for the performance of it. That which is gone out of thy lips as a solemn and deliberate vow, must not be recalled, but thou shalt keep and perform it, punctually and fully. The rule of the gospel goes somewhat further than this, (2 Cor. 9. 7.) Every one, according as he purposeth in his heart, though it have not gone out of his lips, so let him give. Here is a good reason why we should pay our vows, that if we do not, God will require it of us, will surely and severely reckon with us, not only for lying, but for going about to mock him, who cannot be mocked. See Eccl. 4. 5.

V. Allowance is here given, when they passed through a corn-field, or vineyards, to pluck and eat of the corn or grapes that grew by the road-side, whether it was done for necessity or delight, only they must carry none away with them, v. 24, 25. Therefore the disciples were not censured for plucking the ears of corn, (it was well enough known that the law allowed it,) but for doing it on the sabbath-day, which the tradition of the elders had forbidden. Now, 1. This law intimated to them what great plenty of corn and wine they should have in Canaan, so much, that a little would not be missed out of their fruits; they should have enough for themselves and all their friends. 2. It provided for the support of poor travellers, to relieve the fatigue of their journies, and teaches us to be kind to such. The Jews say, "This law was chiefly intended in favour of labourers, who were employed in gathering in their harvest and vintages, their mouths must not be muzzled any more than that of the ox when he treads out the corn." 3. It teaches us not to insist upon property in a small matter, of which it is easy to say, What is that between me and thee? It was true, the grapes which the passenger ate, were none of his own, nor did the proprietor give them him; but the thing was of so small value, that he had reason to think, were he present, he would not deny them him, any more than he himself would grudge the like courtesy, and therefore it was no theft to take them. 4. It used them to hospitality, and teaches us to be ready to distribute, willing to communicate, and not to think every thing lost that is given away. Yet, lastly, It forbids us to abuse the kindness of our friends, and to take the advantage of fair concessions to make unreasonable encroachments: we must not draw an ell from those that give but an inch; they may eat of their neighbour's grapes: but it does not therefore follow that they may carry away.

CHAP. XXIV.

In this chapter we have, I. The toleration of divorce, v. 1—4. II. A discharge of new married men from the war, v. 5. III. Laws concerning pledges, v. 6, 10—13, 17. IV. Against man-stealing, v. 7. V. Concerning the leprosy, v. 8, 9. VI. Against the injustice of masters toward their servants, v. 14, 15. Judges in capital causes, (v. 16.) and civil concerns, v. 17, 18. VII. Of charity to the poor, v. 19—22.

1. WHEN a man hath taken a wife and married her, and it come to pass that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some uncleanness in her: then let him write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house. 2. And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's wife. 3. And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorcement, and giveth it in her hand, and sendeth her out of his house; or if the latter husband die, which took her to be his wife; 4. Her former husband which sent her away, may not take her again to be his wife, after that she is defiled: for that is abomination before the LORD, and thou shalt not cause the land to sin, which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance.

This is that permission which the Pharisees erroneously referred to as a precept, Matth. 19. 7. Moses commanded to give a writing of divorcement; it was not so; our Saviour told them that he only suffered it because of the hardness of their hearts, lest if they had not had liberty to divorce their wives, they should have ruled them with rigour, and, it may be, have been the death of them. It is probable that divorces were in use before; they are taken for granted, (Lev. 21. 14.) and Moses thought it needful here to give some rules concerning them.

1. That a man might not divorce his wife, unless he found some uncleanness in her, v. 1. It was not sufficient to say that he did not like her, or that he liked another better, but he must show cause for his dislike; something that made her disagreeable and unpleasant to him, though it might not make her so to another. This uncleanness must mean something less than adultery; for, for that, she was to die; and less than the suspicion of it, for, in that case, he might give her the waters of jealousy; but it means either a light carriage, or a cross, froward disposition, or some loathsome sore or disease; nay, some of the Jewish writers suppose, that an offensive breath might be a just ground for divorce. Whatever is meant by it, doubtless, it was something considerable; so that their modern doctors erred, who allowed divorce for every cause, though never so trivial, Matth. 19. 3.

2. That it must be done, not by word of mouth, for that might be spoken hastily, but by writing, and that put in due form, and solemnly declared, before witnesses, to be his own act and deed, which was a work of time, and left room for consideration, that it might not be done rashly.

3. That the husband must give it into the hand of his wife, and send her away; which some think, obliged him to endow her, and make provision for her, according to her quality, and such as might help to marry her again; for this there was good reason, since the cause of quarrel was not her fault, but her infelicity.

4. That being divorced, it was lawful for her to marry another husband, v. 2. The divorce had dissolved the bond of marriage as effectually as death could; so that she was as free to marry again, as if her first husband had been naturally dead.

5. That if her second husband (died or) divorced her, then still she might marry a third, but her first husband should never take her again, (v. 3, 4) which he might have done, if she had not married another; for by that act of her own she had perfectly renounced him for ever, and, as to him, was looked upon as defiled, though not as to another person. The Jewish writers say, that this was to prevent a most vile and wicked practice which the Egyptians had, of changing wives; or perhaps it was intended to prevent men's rashness in putting away their wives; for the wife that was divorced, would be apt, in revenge, to marry another immediately, and perhaps the husband that divorced her, how much soever he thought to mend himself by another choice, would find the next worse, and something in her more disagreeable; so that he would wish for his first wife again. "No," (says this law,) "you shall not have her, you should have kept her when you had her." Note, It is best to be content with such things as we have, since changes made by discontent often prove for the worse. The uneasiness we know, is commonly better, though we are apt to think it worse, than that which we do not know. By the strictness of this law, God illustrates the riches of his grace in his willingness to be reconciled to his people that had gone a whoring from him, (Jer. 3. 1.) Thou hast played the harlot with many lovers, yet return again to me; for his thoughts and ways are above ours.

5. When a man hath taken a new wife, he shall not go out to war, neither shall he be charged with any business: but he shall be free at home one year, and shall cheer up his wife which he hath taken. 6. No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge: for he taketh a man's life to pledge. 7. If a man be found stealing any of his brethren of the children of Israel, and maketh merchandise of him, or selleth him; then that thief shall die, and thou shalt put evil away from among you. 8. Take heed in the plague of leprosy, that thou observe diligently, and do according to all that the priests and the Levites shall teach you: as I commanded them, so ye shall observe to do. 9. Remember what the LORD thy God did unto Miriam by the way, after that ye were come forth out of Egypt. 10. When thou dost lend thy brother any thing, thou shalt not go into his house to fetch his pledge. 11. Thou shalt stand abroad, and the man to whom thou dost lend, shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee. 12. And if the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge. 13. In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee: and it shall be righteousness unto thee before the LORD thy God.

Here is,

1. Provision made for the preservation and confirmation of love between new-married people, v. 5. This fitly follows upon the laws concerning divorce, which would be prevented if their affection to each other were well settled at first. If the husband were much abroad from his wife the first year, his love to her would be in danger of cooling, and of being drawn aside to others whom he would meet with abroad; therefore his service to his country in war, embassies, or other public business that would call him from home, shall be dispensed with, that he may cheer up the wife that he has taken. Note, 1. It is of great consequence that love be kept up between husband and wife, and that every thing be very carefully avoided, which might make them strange one to another, especially at first; for in that relation, where there is not the love that should be, there is an inlet ready to abundance of guilt and grief. 2. One of the duties of that relation, is to cheer up one another, under the cares and crosses that happen, as helpers of each other's joy; for a cheerful heart does good like a medicine.

II. A law against man-stealing, v. 7. It was not death by the law of Moses to steal cattle or goods, but to steal a child, or a weak and simple man, or one that a man had in his power, and to make merchandise of him, this was a capital crime, and could not be expiated, as other thefts, by restitution; so much is a man better than a sheep, Matth. 12. 12. It was a very heinous offence, for, 1. It was robbing the public of one of its members. 2. It was taking away a man's liberty, the liberty of a free-born Israelite, which was next in value to his life. 3. It was driving a man out from the inheritance of the land, to the privileges of which he was entitled, and bidding him go serve other gods, as David complains against Saul, 1 Sam. 26. 19.

III. A memorandum concerning the leprosy, v. 8, 9. 1. The laws concerning it must be carefully observed. The laws concerning it we had, Lev. 13. 14. They are here said to be commanded to the priests and Levites, and therefore are not repeated in a discourse to the people; but the people are here charged, in case of leprosy, to apply themselves to the priest according to the law, and to abide by his judgment, so far as it agreed with the law, and the plain matter of fact. The plague of leprosy being usually a particular mark of God's displeasure for sin; he in whom the signs of it did appear, ought not to conceal it, or cut out the signs of it, or apply himself to the physician for relief; but he must go to the priest, and follow his directions. Thus they that feel their consciences under guilt and wrath, must not cover it, or endeavour to shake off their convictions, but by repentance, and prayer, and humble confession, take the appointed way to peace and pardon. 2. The particular case of Miriam, who was smitten with leprosy for quarrelling with Moses, must not be forgotten. It was an explication of the law concerning the leprosy. Remember that, and, (1.) "Take heed of sinning after the similitude of her transgression, by despising dominions, and speaking evil of dignities, lest you thereby bring upon yourselves the same judgment." (2.) "If any of you be smitten with a leprosy, expect not that the law should be dispensed with, nor think it hard to be shut out of the camp, and so made a spectacle; there is no remedy; Miriam herself, though a prophetess, and the sister of Moses, was not exempted, but was forced to submit to this severe discipline, when she was under this divine rebuke." Thus David, Hezekiah, Peter, and other great men, when they had sinned, humbled themselves, and took to themselves the shame and grief; let us not expect to be reconciled upon easier terms.

IV. Some necessary orders given about pledges or pawns for the security of money lent. They are not forbidden to take such securities as would save the lender from loss, and oblige the borrower to be honest; but, 1. They must not take the millstone for a pledge, (v. 6.) for with that they ground the corn that was to be bread for their families; or if it were a public mill, with it the miller got his livelihood; and so it forbids the taking of any thing for a pledge, by the want of which a man was in danger of being undone. Consonant to this is the ancient common law of England, which provides, That no man be distrained of his utensils or instruments of his trade or profession, as the axe of a carpenter.

or the books of a scholar, or beasts belonging to the plough, as long as there are other beasts, of which distress may be made. (Coke, 1 Inst. fol. 47.) This teaches us to consult the comfort and subsistence of others as much as our own advantage. That creditor who cares not though his debtor and his family starve, nor is at all concerned what becomes of them, so he may but get his money or secure it, goes contrary, not only to the law of Christ, but even to the law of Moses too. 2. They must not go into the borrower's house to fetch the pledge, but must stand without, and he must bring it, v. 10, 11. The borrower (says Solomon) is servant to the lender; therefore lest the lender should abuse the advantage he has against him, and improve it for his own interest, it is provided that he takes not what he pleases, but what the borrower can best spare. A man's house is his castle, even the poor man's house is so, and is here taken under the protection of the law. 3. That a poor man's bed-clothes should never be taken for a pledge, v. 12, 13. This we had before, Exod. 22. 26, 27. If they were taken in the morning, they must be brought back again at night, which is in effect to say that they must not be taken at all. "Let the poor debtor sleep in his own raiment, and bless thee," that is, "pray for thee, and praise God for thy kindness to him." Note, Poor debtors ought to be sensible (more sensible than commonly they are) of the goodness of those creditors that do not take all the advantage of the law against them, and to repay their kindness by their prayers for them, when they are not in a capacity to repay it in any other way. "Nay, thou shalt not only have the prayers and good wishes of thy poor brother, but it shall be righteousness to thee before the Lord thy God," that is, "It shall be accepted and rewarded as an act of mercy to thy brother, and obedience to thy God, and an evidence of thy sincere conformity to the law. Though it may be looked upon by men as an act of weakness to deliver up the securities thou hast for thy debt, yet it shall be looked upon by thy God as an act of goodness, which shall in no wise lose its reward.

14. Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy, whether he be of thy brethren, or of thy strangers that are in thy land within thy gates. 15. At his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the sun go down upon it, for he is poor, and setteth his heart upon it; lest he cry against thee unto the LORD, and it be sin unto thee. 16. The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin. 17. Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless, nor take a widow's raiment to pledge. 18. But thou shalt remember that thou wast a bond-man in Egypt, and the LORD thy God redeemed thee thence: therefore I command thee to do this thing. 19. When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow: that the LORD thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands. 20. When thou beatest thine olive-tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. 21. When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. 22. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bond-man in the land of Egypt; therefore I command thee to do this thing.

Here,

I. Masters are commanded to be just to their poor servants, v. 14, 15. 1. They must not oppress them, either by overloading them with work, giving them undue and unreasonable rebukes, or withholding from them proper maintenance. A servant, though a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, must not be abused, "For thou wast a bond-man in the land where thou wast a stranger, (v. 18.) and thou knowest what a grievous thing it is to be oppressed by a task-master, and therefore, in tenderness to those that are servants and strangers, and in gratitude to that God who set thee at liberty, and settled thee in a country of thy own, Thou shalt not oppress a servant." Let not masters be tyrants to their servants, for their Master is in heaven. See Job 31. 13. 2. They must be faithful and punctual in paying them their wages. "At his day thou shalt give him his hire, not only pay it him in full, without fraud, but pay it in time, without further delay. As soon as he has done his day's work, if he desire it, let him have his day's wages," as those labourers, (Matth. 20. 8.) when even was come. He that works by day-wages, is supposed to live from hand to mouth, and cannot have to-morrow's bread for his family, till he is paid for his day's labour. If the wages be withheld, (1.) It will be grief to the servant, for, poor man, he sets his heart upon it, or, as the word is, he lifts up his soul to it, he is earnestly desirous of it, as the reward of his work, (Job 7. 2.) and depends upon it as the gift of God's providence for the maintenance of his family. A compassionate master, though it should be somewhat inconvenient to himself, would not disappoint the expectation of a poor servant that is so fond to think of receiving his wages. But that is not the worst. (2.) It will be guilt to the master. "The injured servant will cry against thee to the Lord; since he has no one else to appeal to, he will lodge his appeal in the court of heaven, and it will be sin to thee." Or, if he do not complain, the cause will speak for itself, "the hire of the labourers which is kept back by fraud, will itself cry," Jam. 5. 4. It is a greater sin than most people think it is, and will be found so in the great day, to put hardships upon poor servants, labourers, and workmen, that we employ. God will do them right if men do not.

II. Magistrates and judges are commanded to be just in their administrations. 1. In those which we call Pleas of the crown, a standing rule is here given, that the fathers shall not be put to death for the children, nor the children for the fathers, v. 16. If the children make themselves obnoxious to the law, let them suffer for it, but let not the parents suffer either for them, or with them; it is grief enough to them to see their children suffer: if the parents be guilty, let them die for their own sin; but though God, the sovereign Lord of life, sometimes visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, especially the sin of idolatry, and when he deals with nations in their national capacity, yet he does not allow men to do so. Accordingly, we find Amaziah sparing the children, even then when the fathers were put to death for killing the king, 2 Kings 14. 6. It was in an extraordinary case, and no doubt by special direction from heaven, that Saul's sons were put to death for his offence, and they died rather as sacrifices than as malefactors, 2 Sam. 21. 9, 14. 2. In common pleas between party and party, great care must be taken that none whose cause was just, should fare the worse for their weakness, nor for their being destitute of friends, as strangers, fatherless, and widows, v. 17. "Thou shalt not pervert their judgment, nor force them to give their very raiment for a pledge, by defrauding them of their right." Judges must be advocates for those that cannot speak for themselves, and have no friends to speak for them.

III. The rich are commanded to be kind and charitable to the poor. Many ways they are ordered to be so, by the law of Moses. The particular instance of charity here prescribed, is, that they should not be greedily in gathering in their corn, and grapes, and olives, so as to be afraid of leaving any behind them, but be willing to overlook some, and let the poor have the gleanings, v. 19. .22. 1. "Say not, 'It is all my own, and why should not I have it?' but learn a generous contempt of property in small matters. One sheaf or two forgotten will make thee never the poorer at the year's end, and it will do somebody good, if thou have it not." 2. "Say not, 'What I give I will give, and know whom I give it to; why should I leave it to be gathered by I know not whom, that will never thank me?' but trust God's providence with the disposal of thy charity, perhaps that will direct it to the most necessitous." Or, "Thou mayest reasonably think it will come to the hands of the most industrious, that are forward to seek and gather that which this law provides for them." 3. "Say not 'What should the poor do with grapes and olives? it is enough for them to have bread and water;' for, since they have the same senses that the rich have, why should not they have some little share of the delights of sense?" Boaz ordered handfuls of corn to be left on purpose for Ruth, and God blessed him. All that is left is not lost.

CHAP. XXV.

Here is, I. A law to moderate the scourging of malefactors, v. 1. .3. II. A law in favour of the ox that treads out the corn, v. 4. III. For the disgracing of him that refused to marry his brother's widow, v. 5. .10. IV. For the punishment of an immodest woman, v. 11, 12. V. For just weights and measures, v. 13. .16. VI. For the destroying of Amalek, v. 17. .19.

1. IF there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgment, that the judges may judge them; then they shall justify the righteous, and condemn the wicked. 2. And it shall be, if the wicked man be worthy to be beaten, that the judge shall cause him to lie down, and to be beaten before his face, according to his fault, by a certain number. 3. Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed: lest, if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee. 4. Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn.

Here is,

1. A direction to the judges in scourging malefactors, v. 1. .3. 1. It is here supposed, that, if a man be charged with a crime, the accuser and the accused (Actor and Reus) should be brought face to face before the judges, that the controversy may be determined. 2. If a man were accused of a crime, and the proof fell short, so that the charge could not be made out against him by the evidence, then he was to be acquitted, "Thou shalt justify the righteous," that is, "him that appears to the court to be so." If the accusation be proved, then the conviction of the accused is a justification of the accuser, as righteous in the prosecution. 3. If the accused were found guilty, judgment must be given against him, "Thou shalt condemn the wicked;" for to justify the wicked is as much an abomination to the Lord as it is to condemn the righteous, Prov. 17. 15. 4. If the crime were not made capital by the law, then the criminal must be beaten. A great many precepts we have met with which have not any particular penalty annexed to them, the violation of most of which, according to the constant practice of the Jews, was punished by scourging, from which no person's rank or quality did exempt him, if he were a delinquent, but with this proviso, that he should never be upbraided with it, nor should it be looked upon as leaving any mark of infamy or disgrace upon him. The directions here given for the scourging of criminals, are, (1.) That it be done solemnly; not tumultuously through the streets, but in open court, before the judge's face, and with so much deliberation, as that the stripes might be numbered. The Jews say, that, while execution was in doing, the chief justice of the court read, with a loud voice, Deut. 23. 53, 59. and 29. 9. and concluded with those words, Ps. 73. 33. But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity. Thus it was made a sort of religious act, and so much the more likely to reform the offender himself, and to be a warning to others. (2.) That it be done in proportion to the crime, according to his fault, that some crimes might appear, as they are, more heinous than others, the criminal being beaten with many stripes, to which, perhaps, there is an allusion, Luke, 12. 47, 48. (3.) That, how great soever the crime was, the number of stripes should never exceed forty, v. 3. Forty save one was the common usage, as appears, 2 Cor. 11. 24. It seems they always gave Paul as many stripes as ever they gave to any malefactor whatsoever. They abated one, either for fear of having miscounted, (though one of the judges was appointed to number the stripes,) or because they would never go to the utmost rigour, or because the execution was usually done with a whip of three lashes, so that thirteen stripes (each one being counted for three) made up thirty-nine, but one more, by that reckoning, would have been forty-two. The reason given for this, is, lest thy brother should seem vile unto thee. He must still be looked upon as a brother, (2 Thess. 3. 15.) and his reputation as such was preserved by this merciful limitation of his punishment. It saves him from seeming vile to his brethren, when God himself, by his law, takes this care of him. Men must not be treated as dogs; nor must those seem vile in our sight to whom, for aught we know, God may yet give grace, to make them precious in his sight.

II. A charge to husbandmen not to hinder their cattle from eating when they were working, if meat were within their reach, v. 4. This instance of the beast that trod out the corn, (to which there is an allusion in that of the prophet, Hos. 10. 11.) is put for all similar instances. That which makes this law very remarkable above its fellows, (and which countenances the like application of other such laws,) is, that it is twice quoted in the New Testament, to shew that it is the duty of the people to give their ministers a comfortable maintenance, 1 Cor. 9. 9, 10. and 1 Tim. 5. 17, 18. It teaches us, in the letter of it, to make much of the brute creatures that serve us, and to allow them, not only the necessary supports for their life, but the advantages of their labour; and thus we must learn, not only to be just, but kind, to all that are employed for our good, not only to maintain, but to encourage them, especially those that labour among us in the word and doctrine, and so are employed for the good of our better part.

5. If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him to wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her. 6. And it shall be, that the first-born which she beareth shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel. 7. And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel, he will not perform the duty of my husband's brother. 8. Then the elders of his city shall call him, and speak unto him: and if he stand to it, and say, I like not to take her; 9. Then shall his brother's wife come unto him in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, and shall answer and say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house.

10. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed. 11. When men strive together one with another, and the wife of the one draweth near for to deliver her husband out of the hand of him that smiteth him, and putteth forth her hand, and taketh him by the secrets: 12. Then thou shalt cut off her hand, thine eye shall not pity her.

Here is,

1. The law settled concerning the marrying of a brother's widow. It appears, from the story of Judah's family, that this had been an ancient usage, Gen. 38. 8. for the keeping up of distinct families. The case put is a case that often happens, of a man's dying without issue, it may be in the prime of his time, soon after his marriage, and while his brethren were yet so young as to be unmarried. Now, in this case, 1. The widow was not to marry again into any other family, unless all the relations of her husband did refuse her, that the estate she was endowed with might not be alienated. 2. The husband's brother, or next of kin, must marry her, partly out of respect to her, who, having forgotten her own people and her father's house, should have all possible kindness shewed her by the family into which she was married, and partly out of respect to the deceased husband, that, though he was dead and gone, he might not be forgotten, nor lost out of the genealogies of his tribe; for the first-born child, which the brother or next kinsman should have by the widow, should be denominated from him that was dead, and entered in the genealogy as his child, v. 5, 6. Under that dispensation, we have reason to think, men had not so clear and certain a prospect of living themselves on the other side death as we have now, to whom life and immortality are brought to light by the gospel, and therefore they could not but be the more desirous to live in their posterity, which innocent desire was, in some measure, gratified by this law, an expedient being found out, that though a man had no child by his wife, yet his name should not be put out of Israel, that is, out of the pedigree, or, which was equivalent, remain there under the brand of childlessness. The Sadducees put a case to our Saviour upon this law, with a design to perplex the doctrine of the resurrection by it, Matth. 22. 24, &c. perhaps insinuating that there was no need of maintaining the immortality of the soul, and a future state, since the law had so well provided for the perpetuating of men's names and families in the world. But, 3. If the brother, or next of kin, declined to do this good office to the memory of him that was gone, what must be done in that case? Why, (1.) He shall not be compelled to do it, v. 7. If he like her not, he is at liberty to refuse her, which, some think, was not permitted, in this case, before this law of Moses. Affection is all in all to the comfort of that relation; that is a thing which cannot be forced, and therefore the relation should not be forced without it. (2.) Yet he shall be publicly disgraced for not doing it. The widow, as the person most concerned for the name and honour of the deceased, was to complain to the elders of his refusal; if he persist in it, she was to pluck off his shoe, and spit in his face, in open court, (or, as the Jewish doctors moderate it, spit before his face,) thus to fasten a mark of infamy upon him, which was to remain with his family after him, v. 8. 10. Note, Those justly suffer, in their own reputation, who do not do what they ought to preserve the name and honour of others. He that would not build up his brother's house deserved to have this blemish put upon his own, that it should be called the house of him that had his shoe loosed, in token that he deserved to go barefoot. In the case of Ruth, we find this law executed, Ruth, 4. 7. but because, upon the refusal of the next kinsman, there was another ready to perform the duty of an husband's brother, it was that other that plucked off the shoe, and not the widow; Boaz, and not Ruth.

II. A law for the punishing of an immodest woman, v. 11, 12. The woman that, by the foregoing law, was to complain against her husband's brother for not marrying her, and to spit in his face before the elders, needed a good measure of assurance; but, lest the confidence which that law supported should grow to an excess unbecoming the sex, here is a very severe, but just, law to punish impudence and immodesty. 1. The instance of it is confessedly scandalous to the highest degree. A woman could not do it, unless she were perfectly lost to all virtue and honour. 2. The occasion is such as might, in part, excuse it; it was to help her husband out of the hands of one that was too hard for him. Now, if the doing of it in a passion, and with such a good intention, was to be so severely punished, much more when it was done wantonly, and in lust. 3. The punishment was, that her hand should be cut off; and the magistrates must not pretend to be more merciful than God, Thine eye shall not pity her. Perhaps our Saviour alludes to this law, when he commands us to cut off the right hand that offends us, or is an occasion of sin to us; better put the greatest hardships that can be upon the body, than ruin the soul for ever. Modesty is the hedge of chastity, and therefore ought to be very carefully preserved and kept up by both sexes.

13. Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small. 14. Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small. 15. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. 16. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the LORD thy God. 17. Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way, when ye were come forth out of Egypt; 18. How he met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee, even all that were feeble behind thee, when thou wast faint and weary; and he feared not God. 19. Therefore it shall be, when the LORD thy God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about, in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it, that thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven; thou shalt not forget it.

Here is,

1. A law against deceitful weights and measures; they must not only not use them, but they must not have them; not have them in the bag, not have them in the house, v. 13, 14. for, if they had them, they would be strongly tempted to use them. They must not have a great weight and measure to buy by, and a small one to sell by, for that was to cheat both ways, when either was had enough; as we read of those that made the ephah small, in which they measured the corn they sold, and the shekel great, by which they weighed the money they received for it, Amos, 3. 5. But, thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, v. 15. That which is a rule of justice, must itself be just; if that be otherwise, it is a constant cheat. This had been taken care of before, Lev. 19. 35, 36. This law is enforced with two very good reasons. 1. That justice and equity will bring down upon us the blessing of God. The way to have our days lengthened, and to prosper, is to be just and fair in all our dealings; honesty is the best policy. 2. That fraud and injustice will expose us to the curse of God, v. 16. Not only unrighteousness itself, but all that do unrighteously, are an abomination to the Lord. And miserable is that man who is abhorred by his Maker. How hateful, particularly, all the arts of deceit are to God, Solomon several times observes, Prov. 11. 1. —20. 10, 23. and the apostle tells us, that the Lord is the Avenger of all such as overreach and defraud in any matter, 1 Thess. 4. 6.

11. A law for the rooting out of Amalek. Here is a just weight and a just measure; that as Amalek had measured to Israel, so it should be measured to Amalek again.

1. The mischief Amalek did to Israel, must be here remembered, v. 17, 18. When it was first done, it was ordered to be recorded, (Exod. 17. 14—16.) and here, the remembrance of it to be preserved, not in personal revenge, for that generation which suffered by the Amalekites was gone, so that these who now lived, and their posterity, could not have any personal resentment of the injury, but in a zeal for the glory of God, (which was insulted by the Amalekites,) that throw of the Lord against which the hand of Amalek was stretched out. The carriage of the Amalekites towards Israel is here represented, (1.) As very base and disingenuous. They had no occasion at all to quarrel with Israel, nor did they give them any notice, by a manifesto, or declaration of war; but took them at an advantage, when they were just come out of the house of bondage, and, for aught that appeared to them, were only going to sacrifice to God in the wilderness. (2.) As very barbarous and cruel; for they smote them that were feeble, whom they should have succoured. The greatest cowards are commonly the most cruel; while those that have the courage of a man, will have the compassions of a man. (3.) As very impious and profane; they feared not God. If they had had any reverence for the majesty of the God of Israel, which they saw a token of in the cloud, or any dread of his wrath, which they lately heard of the power of over Pharaoh, they durst not have made this assault upon Israel. Well, here was the ground of the quarrel; and it shows how God takes what is done against his people, as done against himself; and that he will particularly reckon with those that discourage and hinder young beginners in religion, that (as Satan's agents) set upon the weak and feeble, either to divert them, or to disquiet them and offend his little ones.

2. This mischief must in due time be revenged, v. 19. When their wars were finished, by which they were to settle their kingdom, and enlarge their coast, then they must make war upon Amalek, (v. 10.) not merely to chase them, but to consume them, to blot out the remembrance of Amalek. It was an instance of God's patience that he deferred the vengeance so long, which should have led the Amalekites to repentance; yet an instance of fearful retribution, that the posterity of Amalek, so long after, were destroyed for the mischief done by their ancestors to the Israel of God. That all the world might see, and say, that he who toucheth them, toucheth the apple of his eye. It was near four hundred years after this, that Saul was ordered to put this sentence in execution, (1 Sam. 15.) and was rejected of God because he did not do it effectually, but spared some of that devoted nation, in contempt, not only of the particular orders he received from Samuel, but of this general command here given by Moses, which he could not be ignorant of. David afterward made some destruction of them; and the Simeonites, in Hezekiah's time, smote the rest that remained, (1 Chron. 4. 43.) for when God judges, he will overcome.

CHAP. XXVI.

With this chapter Moses concludes the particular statutes, which he thought fit to give Israel in charge at his parting with them; what follows, is by way of sanction and ratification. In this chapter, I. Moses gives them a form of confession, to be made by him that offered the basket of his first-fruits, v. 1—11. II. The protestation and prayer to be made after the disposal of the third year's tithe, v. 12—15. He binds on all the precepts he had given them, 1. By the divine authority: "Not I, but the Lord thy God has commanded thee to do these statutes," v. 16. 2. By the mutual covenant between God and them, v. 17—19.

1. AND it shall be, when thou art come in unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and possessest it, and dwellest therein; 2. That thou shalt take of the first of all the fruit of the earth, which thou shalt bring of thy land that the LORD thy God giveth thee, and shalt put it in a basket, and shalt go unto the place which the LORD thy God shall choose to place his name there. 3. And thou shalt go unto the priest that shall be in those days, and say unto him, I profess this day unto the LORD thy God, that I am come unto the country which the LORD sware unto our fathers for to give us. 4. And the priest shall take the basket out of thine hand, and set it down before the altar of the LORD thy God. 5. And thou shalt speak and say before the LORD thy God, A Syrian ready to perish was my father, and he went down into Egypt, and sojourned there with a few, and became there a nation, great, mighty, and populous: 6. And the Egyptians evil entreated us, and afflicted us, and laid upon us hard bondage: 7. And when we cried unto the LORD God of our fathers, the LORD heard our voice, and looked on our affliction, and our labour, and our oppression: 8. And the LORD brought us forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand, and with an outstretched arm, and with great terribleness, and with signs, and with wonders: 9. And he hath brought us into this place, and hath given us this land, even a land that floweth with milk and honey. 10. And now, behold, I have brought the first-fruits of the land, which thou, O LORD, hast given me. And thou shalt set it before the LORD thy God, and worship before the LORD thy God: 11. And thou shalt rejoice in every good thing which the LORD thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thine house, thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you.

Here is,

1. A good work ordered to be done, and that is, the presenting of a basket of their first-fruits to God every year, v. 1, 2. Beside the sheaf of first-fruits, which was offered for the whole land, on the morrow after the passover, (Lev. 23. 10.) every man was to bring for himself a basket of first-fruits at the feast of pentecost, when the harvest was ended, which is therefore called the feast of first-fruits, (Exod. 34. 22.) and is said to be kept with a tribute of free-will-offering, Deut. 16. 10. But the Jews say, "The first-fruits, if not brought then, might be brought any time after, between that and winter." When a man went into the field or vineyard at the time when the fruits were ripening, he was to mark that which he observed most forward, and to lay it by for first-fruits, wheat, barley, grapes, figs, pomegranates, olives, and dates, some of each sort must be put in the same basket with leaves between them, and presented to God in the place which he should choose. Now from this law we may learn, 1. To acknowledge God as the Giver of all those good things which are the support and comfort of our natural life, and therefore to serve and honour him with them. 2. To deny ourselves. What is first ripe we are most fond of; those that are nice and curious, expect to be served with each fruit at its first coming in; my soul desired the first ripe fruits, Micah 7. 1. When therefore God appointed them to lay those by for him, he taught them to prefer the glorifying of his name, before the gratifying of their own appetites and desires. 3. To give to God the first and best we have, as those that believe him to be the first and best of beings. They that consecrate the days of their youth, and the prime of their time, to the service and honour of God, bring him their first-fruits, and with such offerings he is well pleased. I remember the kindness of thy youth.

11. Good words put into their mouths, to be said in the doing of this good work, as an explication of the meaning of this ceremony, that it might be a reasonable service. The offerer must begin his acknowledgment before he delivered his basket to the priest, and then must go on with it when the priest had set down the basket before the altar, as a present to God, their great Landlord, v. 3, 4.

1. He must begin with a receipt in full for the good land which God had given them, v. 3. I profess that I am come now, at last, after forty years wandering, unto the country which the Lord sware to give us. This was most proper to be said when they came first into Canaan: probably, when they had been long settled there, they varied from this form. Note, When God has made good his promises to us, he expects that we should own it, to the honour of his faithfulness; this is like giving up the bond, as Solomon does, 1 Kings, 8. 56. There has not failed one word of all his good promise. And our creature-comforts are then doubly sweet, when we see them flowing from the Fountain of the promise.

2. He must remember, and own, the mean original of that nation, which he was a member of; how great soever they were now, and he himself with them, their beginning was very small, which ought thus to be kept in mind, throughout all the ages of their church, by this public confession, that they might not be proud of their privileges and advantages, but might for ever be thankful to that God whose grace chose them when they were so low, and raised them so high. Two things they must own for this purpose. (1.) The meanness of their common ancestor. A Syrian ready to perish was my father, v. 5. Jacob is here called an Aramite, or Syrian, because he lived twenty years in Padan-aram; his wives were of that country, and his children were all born there, except Benjamin; and perhaps the confessor means not Jacob himself, but that son of Jacob who was the father of his tribe. However it be, both father and sons were more than once ready to perish, by Laban's severity, Esau's cruelty, and the famine in the land, which last was the occasion of their going down into Egypt. Laban the Syrian sought to destroy my father, so the Chaldee; had almost destroyed him, so the Arabic. (2.) The miserable condition of their nation in its infancy. They sojourned in Egypt as strangers, they served there as slaves, v. 6. and that a great while: as their father was called a Syrian, they might be called Egyptians; so that, their possession of Canaan being so long discontinued, they could not pretend any tenant-right to it. A poor, despised, oppressed people they were in Egypt, and therefore, though now rich and great, had no reason to be proud, or secure, or forgetful, of God.

3. He must thankfully acknowledge God's great goodness, not only to himself in particular, but to Israel in general. (1.) In bringing them out of Egypt, v. 7, 8. It is spoken of here as an act of pity, he looked on our affliction; and an act of power, he brought us forth with a mighty hand. This was a great salvation, fit to be remembered upon all occasions, and particularly upon this: they need not grudge to bring a basket of first-fruits to God, for to him they owed it that they were not now bringing in the tale of bricks to their cruel task-masters. (2.) In settling them in Canaan, v. 9. He hath given us this land. Observe, He must not only give thanks for his own lot, but for the land in general, which was given to Israel; nor only for this year's profits, but for the ground itself which produced them, which God had graciously granted to his ancestors, and entailed upon his posterity. Note, The comfort we have in our particular enjoyments should lead us to be thankful for our share in public peace and plenty; and with present mercies we should bless God for the former mercies we remember, and the further mercies we expect and hope for.

4. He must offer to God his basket of first-fruits, v. 10. I have brought the first-fruits of the land, (like a pepper-corn,) as a quit-rent for the land which thou hast given me. Note, Whatever we give to God, it is but of his own that we give him, 1 Chron 29. 14. And it becomes us, who receive so much from him, to study what we shall render to him. The basket he set before God; and the priests, as God's receivers, had the first-fruits, as perquisites of their place and fees for attending, Numb. 18. 12.

Lastly, The offerer is here appointed, when he has finished the service, 1. To give glory to God; Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God. His first-fruits were not accepted without further acts of adoration. A humble, reverent, thankful heart is that which God looks at and requires, and, without that, all we can put in a basket will not avail. If a man would give all the substance of his house to be excused from this, or in lieu of it, it would utterly be condemned. 2. To take the comfort of it to himself and family, v. 11. Thou shalt rejoice in every good thing. It is the will of God that we should be cheerful, not only in our attendance upon his holy ordinances, but in our enjoyments of the gifts of his providence. Whatever good thing God gives us, it is his will that we should make the most comfortable use we can of it, yet still tracing the streams to the Fountain of all comfort and consolation.

12. When thou hast made an end of tithing all the tithes of thine increase the third year, which is the year of tithing, and hast given it unto the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, that they may eat within thy gates, and be filled; 13. Then thou shalt say before the LORD thy God, I have brought away the hallowed things out of mine house, and also have given them unto the Levite, and unto the stranger, to the fatherless, and to the widow, according to all thy commandments which thou hast commanded me: I have not transgressed thy commandments, neither have I forgotten them: 14. I have not eaten thereof in my mourning, neither have I taken away ought thereof for any unclean use, nor given ought thereof for the dead: but I have hearkened to the voice of the LORD my God, and have done according to all that thou hast commanded me. 15. Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven, and bless thy people Israel, and the land which thou hast given us, as thou swarest unto our fathers, a land that floweth with milk and honey.

Concerning the disposal of their tithe the third year, we had the law before, ch. 14. 28, 29. The second tithe, which, the other two years, was to be spent in extraordinaries at the feasts, was to be spent, the third year, at home, in entertaining the poor. Now, because this was done from under the eye of the priests, and a great confidence was put in the people's honesty, that they would dispose of it, according to the law, to the Levite, the stranger, and the fatherless, v. 12. it is therefore required, that when, at the next feast after, they appeared before the Lord, they should there testify (as it were) upon oath, in a religious manner, that they had fully administered, and been true to their trust.

1. They must make a solemn protestation to that purport, v. 13, 14. 1. That no hallowed things were hoarded up, "I have brought them away out of mine house, nothing now remains there but my own part." 2. That the poor, and particularly poor ministers, poor strangers, and poor widows, had had their part, according to the commandment. It is fit that God, who, by his providence, gives us all we have, should, by his law, direct the using of it; and though we are not now under such particular appropriations of our revenue as they then were, yet, in general, we are commanded to give alms of such things as we have; and then, and not otherwise, all things are clean to us. Then we may take the comfort of our enjoyments, when God has thus had his dues out of them. This is a commandment which must not be transgressed, no not with an excuse of its being forgotten, v. 13. 3. That none of this tithe had been misapplied to any common use, much less to any ill use. This seems to refer to the tithe of the other two years, which was to be eaten by the owners themselves; they must profess, (1.) That they had not eaten of it in their mourning, when, by their mourning for the dead, they were commonly unclean; or they had not eaten of it grudgingly, as those that all their days eat in darkness. (2.) That they had not sacrilegiously alienated it to any common use, for it was not their own. And, lastly, That they had not given it for the dead, for the honour of their dead gods, or in hope of making it beneficial to their dead friends. Now the obliging of them to make this solemn protestation, at the three years' end, would be an obligation upon them to deal faithfully, knowing that they must be called upon thus to purge themselves. It is our wisdom to keep conscience clear at all times, that, when we come to give up our account, we may lift up our face without spot. The Jews say that this protestation of their integrity was to be made with a low voice, because it looked like a self-condemnation; but that the foregoing confession of God's goodness was to be made with a loud voice to his glory. He that durst not make this protestation must bring his trespass-offering, Lev. 5. 15.

II. To this solemn protestation they must add a solemn prayer, v. 15. not particularly for themselves, but for God's people Israel; for in the common peace and prosperity every particular person prospers and has peace. We must learn from hence to be public-spirited in prayer, and to wrestle with God for blessings for the land and nation, our English Israel, and for the universal church, which we are directed to have an eye to in our prayers, as the Israel of God, Gal. 6. 16. In this prayer we are taught, 1. To look up to God as in a holy habitation, and from thence to infer that holiness becomes his house, and that he will be sanctified in those that are about him. 2. To depend upon the favour of God, and his gracious cognizance, as sufficient to make us and our people happy. 3. To reckon it wonderful condescension in God to cast an eye even upon so great and honourable a body as Israel was. It is looking down. 4. To be earnest with God for a blessing upon his people Israel, and upon the land which he has given us. For how should the earth yield its increase, or, if it does, what comfort can we take in it, unless therewith God, even our own God, gives us his blessing? Ps. 67. 6.

16. This day the LORD thy God hath commanded thee to do these statutes and judgments: thou shalt therefore keep and do them with all thine heart, and with all thy soul. 17. Thou hast avouched the LORD this day to be thy God, and to walk in his ways, and to keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and to hearken unto his voice: 18. And the LORD hath avouched thee this day to be his peculiar people, as he hath promised thee, and that thou shouldst keep all his commandments; 19. And to make thee high above all nations which he hath made in praise, and in name, and in honour; and that thou mayest be an holy people unto the LORD thy God, as he hath spoken.

Two things Moses here urges to enforce all these precepts.

I. That they were the commands of God, v. 16. They were not the dictates of his own wisdom, nor were they enacted by any authority of his own, but infinite wisdom framed them, and the power of the King of kings made them binding to them. "The Lord thy God commands thee, therefore thou art bound in duty and gratitude to obey him, and it is at thy peril if thou disobey. They are his laws, therefore thou shalt do them, for to that end were they given thee: do them and not dispute them, do them and not draw back from them; do them not carelessly and hypocritically, but with thy heart and soul, thy whole heart, and thy whole soul.

II. That their covenant with God obliged them to keep these commands. He insists not only upon God's sovereignty over them, but his propriety in them, and the relation wherein they stood to him. The covenant is mutual, and it binds to obedience both ways.

1. That we may perform our part of the covenant, and answer the intentions of that, v. 17. "Thou hast avouched and solemnly owned and confessed the Lord Jehovah to be thy God, thy Prince and Ruler. As he is so by an incontestable right, so he is by thine own consent." They did this implicitly by their attendance on his word, had done it expressly, Exod. 24. and were now to do it again before they parted, Deut. 29. 1. Now this obliges us, in fidelity to our word, as well as in duty to our Sovereign, to keep his statutes and his commandments. We really forswear ourselves, and perfidiously violate the most sacred engagements, if, when we have taken the Lord to be our God, we do not make conscience of obeying his commands.

2. That God's part of the covenant also may be made good, and the intentions of that answered, v. 18, 19. The Lord has avouched, not only taken, but publicly owned thee, to be his Segullah, his peculiar people, as he has promised thee, that is, according to the true intent and meaning of the promise. Now their obedience was not only the condition of this favour, and of the continuance of it, (if they were not obedient, God would disown them, and cast them off,) but it was also the principal design of this favour. "He has avouched thee on purpose, that thou shouldst keep his commandments, that thou mightest have both the best directions, and the best encouragements in religion." Thus we are elected to obedience, 1 Pet. 1. 2. chosen that we should be holy, Eph. 1. 4. purified, a peculiar people, that we might not only do good works, but be zealous in them, Tit. 2. 14.

Two things God is here said to design in avouching them to be his peculiar people, v. 19. To make them high, and in order to that, to make them holy; for holiness is true honour, and the only way to everlasting honour. (1.) To make them high above all nations. The greatest honour we are capable of in this world, is, to be taken into covenant with God, and to live in his service. High in praise; for God would accept them, that is true praise, Rom. 2. 29. Their friends would admire them, Ps. 48. 2. Their enemies would envy them, Zeph. 3. 19, 20. High in name, which some think, denotes the continuance and perpetuity of that praise, a name that shall not be cut off. And high in honour, that is, in all the advantages of wealth and power, which would make them great above their neighbours. See Jer. 13. 11. (2.) That they might be a holy people, separated for God, devoted to him, and employed continually in his service. This God aimed at in taking them to be his people; so that if they did not keep his commandments, they received all this grace in vain.

CHAP. XXVII.

Moses having very largely and fully set before the people their duty, both to God and one another, in general and in particular instances; having shewed them plainly what is good, and what the law requires of them; and having in the close of the foregoing chapter laid them under the obligation both of the command and the covenant, he comes in this chapter to prescribe outward means, I. For the helping of their memories, that they might not forget the law as a strange thing. They must write all the words of this law upon stones, v. 1. 10. II. For the moving of their affections, that they might not be indifferent to the law as a light thing. When they were come into Canaan, the blessings and curses, which were the sanctions of the law, were to be solemnly pronounced in the hearing of all Israel, who were to say, Amen, to them, v. 11. 26. And if such a solemnity as this would not make a deep impression upon them, and affect them with the great things of God's law, nothing would.

I. AND Moses with the elders of Israel commanded the people, saying, Keep all the commandments which I command you this day. 2. And it shall be on the day when ye shall pass over Jordan unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, that thou shalt set thee up great stones, and plaster them with plaster: 3. And thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law, when thou art passed over, that thou mayest go in unto the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee, a land that floweth with milk and honey; as the LORD God of thy fathers hath promised thee. 4. Therefore it shall be when ye be gone over Jordan, that ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in mount Ebal, and thou shalt plaster them with plaster. 5. And there shalt thou build an altar unto the LORD thy God, an altar of stones: thou shalt not lift up any iron tool upon them. 6. Thou shalt build the altar of the LORD thy God of whole stones: and thou shalt offer burnt-offerings thereon unto the LORD thy God: 7. And thou shalt offer peace-offerings, and shalt eat there, and rejoice before the LORD thy God. 8. And thou shalt write upon the stones all the words of this law very plainly. 9. And Moses and the priests the Levites spake unto all Israel, saying, Take heed, and hearken, O Israel; this day thou art become the people of the LORD thy God. 10. Thou shalt therefore obey the voice of the LORD thy God, and do his commandments and his statutes, which I command thee this day.

Here is,

I. A general charge to the people to keep God's commandments; for in vain did they know them, unless they would do them. This is pressed upon them, 1. With all authority. Moses with the elders of Israel, the rulers of each tribe, v. 1. and again, v. 9. Moses and the priests the Levites; so that the charge is given by Moses, who was king in Jeshurun, and by their lords, both spiritual and temporal, in concurrence with him. Lest they should think that it was Moses only, an old and dying man, that made such ado about religion, or the priests and Levites only, whose trade it was to attend religion, and who had their maintenance out of it; the elders of Israel, whom God had placed in honour and power over them, and who were men of business in the world, and likely to be long so when Moses was gone, they commanded their people to keep God's law. Moses, having put some of his honour upon them, joins them in commission with himself, in giving this charge, as St. Paul sometimes in his epistles joins with himself Silvanus and Timothy. Note, All that have any interest in others, or power over them, should use it for the support and furtherance of religion among them. Though the supreme power of a nation provide never so good laws for this purpose, if inferior magistrates in their places, and ministers in their's, and masters of families in their's, do not execute their offices, it will all be to little effect. 2. With all importunity. They press it upon them with the utmost earnestness, v. 9, 10. Take heed, and hearken, O Israel. It is a thing that requires and deserves the highest degree of caution and attention. They tell them of their privilege and honour, "This day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God, the Lord having avouched thee to be his own, and being now about to put thee in possession of Canaan, which he had long promised as thy God, Gen. 17. 7, 8, and which if he had failed to do in due time, he would have been ashamed to be called thy God, Heb. 11. 16. Now thou art more than ever his people, therefore obey his voice." Privileges should be improved as engagements to duty. Should not a people be ruled by their God?

II. A particular direction to them, with great solemnity, to register the words of this law, as soon as they were come into Canaan. It was to be done but once, and at their entrance into the land of promise, in token of their taking possession of it under the several provisos and conditions contained in this law. There was a solemn ratification of the covenant between God and Israel at mount Sinai, there was an altar erected, and twelve pillars, and the book of the covenant was produced, Exod. 24. 4. That which is here appointed, is a solemnity somewhat like that.

1. They must set up a monument on which they must write the words of this law. (1.) The monument itself was to be very mean; only rough unhewn stone plastered over; not polished marble or alabaster, nor brass tables, but common plaster upon stone, v. 2. It is repeated again, v. 4. and orders given that it be written, not very finely, to be admired by the curious, but very plainly, that he that runs might read it, Hab. 2. 2. The word of God needs not to be set off by the art of man; nor embellished with the enticing words of man's wisdom. But, (2.) The inscription was to be very great, All the words of this law, v. 3. and again, v. 8. Some understand it only of the covenant between God and Israel, mentioned ch. 26. 17, 18. Let this heap be set up for a witness, like that memorial of the covenant between Laban and Jacob, which was nothing but a heap of stones thrown hastily together, upon which they did eat together in token of friendship, Gen. 31. 46, 47, and that stone which Joshua set up, Joshua, 24. 27. Others think that the curses of the covenant in this chapter were written upon this monument, the rather, because it was set up in mount Ebal, v. 4. Others think that the whole book of Deuteronomy was written upon this monument; or at least the statutes and judgments from ch. 12. to the end of ch. 26. And it is not improbable that the heap might be so large, as, taking in all the sides of it, to contain so copious an inscription; unless we will suppose, (as some do,) that the ten commandments only were here written; as an authentic copy of the close rolls which were laid up in the ark. They must write this when they were gone into Canaan, and yet Moses says, v. 3. "Write it, that thou mayest go in," that is, "that thou mayest go in with comfort, and assurance of success and settlement, otherwise, it were well for thee not to go in at all. Write it as the conditions of thine entry, and own that thou comest in upon these terms, and no other; since Canaan is given by promise it must be held by obedience."

2. They must also set up an altar. By the words of the law which were written upon the plaster, God spake to them; by the altar, and the sacrifices offered upon it, they spake to God; and thus was communion kept up between them and God. The word and prayer must go together. Though they might not, of their own heads, set up any altar beside that at the tabernacle, yet, by the appointment of God, they might, upon a special occasion. Elijah built a temporary altar of twelve unhewn stones, like this here, when he brought Israel back to this covenant which was now made, 1 Kings, 18. 31, 32. Now, (1.) This altar must be made of such stones as they found ready upon the field, not new cut out of the rock, much less squared artificially; Thou shalt not lift up any iron tool upon them, v. 5. Christ, our Altar, is a stone cut out of the mountain without hands, Dan. 2. 34, 35, and therefore refused by the builders, as having no form or comeliness, but accepted of God the Father, and made the Head of the corner. (2.) Burnt-offerings and peace-offerings must be offered upon this altar, v. 6, 7. that by them they might give glory to God, and obtain favour. Where the law was written, an altar was set up close by it, to signify, that we could not look with any comfort upon the law, being conscious to ourselves of the violation of it, if it were not for the great Sacrifice by which atonement is made for sin; and the altar was set up on mount Ebal, the mount on which those tribes stood, that said, Amen, to the curses, to intimate, that through Christ we are redeemed from the curse of the law. In the Old Testament the words of the law are written, with the curse annexed, which would fill us with horror and amazement, if we had not in the New Testament (which is bound up with it) an altar erected close by it, which gives us everlasting consolation. (3.) They must eat there, and rejoice before the Lord their God, v. 7. This signified, [1.] The consent they gave to the covenant; for the parties to a covenant ratified the covenant by feasting together. They were partakers of the altar which was God's table, as his servants and tenants, and such they acknowledged themselves, and, being put in possession of this good land, bound themselves to pay the rent, and do the services, reserved by the royal grant. [2.] The comfort they took in the covenant; they had reason to rejoice in the law, when they had an altar, a remedial law, so near it; it was a great favour to them, and a token for good, that God gave them his statutes; and that they were owned as the people of God, and the children of the promise, was what they had reason to rejoice in, though, when this solemnity was to be performed, they were not put in full possession of Canaan; but God has spoken in his holiness, and then I will rejoice, Gilead is mine, Manassch mine; all my own.

11. And Moses charged the people the same day, saying, 12. These shall stand upon mount Gerizim to bless the people, when ye are come over Jordan; Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Joseph, and Benjamin: 13. And these shall stand upon mount Ebal to curse; Reuben, Gad, and Asher, and Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali. 14. And the Levites shall speak, and say unto all the men of Israel with a loud voice, 15. Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image, an abomination unto the Lord, the work of the hands of the craftsman, and putteth it in a secret place. And all the people shall answer and say, Amen. 16. Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother. And all the people shall say, Amen. 17. Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's landmark. And all the people shall say, Amen. 18. Cursed be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way. And all the people shall say, Amen. 19. Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow. And all the people shall say, Amen. 20. Cursed be he that lieth with his father's wife; because he uncovereth his father's skirt. And all the people shall say, Amen. 21. Cursed be he that lieth with any manner of beast. And all the people shall say, Amen. 22. Cursed be he that lieth with his sister, the daughter of his father, or the daughter of his mother. And all the people shall say, Amen. 23. Cursed be he that lieth with his mother-in-law. And all the people shall say, Amen. 24. Cursed be he that smiteth his neighbour secretly. And all the people shall say, Amen. 25. Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay an innocent person. And all the people shall say, Amen. 26. Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the words of this law to do them. And all the people shall say, Amen.

When the law was written to be seen and read by all men, the sanctions of it were to be published, which, to complete the solemnity of their covenanting with God, they were deliberately to declare their approbation of. This they were before directed to do, ch. 11. 29, 30. and therefore the appointment here begins somewhat abruptly; v. 12. There were, it seems, in Canaan, that part of it which afterward fell to the lot of Ephraim, (Joshua's tribe,) two mountains that lay near together, with a valley between, one called Gerizim, and the other Ebal. On the sides of these two mountains, which faced one another, all the tribes were to be drawn up, six on one side, and six on the other, so that in the valley, at the foot of each mountain, they came pretty near together, so near as that the priests standing between them might be heard by those that were next them on both sides; then, when silence was proclaimed, and attention commanded, one of the priests, or perhaps more, at some distance from each other, pronounced with a loud voice one of the curses here following, and all the people that stood on the side and foot of mount Ebal, (those that stood further off taking the signal from those that stood nearer and within hearing,) said, Amen; then the contrary blessing was pronounced, "Blessed is he that doth not so or so," and then those that stood on the side, and at the foot, of mount Gerizim, said, Amen. This could not but affect them very much with the blessings and curses, the promises and threatenings, of the law, and not only acquaint all the people with them, but teach them to apply them to themselves.

1. Something is to be observed, in general, concerning this solemnity, which was to be done but once and not repeated, but would be talked of to posterity.

1. God appointed which tribes should stand upon mount Gerizim, and which on mount Ebal, v. 12, 13. to prevent the disputes that might have arisen, if they had been to dispose of themselves. The six tribes that were appointed for blessing, were all the children of the free women, for to such the promise belongs, Gal. 4. 31. Levi is here put among the rest, to teach ministers to apply to themselves the blessing and curse which they preach to others, and by faith to set their own Amen to it.

2. Of those tribes that were to say Amen to the blessings, it is said, They stood to bless the people, but of the other, They stood to curse, not mentioning the people, as loath to suppose that any of this people, whom God had taken for his own, should lay themselves under the curse. Or, perhaps, the different way of expression intimates that there was to be but one blessing pronounced in general upon the people of Israel, as a happy people, and that should ever be so, if they were obedient; and to that blessing the tribes on mount Gerizim were to say, Amen, "Happy art thou, O Israel, and mayest thou ever be so;" but then the curses come in as exceptions from the general rule; (and we know Exceptio firmat regulam—The exception confirms the rule;) Israel is a blessed people, but if there be any particular persons, even among them, that do such and such things as are mentioned, let them know that they have no part nor lot in the matter, but are under a curse. This shews how ready God is to bestow the blessing; if any fall under the curse, they may thank themselves, they bring it upon their own heads.

3. The Levites or priests, such of them as were appointed for that purpose, were to pronounce the curses as well as the blessings. They were ordained to bless, ch. 10. 8. the priests did it daily, Numb. 6. 23. But they must separate between the precious and the vile; they must not give that blessing promiscuously, but must declare to whom it did not belong; lest those who had no right to it themselves should think to share in it by being in the crowd. Note, Ministers must preach the terrors of the law, as well as the comforts of the gospel; must not only allure people to their duty with the promises of a blessing, but awe them to it with the threatenings of a curse.

4. The curses are here expressed, but not the blessings; for as many as were under the law were under the curse; but it was an honour reserved for Christ to bless us, and so to do that for us which the law could not do, in that it was weak. In Christ's sermon upon the mount, which was the true mount Gerizim, we have blessings only, Matth. 5. 3, &c.

5. To each of the curses the people were to say, Amen. It is easy to understand the meaning of Amen to the blessings. The Jews have a saying, to encourage people to say Amen to the public prayers, Whosoever answereth Amen, after him that blesseth, he is as he that blesseth. But how could they say Amen to the curses? (1.) It was a profession of their faith in the truth of them; that these, and the like curses, were not bugbears to frighten children and fools, but the real declarations of the wrath of God against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men; not one iota of which shall fall to the ground. (2.) It was an acknowledgment of the equity of these curses; when they said, Amen, they did in effect say, not only, It is certain it shall be so; but, It is just it should be so. They who do such things deserve to fall and lie under the curse. (3.) It was such an imprecation upon themselves, as strongly obliged them to have nothing to do with those evil practices upon which the curse is here entailed. "Let God's wrath fall upon us, if ever we do such things." We read of those that entered into a curse, (and with us that is the usual form of a solemn oath,) to walk in God's law, Neh. 10. 29. Nay the Jews say, (as the learned Bishop Patrick quotes them,) "All the people, by saying this Amen, became bound for one another, that they would observe God's laws, by which every man was obliged, as far as he could, to prevent his neighbour from breaking these laws, and to reprove those that had offended, lest they should bear sin, and the curse for them."

II. Let us now observe what are the particular sins against which the curses are here denounced.

1. Sins against the second commandment. This flaming sword is set to keep that commandment first, v. 15. They are here cursed, not only that worship images, but that make them or keep them, if they be such (or like such) as idolaters used in the service of their gods, whether it be a graven image or a molten image, it comes all to one, it is an abomination to the Lord; though it be not set up in public, but in a secret place; though it be not actually worshipped, nor is it said to be designed for worship, but reserved there with respect, and a constant temptation: he that does this may perhaps escape punishment from men, but he cannot escape the curse of God.

2. Against the fifth commandment, v. 16. The contempt of parents is a sin so heinous, that it is put next to the contempt of God himself. If a man abused his parents, either in word or deed, he fell under the sentence of the magistrate, and must be put to death, Exod. 21. 15, 17. But to set light by them, in his heart, was a thing which the magistrate could not take cognizance of, and therefore it is here laid under the curse of God, who knows the heart. Those are cursed children that carry themselves scornfully and insolently toward their parents.

3. Against the eighth commandment. The curse of God is here fastened, (1.) Upon an unjust neighbour, that removes the landmarks, v. 17. See ch. 19. 14. (2.) Upon an unjust counsellor, who, when his advice is asked, maliciously directs his friend to that which he knows will be to his prejudice; which is making the blind to wander out of the way, under pretence of directing him in the way, than which nothing can be either more barbarous or more treacherous, v. 18. Those that seduce others from the way of God's commandments, and entice them to sin, bring this curse upon themselves, which our Saviour has explained, Matth. 15. 14. The blind lead the blind, and both shall fall into the ditch. (3.) Upon an unjust judge, that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow, whom he should protect and vindicate, v. 19. These are supposed to be poor and friendless, (nothing to be got by doing them a kindness, nor any thing lost by disobliging them,) and therefore judges may be tempted to side with their adversaries against right and equity; but cursed are such judges.

4. Against the seventh commandment. Incest is a cursed sin, with a sister, a father's wife, or a mother-in-law, v. 20, 22, 23. These crimes not only exposed men to the sword of the magistrate, Lev. 20. 11. but which is more dreadful, to the wrath of God; beastiality likewise, v. 21.

5. Against the sixth commandment. Two of the worst kinds of murder are specified. (1.) Murder unseen, when a man does not set upon his neighbour as a fair adversary, giving him an opportunity to defend himself, but smites him secretly, v. 24. as by poison or otherwise, when he sees not who hurts him. See Ps. 10. 8, 9. Though such secret murders may go undiscovered, and unpunished, yet the curse of God will follow them. (2.) Murder under colour of law, which is of all other the greatest affront to God, for it makes an ordinance of his to patronise the worst of villains; and the greatest wrong to our neighbour, for it ruins his honour as well as his life; cursed therefore is he that will be hired, or bribed, either to accuse, or to convict, or to condemn, and so to slay, an innocent person, v. 25. See Ps. 15. 5.

5. The solemnity concludes with a general curse upon him that confirmeth not, or, as it might be read, that performeth not, all the words of this law to do them, v. 26. By our obedience to the law we set our seal to it, and so confirm it, as by our disobedience we do what lies in us to disannul it, Ps. 119. 126. The apostle, following all the ancient versions, reads it, Cursed is every one that continues not, Gal. 3. 10. Lest those that were guilty of other sins, not mentioned in this commination, should think themselves safe from the curse, this last reaches all; not only those who do the evil which the law forbids, but those also who omit the good which the law requires: to this we must all say, Amen, owning ourselves under the curse, justly to have deserved it, and that we must certainly have perished for ever under it, if Christ had not redeemed us from the curse of the law, by being made a curse for us.

CHAP. XXVIII.

This chapter is a very large exposition of two words in the foregoing chapter, the blessing and the curse. Those were pronounced blessed, in general, that were obedient, and those cursed, that were disobedient; but, because generals are not so affecting, Moses here descends to particulars, and describes the blessing and the curse, not in their fountains, (those are out of sight and therefore the most considerable, yet least considered, the favour of God the spring of all the blessings, and the wrath of God the spring of all the curses,) but in their streams, the sensible effects of the blessing and the curse, for they are real things, and have real effects. I. He describes the blessings that should come upon them if they were obedient; personal, family, and especially national, for in that capacity especially they are here treated with, v. 1. .44. II. He more largely describes the curses which would come upon them if they were disobedient; such as would be, 1. Their extreme vexation, v. 15. .44. 2. Their utter ruin and destruction at last, v. 45. .68. This chapter is much to the same purport with Lev. 26. setting before them life and death, good and evil; and the promise, in the close of that chapter, of their restoration upon their repentance, is here likewise more largely repeated, ch. 30. Thus, as they had precept upon precept in the repetition of the law, so they had line upon line in the repetition of the promise and threatenings. And these are both there and here delivered, not only as sanctions of the law, what would be conditionally, but as predictions of the event, what would be certainly, that for a while the people of Israel would be happy in their obedience, but that at length they would be undone by their disobedience, and therefore it is said, ch. 30. 1. that all those things would come upon them, both the blessing and the curse.

1. AND it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the LORD thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth. 2. And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God. 3. Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field. 4. Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. 5. Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store. 6. Blessed shall thou be when thou comest in, and blessed shall thou be when thou goest out. 7. The LORD shall cause thine enemies that rise up against thee to be smitten before thy face: they shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways. 8. The LORD shall command the blessing upon thee in thy store-houses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. 9. The LORD shall establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the LORD thy God, and walk in his ways. 10. And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the LORD; and they shall be afraid of thee. 11. And the LORD shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers to give thee. 12. The LORD shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven to give the rain unto thy land in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow. 13. And the LORD shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the LORD thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them: 14. And thou shalt not go aside from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand, or to the left, to go after other gods to serve them.

The blessings are here put before the curses, to intimate, 1. That God is slow to anger, but swift to shew mercy: he has said it, and sworn, that he would much rather we would obey and live, than sin and die. It is his delight to bless. 2. That though both the promises and the threatenings are designed to bring and hold us to our duty, yet it is better that we be allured to that which is good, by a filial hope of God's favour, than that we be frightened to it by a servile fear of his wrath. That obedience pleases best, which comes from a principle of delight in God's goodness. Now,

1. We have here the condition upon which the blessing is promised. 1. It is upon condition that they diligently hearken to the voice of God, v. 1, 2. that they hear God speaking to them by his word, and use their utmost endeavour to acquaint themselves with his will, v. 13. 2. Upon condition that they observe and do all his commandments, (and, in order to obedience, there is need of observation;) and that they keep the commandments of God, v. 9. and walk in his ways. Not only do them for once, but keep them for ever; not only set out in his ways, but walk in them to the end. 3. Upon condition that they should not go aside either to the right hand or to the left, either to superstition on the one hand, or profaneness on the other; and, particularly, that they should not go after other gods, v. 14. which was the sin that of all others they were most prone to, and God would be most displeas'd with. Let them take care to keep up religion, both the form and power of it, in their families and nation, and God would not fail to bless them.

II. The particulars of this blessing.

1. It is promised that the providence of God should prosper them in all their outward concerns. These blessings are said to overtake them, v. 2. Good people sometimes, under the sense of their own unworthiness, are ready to fly from the blessing, and to conclude that it belongs not to them; but the blessing shall find them out, and follow them notwithstanding; thus, in the great day, the blessing will overtake the righteous, that say, Lord, when saw we thee hungry, and fed thee? Matth. 25. 37. It is promised,

(1.) That they should be safe and easy; a blessing should come upon them wherever they were, in the city, or in the field, v. 3. Whether their habitation was in the town or country; whether they were husbandmen or tradesmen; whether their business called them into the city or into the field; they should be preserved from the dangers, and have the comforts, of every scene. This blessing should attend them in their journeys, going out and coming in, v. 6. Their persons should be protected, and the affair they went about should succeed well. Observe here, what a necessary and constant dependence we have upon God, both for the continuance and comfort of this life. We need him at every turn, in all the various moments of life; we cannot be safe if he withdraw his protection, nor easy if he suspend his favour; but if he bless us, go where we will, it is well with us.

(2.) That their families should be built up in a numerous issue: blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, v. 4. and in that the Lord shall make thee plenteous, v. 11. in pursuance of the promise made to Abraham, that his seed should be as the stars of heaven for multitude, and that God would be a God to them, than which, a greater blessing, and more comprehensive, could not be entailed upon the fruit of their body. See Isa. 61. 9.

(3.) That they should be rich, and have an abundance of all the good things of this life, which are promised them, not merely that they might have the pleasure of enjoying them, but (as Bishop Patrick observes out of one of the Jewish writers) that they might have wherewithal to honour God, and might be help'd and encouraged to serve him cheerfully, and to proceed and persevere in their obedience to him. A blessing is promised, [1.] On all they had without doors, corn, and cattle in the field, v. 4, 11. Their cows and sheep particularly, which should be blessed for the owners' sakes, and made blessings to them. In order to this, it is promised that God would give them rain in due season, which is called his good treasure, v. 12. because with this river of God the earth is enriched, Ps. 65. 9. Our constant supplies we must see coming from God's good treasure, and own our obligations to him for them; if he withhold his rain, the fruits both of the ground and of the cattle soon perish. [2.] On all they had within doors, the basket and store, v. 5. the storehouses or barns, v. 8. When it is brought home, God will bless it, and not blow upon it, as sometimes he does, Hag. 1. 6, 9. We depend upon God and his blessing, not only for our yearly corn out of the field, but for our daily bread out of our basket and store, and therefore are taught to pray for it every day.

(4.) That they should have success in all their employments, which would be a constant satisfaction to them; "The Lord shall command the blessing (and it is he only that can command it) upon thee, not only in all thou hast, but in all thou dost, all that thou settest thine hand unto," v. 8. This intimated, that, even when they were rich, they must not be idle, but must find some good employment or other to set their hand to, and God would own their industry, and bless the work of their hand, v. 12. for that which makes rich, and keeps so, is, the blessing of the Lord upon the hand of the diligent, Prov. 10. 4, 22.

(5.) That they should have honour among their neighbours, v. 1. The Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations. He made them so by taking them into covenant with himself, ch. 26, 19. And he would make them more and more so by their outward prosperity, if they would not by sin disparage themselves. Two things should help to make them great among the nations: [1.] Their wealth, v. 12. "Thou shalt lend to many nations upon interest," (which they were allowed to take from the neighbouring nations,) "but thou shalt not have occasion to borrow." This would give them great influence with all about them: for the borrower is servant to the lender. It may be meant of trade and commerce, that they should export abundantly more than they should import, which would keep the balance on their side. [2.] Their power, v. 13. The Lord shall make thee the head, to give law to all about them, to exact tribute, and to arbitrate all controversies. Every sheaf should bow to their's; which should make them so considerable, that all the people of the earth should be afraid of them, v. 10. that is, should reverence their true grandeur, and dread making them their enemies. The flourishing of religion among them, and the blessing of God upon them, would make them formidable to all their neighbours, terrible as an army with banners.

(6.) That they should be victorious over their enemies, and prosper in all their wars. If any were so daring as to rise up against them to oppress them, or encroach upon them, it should be at their peril, they should certainly fall before them, v. 7. The forces of the enemy, though entirely drawn up to come against them one way, should be entirely routed, and flee before them seven ways, each making the best of his way.

From the whole we learn, (though it were well if men would believe it,) that religion and piety are the best friends to outward prosperity. Though temporal blessings do not take up so much room in the promises of the New Testament, as they do in those of the Old, yet it is enough that our Lord Jesus has given us his word, (and sure we may take his word,) that, if we seek first the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof, all other things shall be added to us, as far as Infinite Wisdom sees good: And who can desire it further? Matth. 6. 33.

2. It is likewise promised, that the grace of God should establish them a holy people, v. 9. Having taken them into covenant with himself, he would keep them in covenant, and, provided they used the means of steadfastness, he would give them the grace of steadfastness, that they should not depart from him. Note, Those that are sincere in holiness, God will establish in holiness; and he is of power to do it, Rom. 16. 25. He that is holy shall be holy still; and those whom God establishes in holiness, he thereby establishes a people to himself; for, as long as we keep close to God, he will never forsake us. This establishment of their religion would be the establishment of their reputation, v. 10. All the people of the earth shall see, and own, that thou art called by the name of the Lord, that is, "that thou art a most excellent and glorious people, under the particular care and countenance of the great God. They shall be made to know, that a people called by the name of Jehovah, is, without doubt, the happiest people under the sun, even their enemies themselves being judges." The favourites of Heaven are truly great, and, first or last, it will be made to appear that they are so; if not in this world, yet at that day when those who confess Christ now shall be confessed by him before men and angels, as those whom he delights to honour.

15. But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to observe to do all his commandments and his statutes which I command thee this day; that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee: 16. Cursed shalt thou be in the city, and cursed shalt thou be in the field. 17. Cursed shall be thy basket and thy store. 18. Cursed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy land, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep. 19. Cursed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and cursed shalt thou be when thou goest out. 20. The LORD shall send upon thee cursing, vexation, and rebuke, in all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do, until thou be destroyed, and until thou perish quickly; because of the wickedness of thy doings, whereby thou hast forsaken me. 21. The LORD shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee, until he have consumed thee from off the land, whither thou goest to possess it. 22. The LORD shall smite thee with a consumption, and with a fever, and with an inflammation, and with an extreme burning, and with the sword, and with blasting, and with mildew; and they shall pursue thee until thou perish. 23. And thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron. 24. The LORD shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed. 25. The LORD shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies: thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them: and shalt be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth. 26. And thy carcase shall be meat unto all fowls of the air, and unto the beasts of the earth, and no man shall fray them away. 27. The LORD will smite thee with the botch of Egypt, and with the emerods, and with the scab, and with the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed. 28. The LORD shall smite thee with madness, and blindness, and astonishment of heart: 29. And thou shalt grope at noon-day, as the blind gropeth in darkness, and thou shalt not prosper in thy ways: and thou shalt be only oppressed and spoiled evermore, and no man shall save thee. 30. Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her: thou shalt build an house, and thou shalt not dwell therein: thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shalt not gather the grapes thereof. 31. Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof: thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee: thy sheep shall be given unto thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them. 32. Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people, and thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day long: and there shall be no might in thine hand. 33. The fruit of thy land, and all thy labours, shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up; and thou shalt be only oppressed and crushed alway: 34. So that thou shalt be mad for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see. 35. The LORD shall smite thee in the knees, and in the legs, with a sore botch that cannot be healed, from the sole of thy foot unto the top of thy head. 36. The LORD shall bring thee, and thy king which thou shalt set over thee, unto a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known; and there shalt thou serve other gods, wood and stone. 37. And thou shalt become an astonishment, a proverb, and a byword, among all nations whither the LORD shall lead thee. 38. Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shalt gather but little in; for the locust shall consume it. 39. Thou shalt plant vineyards, and dress them, but shalt neither drink of the wine, nor gather the grapes; for the worms shall eat them. 40. Thou shalt have olive-trees throughout all thy coasts, but thou shalt not anoint thyself with the oil; for thine olive shall cast his fruit. 41. Thou shalt beget sons and daughters, but thou shalt not enjoy them: for they shall go into captivity. 42. All thy trees and fruit of thy land shall the locust consume. 43. The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low. 44. He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail.

Having viewed the bright side of the cloud, which is toward the obedient, we have now presented to us the black and dark side, which is toward the disobedient. If we do not keep God's commandments, we not only come short of the blessing promised, but we lay ourselves under the curse, which is as comprehensive of all misery, as the blessing is of all happiness. Observe,

I. The equity of this curse. It is not a curse causeless, or for some light cause; God seeks not occasion against us, nor is he apt to quarrel with us. That which is here mentioned, as bringing the curse, is, 1. Despising God; refusing to *hear*ken to his voice, v. 15. which speaks the highest contempt imaginable, as if what he said were not worth the heeding, or we were not under any obligation to him. 2. Disobeying him; not doing his commandments, or not observing to do them. None fall under his curse, but those that rebel against his command. 3. Deserting him. "It is because of the wickedness of thy doings, not only whereby thou hast slighted me, but whereby thou hast forsaken me, v. 20. God never casts us off, till we first cast him off. It intimates, that their idolatry, by which they forsook the true God for false gods, would be their destroying sin, more than any other.

II. The extent and efficacy of this curse. "These curses shall come upon thee from above, and shall overtake thee; though thou endeavour to escape them, it is to no purpose to attempt it, they shall follow thee whithersoever thou goest, and seize thee, overtake thee, and overcome thee, v. 15. It is said of the sinner, when God's wrath is in pursuit of him, that he would fain flee out of his hand, Job, 27. 22. but he cannot; if he flee from the iron weapon, yet the bow of steel shall reach him, and strike him through. There is no running from God, but by running to him, no fleeing from his justice, but by fleeing to his mercy. See Ps. 21. 7, 8. 1. Wherever the sinner goes, the curse of God follows him; wherever he is, it rests upon him. He is cursed in the city, and in the field, v. 16. The strength of the city cannot shelter him from it, the pleasant air of the country is no fence against these pestilential steams. He is cursed, v. 19. when he comes in, for the curse is upon the house of the wicked, Prov. 3. 33. and he is cursed when he goes out, for he cannot leave that curse behind him, nor get rid of it, which has entered into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones. 2. Whatever he has is under a curse, Cursed is the ground for his sake, and all that is on it, or comes out of it, and so he is cursed from the ground, as Cain, Gen. 4. 11. The basket and store cursed, v. 17, 18. All his enjoyments, being forfeited by him, are in a manner forbidden to him, as cursed things, which he has no title to. To those whose mind and conscience are defiled, every thing else is so, Tit. 1. 15. They are all imbittered to him, he cannot take any true comfort in them, for the wrath of God mixes itself with them, and he is so far from having any security on the continuance of them, that if his eyes be open, he may see them all condemned, and ready to be confiscated, and with them all his joys, and all his hopes, for ever. 3. Whatever he does is under a curse too. It is a curse in all that he setteth his hand unto, v. 20. A constant disappointment, which they are subject to that set their hearts upon the world, and expect their happiness in it, and which cannot but be a constant vexation. This curse here is just the reverse of the blessing in the former part of the chapter. Thus, whatever bliss there is in heaven, there is not only the want of it, but the contrary to it, in hell. Isa. 65. 13. My servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry.

Many particular judgments are here enumerated, which would be the fruits of the curse, and with which God would punish the people of the Jews for their apostacy and disobedience. (1.) These judgments threatened are of divers kinds, for God has many arrows in his quiver, four sore judgments, Ezek. 14. 21. and many more. (2.) They are here represented as very terrible, and the descriptions of them are exceedingly lively and affecting, that men, knowing these terrors of the Lord, might, if possible, be persuaded. (3.) The threatenings of the same judgment are several times repeated, that they might make the more deep and lasting impressions; and to intimate, that, if they persisted in their disobedience, the judgment, which they thought was over, and of which they said, "Surely the bitterness of it is past," would return with double force; for, when God judges, he will overcome.

[1.] Bodily diseases are here threatened; that they should be epidemical in their land. These God sometimes makes use of for the chastisement and improvement of his own people, Lord, behold, he whom thou lovest is sick. But here they are threatened to be brought upon his enemies, as tokens of his wrath, and designed for their ruin. So that, according to the temper of our spirits, under sickness, accordingly it is to us a blessing or a curse. But whatever sickness may be to particular persons, it is certain that epidemical diseases, raging among a people, are national judgments, and are so to be accounted. He here threatens, First, Painful diseases, v. 35. a sore botch, beginning in the legs and knees, but spreading, like Job's boils, from head to foot. And, Secondly, Shameful diseases, v. 27. the botch of Egypt, (such boils and blains as the Egyptians had been plagued with, when God brought Israel from among them,) and the emerods and scab, vile diseases, the just punishment of those who by sin had made themselves vile. Thirdly, Mortal diseases. The pestilence, v. 21. the consumption, (put for all chronic diseases,) and the fever, (for all acute diseases,) v. 22. (see Lev. 26. 16.) and all incurable, v. 27.

[2.] Famine, and scarcity of provisions; and this, First, For want of rain, v. 23, 24. Thy heaven over thy head, that part that is over thy land, shall be as dry as brass, while the heavens over other countries shall distil their dews; and, when the heaven is as brass, the earth of course will be as iron, so hard and unfruitful. Instead of rain, the dust shall be blown out of the highways into the field, and spoil the little that there is of the fruits of the earth. Secondly, By destroying insects. The locust should destroy the corn, so that they should not have so much as their seed again, v. 38, 42. And the fruit of the vine, which should make glad their hearts, should all be worn-eaten, v. 39. And the olive, some way or other, should be made to cast its fruit, v. 40. The heathen use many superstitious customs in honour of their idol-gods, for preserving the fruits of the earth: but Moses tells Israel, that the only way they had to preserve them, was, to keep God's commandments; for he is a God that will not be sported with, like their idols, but will be served in spirit and in truth. This threatening we find fulfilled in Israel, 1 Kings, 17. 1. Jer. 14. 1, &c. Joel, 1. 4.

[3.] That they should be smitten before their enemies in war, who, it is likely, would be the more cruel to them, when they had them at their mercy, for the severity they had used against the nations of Canaan, which their neighbours in after ages would be apt to remember against them, v. 25. It would make their flight the more shameful and the more grievous, that they might have triumphed over their enemies, if they had been faithful to their God. The carcasses of those that were slain in war, or died in captivity among strangers, should be meat for the fowls, v. 26. And an Israelite, having forfeited the favour of his God, should have so little humanity shewed him, as that no man should fray them away; so odious would God's curse make them to all mankind.

[4.] That they should be infatuated in all their counsels, so as not to discern their own interest, nor bring any thing to pass for the public good, v. 28, 29. The Lord shall smite thee with madness and blindness. Note, God's judgments can reach the minds of men, to fill them with darkness and horror, as well as their bodies and estates; and those are the sorest of all judgments, which make men a terror to themselves, and their own destroyers. That which they contrived to secure themselves by, should still turn to their prejudice. Thus we often find that the allies they confided in distressed them, and strengthened them not, 2 Chron. 28. 20. Those that will not walk in God's counsels, are justly left to be ruined by their own; and those that are wilfully blind to their duty deserve to be made blind to their interest; and, seeing they loved darkness rather than light, let them grope at noon-day as in the dark.

[5.] That they should be plundered of all their enjoyments, stripped of all by the proud and imperious conqueror, such as Ben-hadad was to Ahab, 1 Kings, 20. 5, 6. Not only their houses and vineyards should be taken from them, but their wives and children, v. 30, 32. Their dearest comforts, which they took most pleasure in, and promised themselves most from, should be the entertainment and triumph of their enemies. As they had dwelt in houses which they builded not, and eaten of vineyards which they planted not, ch. 6. 10, 11. so others should do by them. Their oxen, asses, and sheep, like Job's, should be taken away before their eyes, and they should not be able to recover them, v. 31. And all the fruit of their land and labours should be devoured and eaten up by the enemy; so that they, and their's, would want necessaries, while their enemies were revelling with that which they had laboured for.

[6.] That they should be carried captives into a far country; nay, into all the kingdoms of the earth, v. 25. Their sons and daughters, whom they promised themselves comfort in, should go into captivity, v. 41. and they themselves at length, and their king, in whom they promised themselves safety and settlement, v. 36. This was fully accomplished, when the ten tribes, first, were carried captive into Assyria, 2 Kings, 17. 6. and, not long after, the two tribes into Babylon, and two of their kings, 2 Kings, 24. 14, 15. —25. 7, 21. That which is mentioned, as an aggravation of their captivity, is, that they should go into an unknown country, the language and customs of which would be very uncouth, and their treatment among them barbarous, and there they should serve other gods, that is, be compelled to do so by their enemies, as they were in Babylon, Dan. 3. 6. Note, God often makes men's sin their punishment, and chooses their delusions. Ye shall serve other gods, that is, "Ye shall serve those that do serve them;" a nation is often in scripture called by the name of its god, as Jer. 48. 7. They had made idolaters their associates, and now God made idolaters their oppressors.

[7.] That those who remained should be insulted and tyrannized over by strangers, v. 43, 44. So the ten tribes were by the colonies which the king of Assyria sent to take possession of their land, 2 Kings, 17. 24. Or, this may be meant of the gradual encroachments which the strangers within their gates should make upon them, so as insensibly to worm them out of their estates. We read of the fulfilling of this, Hos. 7. 9. Strangers have devoured his strength; foreigners ate the bread out of the mouth of the true born Israelites, by which they were justly chastised for introducing strange gods.

[8.] That their reputation among their neighbours should be quite sunk, and they that had been a name, and a praise, should be an astonishment, a proverb, and a byword, v. 37. Some have observed the fulfilling of this threatening in their present state: for, when we would express the most perfidious and barbarous treatment, we say, None but a Jew would have done so. Thus is sin a reproach to any people.

Lastly, To complete their misery, it is threatened that they should be put quite out of the possession of their minds by all these troubles, v. 34. Thou shalt be mad for the sight of thine eyes, that is, quite bereaved of all comfort and hope, and abandoned to utter despair. Those that walk by sight, and not by faith, are in danger of losing reason itself, when every thing about them looks frightful; and their condition is woful indeed, that are mad for the sight of their eyes.

45. Moreover all these curses shall come upon thee, and shall pursue thee, and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed; because thou hearkenedst not unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which he commanded thee: 46. And they shall be upon thee for a sign and for a wonder, and upon thy seed for ever. 47. Because thou servedst not the LORD thy God with joyfulness, and with gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things; 48. Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies which the LORD shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want of all things: and he shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck, until he have destroyed thee. 49. The LORD shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand; 50. A nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young: 51. And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be destroyed: which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, or the increase of thy kine, or flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed thee. 52. And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustedst, throughout all thy land: and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates throughout all thy land, which the LORD thy God hath given thee. 53. And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters, which the LORD thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee: 54. So that the man that is tender among you, and very delicate, his eye shall be evil toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children which he shall leave: 55. So that he will not give to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat: because he hath nothing left him in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thine enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates. 56. The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter, 57. And toward her young one that cometh out from between her feet, and toward her children which she shall bear: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege and straitness, wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates. 58. If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law that are written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD; 59. Then the LORD will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues, and of long continuance, and sore sicknesses, and of long continuance. 60. Moreover he will bring upon thee all the diseases of Egypt, which thou wast afraid of; and they shall cleave unto thee. 61. Also every sickness, and every plague, which is not written in the book of this law, them will the LORD bring upon thee, until thou be destroyed. 62. And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitude; because thou wouldest not obey the voice of the LORD thy God. 63. And it shall come to pass, that as the LORD rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the LORD will rejoice over you to destroy you, and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it. 64. And the LORD shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone. 65. And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest: but the LORD shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind: 66. And thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life: 67. In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning! for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see. 68. And the LORD shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee, Thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you.

One would have thought that enough had been said to possess them with a dread of that wrath of God which is revealed from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. But, to shew how deep the treasures of that wrath are, and that still there is more and worse behind, Moses, when one would have thought that he had concluded this dismal subject, begins again, and adds to this roll of curses many similar words; as Jeremiah did to his, Jer. 36. 32. It should seem, that, in the former part of this commination, Moses foretells their captivity in Babylon, and the calamities which introduced and attended that, by which, even after their return, they were brought to that low and poor condition, which is described, v. 44. that their enemies should be the head, and they the tail: but here, in this latter part, he foretells their last destruction by the Romans, and their dispersion thereupon. And the present deplorable state of the Jewish nation, and of all that have incorporated themselves with them, by embracing their religion, does so fully and exactly answer to the prediction in these verses, that it serves for an incontestable proof of the truth of prophecy, and consequently of the divine authority of the scripture. And this last destruction being here represented as more dreadful than the former, it shews that their sin, in rejecting Christ and his gospel, was more heinous and more provoking to God than idolatry itself, and left them more under the power of Satan; for their captivity in Babylon cured them effectually of their idolatry in seventy years time; but under this last destruction, now for above 1600 years, they continue incurably averse to the Lord Jesus. Observe,

1. What is here said in general of the wrath of God, which should light and lie upon them for their sins.

1. That, if they would not be ruled by the commands of God, they should certainly be ruined by his curse, v. 45, 46. Because thou didst not keep his commandments, (especially that of hearing and obeying the great Prophet,) these curses shall come upon thee, as upon a people appointed to destruction, the generation of God's wrath: and they shall be for a sign and for a wonder. It is amazing to think that a people, so long the favourites of heaven, should be so perfectly abandoned and cast off; that a people so closely incorporated should be so universally dispersed; and yet that a people so scattered in all nations should preserve themselves distinct, and not mix with any; but, like Cain, be fugitives and vagabonds, and yet marked to be known.

2. That if they would not serve God with cheerfulness, they should be compelled to serve their enemies, v. 47, 48. that they might know the difference, 2 Chron. 12. 8. which, some think, is the meaning of Ezek. 20. 24, 25. Because they despised my statutes, I gave them statutes that were not good. Observe here, (1.) It is justly expected, from those to whom God gives an abundance of the good things of this life, that they should serve him. What does he maintain us for, but that we may do his work, and be some way serviceable to his honour? (2.) The more God gives us, the more cheerfully we should serve him; our abundance should be oil to the wheels of our obedience. God is a Master that will be served with gladness, and delights to hear us sing at our work. (3.) If, when we receive the gifts of God's bounty, we either do not serve him at all, or serve him with reluctance, it is a righteous thing with him to make us know the hardships of want and servitude. They deserve to have cause given them to complain, who complain without a cause. Tristis es, et felix! - Happy, and yet not easy! Blush at thy own folly and ingratitude.

3. That if they would not give glory to God by an awful obedience, he would get him honour upon them by wonderful plagues, v. 58, 59. Note, (1.) God justly expects from us that we should fear his fearful name; and, which is strange, that name which is here proposed as the object of our fear, is, THE LORD THY GOD, which is very fitly here put in our Bibles in capital letters; for nothing can sound more truly august. As nothing is more comfortable, so nothing more awful, than this, that he with whom we have to do is Jehovah, a Being infinitely perfect and blessed, and the Author of all being; and that he is our God, our rightful Lord and Owner, from whom we are to receive laws, and to whom we are to give account: this is great, and greatly to be feared. (2.) We may justly expect from God, that if we do not fear his fearful name, we shall feel his fearful plagues; for one way or other God will be feared. All God's plagues are dreadful, but some are wonderful, carrying in them extraordinary signatures of divine power and justice, so that a man, upon the first view of them, may say, Verily, there is a God that judgeth in the earth.

II. How the destruction threatened is described. Moses is here upon the same melancholy subject that our Saviour is discoursing of to his disciples in his farewell sermon, Matth. 24. namely, The destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation.

Five things are here foretold as steps to their ruin.

1. That they should be invaded by a foreign enemy, v. 49, 50. A nation from far, namely, the Romans, as swift as the eagle, hastening to the prey; our Saviour makes use of this similitude, in foretelling this destruction, that where the carcase is, there will the eagles be gathered together, Matth. 24. 28. And Bishop Patrick observes, (to make the accomplishment the more remarkable,) that the ensign of the Roman armies was an eagle. This nation is said to be of a fierce countenance, an indication of a fierce nature, stern and severe, that would not pity the weakness and infirmity either of little children or of old people.

2. That the country should be laid waste, and all the fruits of it eaten up by this army of foreigners; which is the natural consequence of an invasion, especially when it is made, as that by the Romans was, for the chastisement of rebels, v. 51. He shall eat the fruits of thy cattle and land, so that the inhabitants should be starved, while the invaders were fed to the full.

3. That their cities should be besieged, and that such would be the obstinacy of the besieged, and such the vigour of the besiegers, that they would be reduced to the last extremity, and at length fall into the hands of the enemy, v. 52. No place, though ever so well fortified, no, not Jerusalem itself, though it held out long, would escape. Two of the common consequences of a long siege are here foretold. (1.) A miserable famine, which would prevail to such a degree, that, for want of food, they should kill and eat their own children, v. 53. Men should do so, notwithstanding their hardness, and ability to bear hunger; and though obliged by the law of nature to provide for their own families, yet should refuse to give to the wife and children, that were starving, any of the child that was barbarously butchered, v. 54, 55. Nay, women, ladies of quality, notwithstanding their natural niceness about their food, and their natural affection to their children, yet, for want of food, should so far forget all humanity, as to kill and eat them, v. 56, 57. Let us observe by the way, how hard this fate must needs be to the tender and delicate women, and learn not to indulge ourselves in tenderness and delicacy, because we know not what we may be reduced to before we die; the more nice we are, the harder it will be to us to bear want, and the more danger we shall be in of sacrificing reason, and religion, and natural affection itself, to the clamours and cravings of an unmortified and ungoverned appetite. This threatening was fulfilled in the letter of it, more than once, to the perpetual reproach of the Jewish nation; never was the like done either by Greek or barbarian, but in the siege of Samaria, a woman boiled her own son, 2 Kings, 6. 28, 29. And it is spoken of as commonly done among them in the siege of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, Lam. 4. 10. And in the last siege, by the Romans, Josephus tells us of a noble woman that killed and ate her own child, through the extremity of the famine, and when she had eaten one half secretly, v. 57. that she might have it to herself, the mob, smelling meat, got into the house, to whom she shewed the other half, which she had kept till another time, inviting them to share with her. What is too barbarous for them to do that are abandoned of God? (2.) Sickness is another common effect of a strait and long siege; and that is here threatened: sore sickness, and of long continuance, v. 59. These should attend the Jews wherever they went afterward, the diseases of Egypt, leprocies, botches, and foul ulcers, v. 60. Nay, as if the particular miseries here threatened were not enough, he concludes with an ſc. v. 61. The Lord will bring upon thee every sickness, and every plague, though it be not written in the book of this law. Those that fall under the curse of God, will find that the one half was not told them of the weight and terror of that curse.

4. That multitudes of them should perish; so that they should become few in number, v. 62. It was a nation that God had wonderfully increased, so that they were as the stars of heaven for multitude; but, for their sin, diminished and brought low, Ps. 107. 38, 39. It is computed, that in the destruction of the Jewish nation by the Romans, as appears by the account Josephus gives of it, above two millions fell by the sword, at several places, beside what perished by famine and pestilence; so that the whole country was laid waste and turned into a wilderness. That is a terrible word, v. 63. As the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, so he will rejoice over you to destroy you. Behold here the goodness and severity of God; mercy here shines bright in the pleasure God takes in doing good, he rejoices in it; yet justice here appears no less illustrious in the pleasure he takes in destroying the impenitent; not as it is the making of his creatures miserable, but as it is the asserting of his own honour, and the securing of the ends of his government. See what a malignant mischievous thing sin is, which (as I may say) makes it necessary for the God of infinite goodness to rejoice in the destruction of his own creatures, even those that had been favourites.

5. That the remnant should be scattered throughout the nations. This completes their woe, v. 68. The Lord shall scatter thee among all people. This is remarkably fulfilled in their present dispersion, for there are Jews to be found almost in all countries that are possessed either by Christians or Mahometans, and in such numbers, that it has been said, If they could unite in one common interest, they would be a very formidable body, and able to deal with the most powerful states and princes; but they abide under the power of this curse, and are so scattered that they are not able to incorporate. It is here foretold, that, in this dispersion, (1.) They should have no religion, or none to any purpose; should have neither temple, nor altar, nor priesthood, for they should serve other gods. Some think this has been fulfilled in the force put upon the Jews in Popish countries, to worship the images that are used in the Romish church, to their great vexation. (2.) They should have no rest; no rest of body, the sole of thy foot shall not have rest, v. 65. but be continually upon the remove, either in hope of gain, or fear of persecution; all wandering Jews; no rest of the mind, (which is much worse,) but a trembling heart, v. 65. no assurance of life, v. 66. weary both of light and darkness, which are, in their turns, both welcome to a quiet mind, but to them both day and night would be a terror, v. 67. Such was once the condition of Job, (Job, 7. 4.) but to them this should be constant and perpetual; that blindness and darkness which the apostle speaks of as having happened to Israel, and that guilt which bowed down their back alway, Rom. 11. 8. 10. must needs occasion a constant restlessness and amazement. Those are a torment to themselves, and to all about them, that fear day and night, and are always uneasy; let good people strive against it, and not give way to that fear which has torment; and let wicked people not be secure in their wickedness, for their hearts cannot endure, nor can their hands be strong, when the terrors of God set themselves in array against them. They that say in the morning, Oh that it were even, and in the evening, Oh that it were morning, shew, [1.] A constant fret and vexation, chiding the hours for lingering, and complaining of the length of every minute. Let time be precious to us when we are in prosperity, and then it will not be so tedious to us, when we are in afflictions, as otherwise it would. [2.] A constant fright and terror; afraid in the morning of the arrow that flieth by day, and therefore wishing the day over; but what will this do for them? When evening comes, the trembling heart is no less apprehensive of the terror by night, Ps. 91. 5, 6. Happy they, whose minds, being staid on God, are quiet from the fear of evil. Observe here, The terror arises not only from the sight of the eyes, but from the fear of the heart, not only from real dangers, but from imaginary ones; the causes of fear, when they come to be inquired into, often prove to be only the creatures of the fancy.

Lastly, In the close, God threatens to leave them as he found them, in a house of bondage, v. 68. The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again, that is, into such a miserable state as they were in when they were slaves to the Egyptians, and ruled by them with rigour. God had brought them out of Egypt, and had said, They shall see it no more again, Dent. 17. 16. but now they should be reduced to the same state of slavery that they had been in there. To be sold to strangers would be bad enough, but much worse to be sold to their enemies. Even slaves may be valued as such, but a Jew should have so ill a name for all that is base, that, when he was exposed to sale, no man should buy him, which would make his master, that had him to sell, the more severe with him.

Thirty Jews (they say) have been sold for one small piece of money, as they sold our Saviour for thirty pieces.

Now, upon the whole matter, First, The accomplishment of these predictions upon the Jewish nation, shows that Moses spake by the Spirit of God, who certainly foresees the ruin of sinners, and gives them warning of it, that they may prevent it by a true and timely repentance, or else be left inexcusable. Secondly, Let us all from hence learn to stand in awe, and not to sin. I have heard of a wicked man, who, upon reading the threatenings of this chapter, was so enraged, that he tore the leaf out of the Bible, as Jehoiakim cut Jeremiah's roll, but to what purpose is it to deface a copy, while the original remains upon record in the divine counsels, by which it is unalterably determined, that the wages of sin is death, whether men will hear or whether they will forbear?

CHAP. XXIX.

The first words of this chapter are the contents of it; These are the words of the covenant, (c. 1.) that is, these that follow; Here is, I. A recital of God's dealings with them, in order to the bringing of them into this covenant, v. 2—8. II. A solemn charge to them to keep the covenant, v. 9. III. An abstract of the covenant itself, v. 12, 13. IV. A specification of the persons taken into the covenant, v. 10, 11, 15. V. An intimation of the great design of this covenant against idolatry in a parenthesis, v. 16, 17. VI. A most solemn and dreadful denunciation of the wrath of God against such persons as promise themselves peace in a sinful way, v. 18—28. VII. The conclusion of this treaty, with a distinction between things secret and things revealed, v. 29.

1. THESSE are the words of the covenant, which the LORD commanded Moses to make with the children of Israel in the land of Moab, beside the covenant which he made with them in Horeb. 2. And Moses called unto all Israel, and said unto them, Ye have seen all that the LORD did before your eyes in the land of Egypt unto Pharaoh, and unto all his servants, and unto all the land; 3. The great temptations which thine eyes have seen, the signs, and those great miracles: 4. Yet the LORD hath not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day. 5. And I have led you forty years in the wilderness: your clothes are not waxen old unto you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot. 6. Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink: that ye might know that I am the LORD your God. 7. And when ye came unto this place, Sihon the king of Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, came out against us unto battle, and we smote them. 8. And we took their land, and gave it for an inheritance unto the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to the half-tribe of Manasseh. 9. Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them, that ye may prosper in all that ye do.

Now that Moses had largely repeated the commands which the people were to observe as their part of the covenant, and the promises and threatenings which God would make good (according as they behaved themselves) as his part of the covenant; the whole is here summed up in a federal transaction. The covenant formerly made is here renewed, and Moses, who was before, is still, the mediator of it; (v. 1.) The Lord commanded Moses to wake it. Moses himself, though king in Jeshurun, could not make the covenant any otherwise than as God gave him instructions. It does not lie in the power of ministers to fix the terms of the covenant, they are only to dispense the seals of it. This is said to be beside the covenant made in Horeb; for though the covenant was the same, yet it was a new promulgation and ratification of it. It is probable, some now living, though not of age to be mustered, were of age to consent for themselves to the covenant made at Horeb, and yet it is here renewed. Note, Those that have solemnly covenanted with God, should take all opportunities to do it again, as those that like their choice too well to change. But the far greater part were a new generation, and therefore the covenant must be made afresh with them, and it is fit that the covenant should be renewed to the children of the covenant.

It is usual for indentures to begin with a recital; this does so; with a rehearsal of the great things God had done for them. 1. As an encouragement to them, to believe that God would indeed be to them a God, for he would not have done so much for them, if he had not designed more, to which all he had hitherto done, was but a preface (as it were) or introduction; nay, he had showed himself a God in what he had hitherto done for them, which might raise their expectations of something great, and answering the vast extent and compass of that pregnant promise, that God would be to them a God. 2. As an engagement upon them to be to him an obedient people, in consideration of what he had done for them.

For the proof of what he here advances, he appeals to their own eyes, (v. 2.) Ye have seen all that the Lord did. Their own senses were incontestable evidence of the matter of fact, that God had done great things for them; and then their own reason was a no less competent judge of the equity of his inference from it, (v. 9.) Keep therefore the words of this covenant.

These things he specifies, to show the power and goodness of God in his appearances for them. (1.) Their deliverance out of Egypt, v. 2, 3. The amazing signs and miracles by which Pharaoh was plagued, and compelled to dismiss them, and Israel was tried (for they are called temptations) whether they would trust God to secure them from, and save them by, those plagues. (2.) Their conduct through the wilderness for forty years, v. 5, 6. There they were led, and clad, and fed, by miracles; though the paths of the wilderness were not only unknown but untrdden, yet God kept them from being lost there; and (as Bishop Patrick observes) those very shoes, which by the appointment of God they put on in Egypt, at the passover, when they were ready to march, (Exod. 12. 11.) never wore out, but served them to Canaan: and though they lived not upon bread which strengthens the heart, and wine which rejoices it, but upon manna and rock-water, yet they were men of strength and courage, mighty men, and able to go forth to war. By these miracles they were made to know that the Lord was God, and by these mercies that he was their God. (3.) The victory they had lately obtained over Sihon and Og, and that good land which they had taken possession of, v. 7, 8. Both former mercies, and fresh mercies, should be improved by us as inducements to obedience.

By way of inference from these memoirs, [1.] Moses laments their stupidity, (v. 4.) Yet the Lord has not given you a heart to perceive. This does not lay the blame of our senselessness, and sottishness, and unbelief, upon God, as if they had stood ready to receive his grace, and had begged for it, but he had denied them; no, but it fastens the guilt upon themselves. "The Lord, who is the Father of spirits, a God in covenant with you, and who had always been so rich in mercy to you, no doubt, would have crowned all his other gifts with this, he would have given you a heart to perceive and eyes to see, if you had not by your own forwardness and perverseness frustrated his kind intentions, and received his grace in vain." Note, First, The hearing ear, and seeing eye, and the understanding heart, are the gift of God. All that have them, have them from him. Secondly, God gives not only food and raiment, but wealth and large possessions, to many to whom he does not give grace. Many enjoy the gifts, who have not hearts to perceive the Giver, nor the true intention and use of the gifts. Thirdly, God's readiness to do us good in other things, is a plain evidence that if we have not grace, that best of gifts, it is our own fault, and not his: we would have gathered us, and we would not. [2.] Moses charges them to be obedient, v. 9. Keep therefore, and do. Note, We are bound, in gratitude and interest, as well as duty and faithfulness, to keep the words of the covenant.

10. Ye stand this day all of you before the LORD your God; your captains of your tribes, your elders, and your officers, with all the men of Israel, 11. Your little ones, your wives, and thy stranger that is in thy camp, from the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water: 12. That thou shouldst enter into covenant with the LORD thy God, and into his oath, which the LORD thy God maketh with thee this day: 13. That he may establish thee to-day for a people unto himself, and that he may be unto thee a God, as he hath said unto thee, and as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. 14. Neither with you only do I make this covenant and this oath; 15. But with him that standeth here with us this day before the LORD our God, and also with him that is not here with us this day: 16. (For ye know how we have dwelt in the land of Egypt; and how we came through the nations which ye passed by; 17. And ye have seen their abominations, and their idols, wood and stone, silver and gold, which were among them;) 18. Lest there should be among you man, or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart turneth away this day from the LORD our God, to go and serve the gods of these nations; lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood; 19. And it come to pass, when he heareth the words of this curse, that he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart, to add drunkenness to thirst: 20. The LORD will not spare him, but then the anger of the LORD and his jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the LORD shall blot out his name from under heaven. 21. And the LORD shall separate him unto evil out of all the tribes of Israel, according to all the curses of the covenant that are written in this book of the law: 22. So that the generation to come of your children that shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, and the sicknesses which the LORD hath laid upon it; 23. And that the whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of which the LORD overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath: 24. Even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the LORD done thus unto this land? What meaneth the heat of this great anger? 25. Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the LORD God of their fathers, which he made with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt: 26. For they went and served other gods, and worshipped them, gods whom they knew not, and whom he had not given unto them: 27. And the anger of the LORD was kindled against this land, to bring upon it all the curses that are written in this book: 28. And the LORD rooted them out of their land in anger, and in wrath, and in great indignation, and cast them into another land, as it is this day. 29. The secret things belong unto the LORD our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law.

It appears, by the length of the sentences here, and by the copiousness and pungency of the expressions, that Moses, now that he was drawing near to the close of his discourse, was very warm and zealous, and very desirous to impress what he said upon the minds of this unthinking people. To bind them the faster to God and duty, he here, with great solemnity of expression, (to make up the want of the external ceremony that was used, Exod. 24. 4, &c.) concludes a bargain (as it were) between them and God, an everlasting covenant, which God would not forget, and they must not. He requires not their explicit consent, but lays the matter plainly before them, and then leaves it between God and their own consciences. Observe,

1. The parties to this covenant.

1. It is the Lord their God they are to covenant with, v. 12. To him they must give up themselves, to him they must join themselves. "It is his oath; he has drawn up the covenant and settled it; he requires your consent to it; he has sworn to you, and to him you must be sworn." This requires us to be sincere and serious, humble and reverent, in our covenant transactions with God, remembering how great a God he is, with whom we are covenanting, who has a perfect knowledge of us, and an absolute dominion over us.

2. They are all to be taken into covenant with him. They were all summoned to attend, v. 2. and did accordingly, and are told, v. 10. what was the design of their appearing before God now in a body—they were to enter into covenant with him. (1.) Even their great men: the captains of their tribes, their elders and officers, must not think it any disparagement to their honour, or any diminution of their power, to put their necks under the yoke of this covenant, and to draw in it. They must rather enter into the covenant first, to set a good example to their inferiors. (2.) Not the men only, but the wives and children, must come into this covenant; though they were not numbered, and mustered, yet they must be joined to the Lord, v. 11. Observe, Even little ones are capable of being taken into covenant with God, and are to be admitted with their parents. Little children, so little as to be carried in arms, must be brought to Christ, and shall be blessed by him, for of such was, and is, the kingdom of God. (3.) Not the men of Israel only, but the stranger that was in their camp, provided he was so far proselyted to their religion, as to renounce all false gods, was taken into this covenant with the God of Israel, forasmuch as he also, though a stranger, was to be looked upon in this matter as a son of Abraham, Luke, 19. 9. This was an early indication of favour to the Gentiles, and of the kindness God had in store for them. (4.) Not the freemen only, but the hewers of wood, and drawers of water, the meanest drudge they had among them. Note, As none are too great to come under the bonds of the covenant, so none are too mean to inherit the blessings of the covenant. In Christ no difference is made between bond and free, Col. 3. 11. Art thou called, being a servant? Care not for it, 1 Cor. 7. 21. (5.) Not only those that are now present before God in this solemn assembly, but those also that were not here with them, were taken into covenant, v. 15. As with him that standeth here with us, (so Bishop Patrick thinks it should be rendered,) so also with him that is not here with us this day; that is, [1.] Those that tarried at home were included; though detained either by sickness or necessary business, they must not therefore think themselves disengaged; no, every Israelite shares in the common blessings; they that tarry at home divide the spoil, and therefore every Israelite must own himself bound by the consent of the representative body. They who cannot go up to the house of the Lord must keep up a spiritual communion with those that do, and be present in spirit when they are absent in body. [2.] The generations to come are included. Nay, one of the Chaldee paraphrasts reads it, All the generations that have been from the first days of the world, and all that shall arise to the end of the whole world, stand with us here this day. And so, taking this covenant as a typical dispensation of the covenant of grace, it is a noble testimony to the Mediator of that covenant, who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

II. The summary of this covenant; all the precepts, and all the promises of the covenant, are included in the covenant-relation between God and them, v. 13. That they should be appointed, raised up, established, for a people to him, to observe and obey him, to be devoted to him, and dependent on him, and that he should be to them a God, according to the tenor of the covenant made with their fathers, to make them holy, high, and happy. Their fathers are here named, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as examples of piety, which those were to set themselves to imitate, who expected any benefit from the covenant made with them. Note, A due consideration of the relation we stand in to God as our God, and the obligation we lie under as a people to him, is enough to bring us to all the duties and all the comforts of the covenant.

III. The principal design of the renewing of this covenant, at this time, was, to fortify them against temptations to idolatry. Though other sins will be the sinner's ruin, yet this was the sin that was likely to be their ruin. Now, concerning this, he shews,

1. The danger they were in of being tempted to it, v. 16, 17. Ye know we have dwelt in the land of Egypt, a country addicted to idolatry; and it were well if there were not among you some remains of the infection of that idolatry; we have passed by other nations, the Edomites, Moabites, &c. and have seen their abominations, and their idols, and some among you, it may be, have liked them too well, and still hanker after them, and would rather worship a wooden god that they can see, than an infinite Spirit whom they never saw." It is to be hoped that there were those among them, who, the more they saw of these abominations and idols, the more they hated them; but there were those that were smitten with the sight of them, saw the accursed things, and coveted them.

2. The danger they were in, if they yielded to the temptation. He gives them fair warning: it was at their peril if they forsook God to serve idols. If they would not be bound and held by the precepts of the covenant, they would find that the curses of the covenant would be strong enough to bind and hold them.

(1.) Idolatry would be the ruin of particular persons and their families, v. 18. . 21. Where observe,

[1.] The sinner described, v. 18. First, He is one whose heart turns away from his God; there the mischief begins, in the evil heart of unbelief, which inclines men to depart from the living god to dead idols. Even to this sin men are tempted, and are drawn aside by their own lusts and fancies. They that begin to turn from God, by neglecting their duty to him, are easily drawn to other gods: and they that serve other gods do certainly turn away from the true God; for he will admit of no rivals; he will be all, or nothing. Secondly, He is a root that bears gall and wormwood; that is, He is a dangerous man, who, being himself poisoned with bad principles and inclinations, with a secret contempt of the God of Israel and his institutions, and a veneration for the gods of the nations, endeavours, by all arts possible, to corrupt and poison others, and draw them to idolatry; this is a man whose fruit is hemlock, (so the word is translated, (Hos. 10. 4.) and wormwood; it is very displeasing to God, and will be, to all that are seduced by him, bitterness in the latter end. This is referred to by the apostle, Heb. 12. 15. where he is in like manner cautioning us to take heed of those that would seduce us from the Christian faith; they are the weeds or tares in a field, which, if let alone, will overspread the whole field. A little of this leaven will be in danger of infecting the whole lump.

[2.] His security in the sin. He promises himself impunity, though he persists in his impiety, v. 19. Though he hears the words of the curse, so that he cannot plead ignorance of the danger, as other idolaters; yet, even then, he blesses himself in his own heart, thinks himself safe from the wrath of the God of Israel, under the protection of his idol-gods, and therefore says, "I shall have peace, though I be governed in my religion, not by God's institution, but by my own imagination, to add drunkenness to thirst, one act of wickedness to another." Idolaters were like drunkards, violently set upon their idols themselves, and industrious to draw others in with them. Revellings commonly accompanied their idolatries, 1 Pet. 4. 3. so that this speaks a woe to drunkards, (especially the drunkards of Ephraim,) who, when they are awake, being thirsty, seek it yet again, Prov. 23. 35. And those that made themselves drunk, in honour of their idols, were the worst of drunkards. Note, First, There are many who are under the curse of God, and yet bless themselves; but it will soon be found, that, in blessing themselves, they do but deceive themselves. Secondly, Those are ripe for ruin, and there is little hope of their repentance, who have made themselves believe that they shall have peace, though they go on in a sinful way. Thirdly, Drunkenness is a sin that hardens the heart, and debauches the conscience, as much as any other; a sin to which men are strangely tempted themselves, even when they have lately felt the mischiefs of it, and to which they are strangely fond of drawing others, Hab. 2. 15. And such an ensnaring sin is idolatry.

[3.] God's just severity against him for the sin, and for the impious affront he put upon God, in saying, he should have peace, though he went on, so giving the lie to eternal truth Gen. 3. 4. There is scarcely a threatening, in all the book of God, that sounds more dreadful than this here. Oh that presumptuous sinners would read it and tremble! For it is not a bugbear to frighten children and fools, but a real declaration of the wrath of God against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, v. 20, 21. First, The Lord shall not spare him. The days of his reprieve, which he abuses, will be shortened, and no mercy remembered in the midst of judgment. Secondly, The anger of the Lord, and his jealousy, which is the fiercest anger, shall smoke against him, like the smoke of a furnace. Thirdly, The curses written shall lie upon him, not only light upon him to terrify him, but abide upon him, to sink him to the lowest hell, John, 3. 36. Fourthly, His name shall be blotted out, that is, he himself shall be cut off, and his memory shall rot and perish with him. Fifthly, He shall be separated unto evil, which is the most proper notion of a curse; he shall be cut off from all happiness, and all hope of it, and marked out for misery without remedy. And (lastly) All this according to the curses of the covenant, which are the most fearful curses, being the just revenges of abused grace.

(2.) Idolatry would be the ruin of their nation; it would bring plagues upon the land that connived at this root of bitterness, and received the infection; as far as the sin spread, the judgment should spread likewise.

[1.] The ruin is described. It begins with plagues and sicknesses, v. 22. to try if they will be reclaimed by lesser judgments; but if not, it ends in a total overthrow, like that of Sodom, v. 23. As that valley, which had been like the garden of the Lord for fruitfulness, was turned into a lake of salt and sulphur, so should the land of Canaan be made desolate and barren, as it has been, ever since the last destruction of it by the Romans. The lake of Sodom bordered close upon the land of Israel, that by it they might be warned against the iniquity of Sodom; but, not taking the warning, they were made as like to Sodom in ruin as they had been in sin.

First, It would be inquired into by the generations to come, v. 22. who would find the state of their nation in all respects the reverse of what it had been; and, when they read both the history and the promise, would be astonished at the change. The stranger likewise, and the nations about them, as well as particular persons, would ask, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? v. 24. Great desolations are thus represented elsewhere as striking the spectators with amazement, 1 Kings, 9. 8, 9. Jer. 22. 8, 9. It was time for the neighbours to tremble, when judgment thus began at the house of God, 1 Pet. 4. 17. The emphasis of the question is to be laid upon this land; the land of Canaan; this good land, the glory of all lands; this land flowing with milk and honey. A thousand pities that such a good land as this should be made desolate; but this is not all; it is this holy land; the land of Israel, a people in covenant with God; it is Immanuel's land; a land where God was known and worshipped, and yet thus wasted. Note, 1. It is no new thing for God to bring desolating judgments upon a people that in profession are near to him, Amos, 3. 2. 2. He never does this without a good reason. 3. It concerns us to inquire into the reason, that we may give glory to God, and take warning to ourselves.

Secondly, The reason is here assigned, in answer to that inquiry. The matter would be so plain, that all men would say, It was because they forsook the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, v. 25. Note, God never forsakes any till they first forsake him. But those that desert the God of their fathers are justly cast out of the inheritance of their fathers. They went and served other gods, v. 26. gods that they had no acquaintance with, nor lay under any obligation to, either in duty or gratitude; for God has not given the creatures to be served by us, but to serve us; nor have they done any good to us, (as some read it,) more than what God has enabled them to do; to the Creator therefore we are debtors, and not to the creatures. It was for this that God was angry with them, v. 27. and rooted them out in anger, v. 28. So that, how dreadful soever the desolation was, the Lord was righteous in it, which is acknowledged, Dan. 9. 11, 12. "Thus" (says Mr. Ainsworth) "the law of Moses leaves sinners under the curse, and rooted out of the Lord's land; but the grace of Christ toward penitent believing sinners plants them again upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up, being kept by the power of God," Amos, 9. 15.

Lastly, He concludes his prophecy of the Jews' rejection, just as St. Paul concludes his discourse on the same subject, when it began to be fulfilled, Rom. 11. 33. How unsearchable are God's judgments, and his ways past finding out! So here, v. 29. Secret things belong to the Lord our God. Some make it to be one sentence, The secret things of the Lord our God are revealed to us and to our children, as far as we are concerned to know them, and he hath not dealt so with other nations: But we make it two sentences, by which,

1. We are forbidden curiously to inquire into the secret counsels of God, and to determine concerning them. A full answer is given to that question, Wherefore has the Lord done thus to this land? sufficient to justify God, and admonish us. But if any ask further, why God would be at such a vast expense of miracles to form such a people, whose apostacy and ruin he plainly foresaw? Why he did not by his almighty grace prevent it? Or, What he intends yet to do with them? Let such know that these are questions which cannot be answered, and therefore are not fit to be asked. It is presumption in us to pry into the Arcana Imperii—the mysteries of Government, and to inquire into the reasons of state, which it is not for us to know. See Acts, 1. 7. John, 21. 22. Col. 2. 18.

2. We are directed and encouraged diligently to inquire into that which God has made known; things revealed belong to us and to our children. Note, (1.) Though God has kept much of his counsel secret, yet there is enough revealed to satisfy and save us. He has kept back nothing that is profitable for us, but that only which it is good for us to be ignorant of. (2.) We ought to acquaint ourselves, and our children too, with the things of God that are revealed; we are not only allowed to search into them, but are concerned to do so; they are things which we and our's are nearly interested in. They are the rules we are to live by, the grants we are to live upon; and therefore we are to learn them diligently ourselves, and to teach them diligently to our children. (3.) All our knowledge must be in order to practice, for this is the end of all divine revelation, not to furnish us with curious subjects of speculation and discourse, with which to entertain ourselves and our friends, but that we may do all the words of this law, and be blessed in our deed.

CHAP. XXX.

One would have thought that the threatenings in the close of the foregoing chapter had made a full end of the people of Israel, and had left their cause for ever desperate; but, in this chapter, we have a plain intimation of the mercy God had in store for them in the latter days, so that merey at length rejoices against judgment, and has the last word. Here we have, I. Exceeding great and precious promises made to them, upon their repentance and return to God, v. 1. .10. II. The righteousness of faith set before them in the plainness and easiness of the commandment that was now given them, v. 11. .14. III. A fair reference of the whole matter to their choice, v. 15. .20.

1. AND it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath driven thee, 2. And shalt return unto the LORD thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul; 3. That then the LORD thy God will turn thy captivity, and have compassion upon thee, and will return and gather thee from all the nations, whither the LORD thy God hath scattered thee. 4. If any of thine be driven out unto the outmost parts of heaven, from thence will the LORD thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee: 5. And the LORD thy God will bring thee into the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers. 6. And the LORD thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live. 7. And the LORD thy God will put all these curses upon thine enemies, and on them that hate thee, which persecuted thee. 8. And thou shalt return and obey the voice of the LORD, and do all his commandments which I command thee this day. 9. And the LORD thy God will make thee plenteous in every work of thine hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good: for the LORD will again rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers: 10. If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the LORD thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which are written in this book of the law, and if thou turn unto the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul.

Two ways these verses may be considered; either as a conditional promise, or as an absolute prediction.

1. They are chiefly to be considered as a conditional promise, and so they belong to all persons and all people, and not to Israel only; and the design of them is, to assure us, that the greatest sinners, if they repent and be converted, shall have their sins pardoned, and be restored to God's favour. This is the purport of the covenant of grace, it leaves room for repentance in case of misdemeanour, and promises pardon upon repentance, which the covenant of innocence did not. Now observe here,

1. How the repentance is described, which is the condition of these promises. (1.) It begins in serious consideration, v. 1. "Thou shalt call to mind that which thou hadst forgotten, or not regarded." Note, Consideration is the first step toward conversion, Isa. 46. 8. Bring to mind, O ye transgressors. The prodigal son came to himself first, and then to his father. That which they should call to mind, is, the blessing and the curse. If sinners would but seriously consider the happiness they have lost by sin, and the misery they have brought themselves into, and that by repentance they may escape that misery, and recover that happiness, they would not delay to return to the Lord their God. The prodigal called to mind the blessing and the curse, when he considered his present poverty, and the plenty of bread in his father's house, Luke, 15, 17. (2.) It consists in sincere conversion. The effect of the consideration cannot but be godly sorrow and shame, Ezek. 6. 9.—7. 16. But that which is the life and soul of repentance, and without which the most passionate expressions are but a jest, is, returning to the Lord our God, v. 2. If thou turn (v. 10.) with all thy heart, and with all thy soul. We must return to our allegiance to God as our Lord and Ruler, our dependence upon him as our Father and Benefactor, our devotedness to him as our highest end, and our communion with him as our God in covenant. We must return to God from all that which stands in opposition to him, or competition with him. In this return to God, we must be upright—with the heart and soul, and universal—with all the heart and all the soul. (3.) It is evidenced by a constant obedience to the holy will of God. If thou shalt obey his voice, v. 2. thou and thy children; for it is not enough that we do our duty ourselves, but we must train up and engage our children to do it. Or, this comes in as the condition of the entail of the blessing upon their children, provided their children kept close to their duty. This obedience must be with an eye to God, Thou shalt obey his voice, v. 8. and hearken to it, v. 10. It must be sincere, and cheerful, and entire, with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, v. 2. It must be from a principle of love, and that love too must be with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, v. 6. It is the heart and soul that God looks at, and requires; he will have that, or nothing, and entire, or not at all. And it must be universal; according to all that I command thee, v. 2. and again, v. 8. to do all his commandments. For, he that allows himself in the breach of one commandment, involves himself in the guilt of contemning them all, James, 2. 10. An upright heart has respect to all God's commandments, Ps. 119. 6.

2. What the favour is, which is promised upon this repentance. Though they are brought to God by their trouble and distress, in the nations whither they were driven, v. 1. yet God will graciously accept of them notwithstanding; for on this errand afflictions are sent, to bring us to repentance. Though they are driven out to the utmost parts of heaven, yet from thence their penitent prayers shall reach God's gracious ear, and there his favour shall find them out, v. 4. Undique ad caelos tantundem est via—From every place there is the same way to heaven. This promise Nehemiah pleads in his prayer for dispersed Israel, Neh. 1. 9.

It is here promised, (1.) That God would have compassion upon them, as proper objects of his pity, v. 3. Against sinners, that go on in sin, God has indignation, ch. 29. 20. but on those that repent, and bemoan themselves, he has compassion, Jer. 31. 18, 20. True penitents may take great encouragement from the compassions and tender mercies of our God, which never fail, but overflow. (2.) That he would turn their captivity, and gather them from the nations whither they were scattered, v. 3. though never so remote, v. 4. One of the Chaldee paraphrasts applies this to the Messiah, explaining it thus, The word of the Lord shall gather you by the hand of Elias the great priest, and shall bring you by the hand of the king Messiah; for this was God's covenant with him, that he should restore the preserved of Israel, Isa. 49. 6. And this was the design of his death, to gather into one the children of God that were scattered abroad, John, 11. 51, 52. To him shall the gathering of the people be. (3.) That he would bring them into their land again, v. 5. Note, Penitent sinners are not only delivered out of their misery, but restored to true happiness in the favour of God. The land they are brought into to possess it, is, though not the same, yet, in some respects, better than that which our first father Adam possessed, and out of which he was expelled. (4.) That he would do them good, v. 5. and rejoice over them for good, v. 9. For there is joy in heaven upon the repentance and conversion of sinners; the father of the prodigal rejoiced over him for good. That he would multiply them, v. 5. And that, when they grew numerous, every mouth might have meat, he would make them plenteous in every work of their hand, v. 9. National repentance and reformation bring national plenty, peace, and prosperity. It is promised, The Lord will make thee plenteous in the fruit of thy cattle and land, for good. Many have plenty for hurt, the prosperity of fools destroys them. Then it is for good, when with it God gives us grace to use it for his glory. (5.) That he would transfer the curses they had been under to their enemies, v. 7. When God was gathering them in to re-establish them, they would meet with much opposition; but the same curses, that had been a burden upon them, should become a defence to them, by being turned upon their adversaries. The cup of trembling should be taken out of their hand, and put into the hand of those that afflicted them, Isa. 51. 22, 23. (6.) That he would give them his grace to change their hearts, and rule there, v. 6. The Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart to love the Lord.

Note, [1.] The heart must be circumcised to love God. The filth of the flesh must be put away; and the foolishness of the heart, as the Chaldee paraphrase expounds it. See Col. 2. 11, 12. Rom. 2. 29. Circumcision was a seal of the covenant; the heart is then circumcised to love God, when it is strongly engaged and held by that bond to this duty. [2.] It is the work of God's grace to circumcise the heart, and to shed abroad the love of God there; and this grace is given to all that repent, and seek it carefully. Nay, that seems to be rather a promise than a precept, v. 8. Thou shalt return, and obey the voice of the Lord. He that requires us to return, promises grace to enable us to return; and it is our fault, if that grace be not effectual. Herein the covenant of grace is well-ordered, that whatsoever is required in the covenant, is promised. Turn ye at my reproof; behold, I will pour out my Spirit, Prov. 1. 23. Lastly, It is observable how Moses here calls God, The Lord thy God, twelve times in these ten verses; intimating, First, That penitents may take direction and encouragement in their return to God, from their relation to him, Jer. 3. 22. "Behold, we come unto thee, for thou art the Lord our God; therefore to thee we are bound to come, whither else should we go? And therefore we hope to find favour with thee." Secondly, That those who have revolved from God, if they return to him, and do their first works, shall be restored to their former state of honour and happiness. Bring hither the first robe 17 the threatenings of the former chapter, he is all along called the Lord, a God of power, and the Judge of all: but in the promises of this chapter, the Lord thy God, a God of grace, and in covenant with thee.

11. This may also be considered as a prediction of the repentance and restoration of the Jews, When all these things are come upon thee, v. 1. The blessing first, and after that, the curse, then the mercy in reserve shall take place. Though their hearts were wretchedly hardened, yet the grace of God could soften and change them; and then, though their case was deplorably miserable, the providence of God would redress all their grievances. Now, 1. It is certain that this was fulfilled in their return from their captivity in Babylon. It was a wonderful instance of their repentance and reformation, that Ephraim, who had been joined to idols, renounced them, and said, What have I to do any more with idols? That captivity effectually cured them of idolatry; and then God planted them again in their own land, and did them good. But, 2. Some think that it is yet further to be accomplished in the conversion of the Jews who are now dispersed, their repentance for the sin of their fathers in crucifying Christ, their return to God through him, and their accession to the Christian church. But, alas! who shall live when God doth this?

11. For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off. 12. It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? 13. Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldest say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it? 14. But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it.

Moses here urges them to obedience, from the consideration of the plainness and easiness of the command.

1. This is true of the law of Moses. They could never plead, in excuse for their disobedience, that God had enjoined them that which was either unintelligible, or impracticable, impossible to be known or to be done, v. 11. It is not hidden from thee. That is, 1. "It is not too high for thee; thou needest not send messengers to heaven, v. 12. to inquire what thou must do to please God; nor needest thou go beyond sea, v. 13. as the philosophers did, that travelled through many and distant regions in pursuit of learning; no, thou art not put to that labour and expence; nor is the commandment within the reach of those only that have a great estate, or a refined genius, but it is very nigh unto thee, v. 14. It is written in thy books, made plain upon tables, so that he that runs may read it; thy priests' lips keep this knowledge, and when any difficulty arises, thou mayest ask the law at their mouth, Mal. 2. 7. It is not communicated in a strange language; but it is in thy mouth, that is, in the vulgar tongue that is commonly used by thee, in which thou mayest hear it read, and talk of it familiarly among thy children. It is not wrapped up in obscure phrases or figures, to puzzle and amuse thee, or in hieroglyphics, but it is in thy heart; it is delivered in such a manner, as that it is level to thy capacity, even to the capacity of the meanest." 2. "It is not too hard or heavy for thee;" so the Septuagint reads it, v. 11. Thou needest not say, "As good attempt to climb to heaven, or flee upon the wings of the morning to the uttermost part of the sea, as go about to do all the words of this law;" no, the matter is not so; it is no such intolerable yoke as some ill-minded people represent it. It was indeed a heavy yoke in comparison with that of Christ, Acts, 15. 10. but not in comparison with the idolatrous services of the neighbouring nations. God appeals to themselves, that he had not made them to serve with an offering, nor wearied them with incense, Isa. 43. 23. Mic. 6. 3. But he speaks especially of the moral law, and its precepts; "That is very nigh thee, consonant to the law of nature, which would have been found in every man's heart, and every man's mouth, if he would but have attended to it. There is that in thee, which consents to the law that it is good, Rom. 7. 16. Thou hast therefore no reason to complain of any insuperable difficulty in the observance of it."

11. This is true of the gospel of Christ, to which the apostle applies it, and makes it the language of the righteousness which is of faith, Rom. 10. 6. . 8. And many think that is principally intended by Moses here; for he wrote of Christ, John, 5. 46. This is God's commandment now under the gospel, that we believe in the name of his Son Jesus Christ, 1 John, 3. 23. If we ask, as the blind man did, Lord, who is he? or where is he, that we may believe on him? John, 9. 36. this scripture gives an answer. We need not go up to heaven, to fetch him thence, for he is come down from thence in his incarnation; nor down to the deep, to fetch him thence, for thence he is come up in his resurrection. But the word is nigh us, and Christ in that word; so that if we believe with the heart, that the promises of the incarnation and resurrection of the Messiah are fulfilled in our Lord Jesus, and receive him accordingly, and confess him with our mouth, we have then Christ with us, and we shall be saved. He is near, very near, that justifies us. The law was plain and easy, but the gospel much more so.

15. See, I have set before thee this day life and good, and death and evil; 16. In that I command thee this day to love the LORD thy God, to walk in his ways, and to keep his commandments and his statutes and his judgments, that thou mayest live and multiply: and the LORD thy God shall bless thee in the land whither thou goest to possess it. 17. But if thine heart turn away, so that thou wilt not hear, but shalt be drawn away, and worship other gods, and serve them; 18. I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou passest over Jordan to go to possess it. 19. I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live: 20. That thou mayest love the LORD thy God, and that thou mayest obey his voice, and that thou mayest cleave unto him: for he is thy life, and the length of thy days: that thou mayest dwell in the land which the LORD sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them.

Moses here concludes with a very bright light, and a very strong fire, that, if possible, what he had been preaching of, might find entrance into the understanding and affections of this unthinking people. What could be said more moving, and more likely to make deep and lasting impressions? The manner of his treating with them is so rational, so prudent, so affectionate, and every way so apt to gain the point, that it abundantly shews him to be in earnest, and leaves them inexcusable in their disobedience.

1. He states the case very fairly. He appeals to themselves concerning it, whether he had not laid the matter as plain as they could wish before them. 1. Every man covets to obtain life and good, and to escape death and evil; desires happiness, and dreads misery. "Well," says he, "I have shewed you the way to obtain all the happiness you can desire, and to avoid all misery. Be obedient, and all shall be well, and nothing amiss." Our first parents ate the forbidden fruit, in hopes of getting thereby the knowledge of good and evil; but it was a miserable knowledge they got, of good by the loss of it, and of evil by the sense of it; yet such is the compassion of God toward man, that, instead of giving him up to his own delusion, he has favoured him, by his word, with such a knowledge of good and evil, as will make him for ever happy, if it be not his own fault. 2. Every man is moved and governed in his actions by hope and fear, hope of good, and fear of evil, real or apparent. "Now," says Moses, "I have tried both ways; if you will be either drawn to obedience by the certain prospect of advantage by it, or driven to obedience by the no less certain prospect of ruin, in case you be disobedient; if you will be wrought upon either way, you will be kept close to God and your duty; but, if you are not, you are utterly inexcusable."

Let us, then, hear the conclusion of the whole matter. (1.) If they and their's would love God, and serve him, they should live, and be happy, v. 16. If they would love God, and evidence the sincerity of their love by keeping his commandments; if they would make conscience of keeping his commandments, and do it from a principle of love; then God would do them good, and they should be as happy as his love and blessing could make them. (2.) If they or their's should, at any time, turn from God, desert his service, and worship other gods, that would certainly be their ruin, v. 17, 18. Observe, It is not for every failure in the particulars of their duty that ruin is threatened, but for apostasy and idolatry: though every violation of the command deserved the curse, yet the nation would be destroyed for that only which is the violation of the marriage covenant. The purport of the New Testament is much the same; that, in like manner, sets before us life and death, good and evil; He that believes shall be saved; he that believes not shall be damned, Mark, 16. 16. And that faith includes love and obedience. To them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory, honour, and immortality, God will give eternal life; but to them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, and so, in effect, worship other gods, and serve them, to them will be rendered the indignation and wrath of an immortal God, the consequence of which must needs be the tribulation and anguish of an immortal soul, Rom. 2. 7. .9.

II. Having thus stated the case, he fairly puts them to their choice, with a direction to them to choose well. He appeals to heaven and earth concerning his fair and faithful dealing with them, v. 19. They could not but own, that, whatever was the issue, he had delivered his soul; therefore, that they might deliver their's, he bids them choose life, that is, choose to do their duty, which would be their life. Note, 1. Those shall have life that choose it; they that choose the favour of God, and communion with him for their felicity, and prosecute their choice as they ought, shall have what they choose. 2. Those that come short of life and happiness, must thank themselves; they would have had it, if they had chosen it when it was put to their choice: but they die, because they will die, that is, because they do not like the life promised upon the terms proposed.

In the last verse, (1.) He shews them, in short, what their duty is; to love God, and to love him as the Lord, a Being most amiable, and as their God, a God in covenant with them; and, as an evidence of this love, to obey his voice in every thing; and, by constancy in this love and obedience, to cleave to him, and never to forsake him in affection or practice. (2.) He shews them what reason there was for this duty. In consideration, [1.] Of their dependence upon God; He is thy life, and the length of thy days. He gives life, preserves life, restores life, and prolongs it by his power, though it is a frail life; and by his patience, though it is a forfeited life: he sweetens life with his comforts, and is the sovereign Lord of life; in his hand our breath is. Therefore we are concerned to keep ourselves in his love; for it is good having him our Friend, and bad having him our Enemy. [2.] Of their obligation to him, for the promise of Canaan made to their fathers, and ratified with an oath. And, [3.] Of their expectations from him, in performance of that promise; "Love God, and serve him, that thou mayest dwell in that land of promise, which thou mayest be sure He can give, and uphold to thee, who is thy life, and the length of thy days." All these are arguments to us to continue in love and obedience to the God of our mercies.

CHAP. XXXI.

In this chapter, Moses, having finished his sermon, I. Encourages both the people, who were now to enter Canaan, v. 1. .6. and Joshua, who was to lead them, v. 7, 8, 23. And, II. He takes care for the keeping of these things always in their remembrance after his decease. 1. By the book of the law, which was, (1.) Written. (2.) Delivered into the custody of the priests, v. 9. and 24. .27. (3.) Ordered to be publicly read every seventh year, v. 10. .13. 2. By a song, which God orders Moses to prepare, for their instruction and admonition. (1.) He calls Moses and Joshua to the door of the tabernacle, v. 14, 15. (2.) He foretells the apostacy of Israel, in process of time, and the judgments they would thereby bring upon themselves, v. 16. .18. (3.) He prescribes the following song, to be a witness against them, v. 19. .21. (4.) Moses wrote it, v. 22. and delivered it to Israel, with an intimation of the design of it, as he had received it from the Lord, v. 28. .30.

1. AND Moses went and spake these words unto all Israel. 2. And he said unto them, I am an hundred and twenty years old this day; I can no more go out and come in: also the LORD hath said unto me, Thou shalt not go over this Jordan. 3. The LORD thy God, he will go over before thee, and he will destroy these nations from before thee, and thou shalt possess them: and Joshua, he shall go over before thee, as the LORD hath said. 4. And the LORD shall do unto them as he did to Sihon and to Og, kings of the Amorites, and unto the land of them, whom he destroyed. 5. And the LORD shall give them up before your face, that ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments which I have commanded you. 6. Be strong and of a good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the LORD thy God, he it is that doth go with thee; he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. 7. And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou must go with this people unto the land which the LORD hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it. 8. And the LORD, he it is that doth go before thee; he will be with thee, he will not fail thee, neither forsake thee: fear not, neither be dismayed.

*Loath to part, (we say,) bids oft farewell; Moses does so to the children of Israel: not because he was loath to go to God, but because he was loath to leave them, fearing, that, when he had left them, they would leave God: he had finished what he had to say to them by way of counsel and exhortation: here he calls them together to give them a word of encouragement, especially with reference to the wars of Canaan, which they were now to engage in. It was a discouragement to them that Moses was to be removed, at a time when he could so ill be spared: though Joshua was continued to fight for them in the valley, they would want Moses to intercede for them on the hill, as he did, Exod. 17. 10. But there is no remedy; Moses can no more go out and come in, v. 2. Not that he was disabled by any decay either of body or mind, for his natural force was not abated, ch. 34. 7. but he cannot any longer discharge his office: for, 1. He is an hundred and twenty years old, and it is time for him* to think of resigning his honour, and returning to his rest. He that had arrived at so great an age then, when seventy or eighty was the ordinary stint, as appears by the prayer of Moses, Ps. 90. 10. might well think that he had accomplished as a hireling his day. 2. He is under a divine sentence, Thou shalt not go over Jordan. Thus a full stop was put to his usefulness; hitherto he must go, hitherto he must serve, but no further. So God had appointed it, and Moses acquiesces; for I know not why any of us should desire to live a day longer than while God has work for us to do; nor shall we be accountable for more time than is allotted us. But, though Moses must not go over himself, he is anxious to encourage those that must.

1. He encourages the people; and never could any general animate his soldiers upon such good grounds as those on which Moses here encourages Israel. 1. He assures them of the constant presence of God with them, v. 3. The Lord thy God, that has led thee, and kept thee hitherto, he will go over before thee; and they might follow boldly, who were sure that they had God for their Leader. He repeats it again, v. 6. with an emphasis, "The Lord thy God, the great Jehovah, who is thine in covenant, he it is, He, and no less; He, and no other, that goes before thee; not only who, by his promise, has assured thee that he will go before thee; but, by his ark, the visible token of his presence, shews thee that he does actually go before thee." And he repeats it with enlargement, "Not only he goes over before thee at first, to bring thee in, but he will continue with thee all along; with thee and thine; he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee; he will not disappoint thy expectations in any strait, nor will he ever desert thine interest; be constant to him, and he will be so to thee." This is applied by the apostle to all God's spiritual Israel, for the encouragement of their faith and hope; unto us is this gospel preached, as well as unto them, he will never fail thee, nor forsake thee, Heb. 13. 5. 2. He commends Joshua to them for a leader; Joshua, he shall go over before thee, v. 3. one whose conduct and courage, and sincere affection to their interest, they had had long experience of, and one whom God had ordained and appointed to be their leader, and therefore, no doubt, would own, and bless, and make a blessing to them. See Numb. 27. 18. Note, It is a great encouragement to a people, when, instead of some useful instruments that are removed, God raises up others to carry on his work. 3. He ensures their success. The greatest generals, supported with the greatest advantages, must yet own the issues of war to be doubtful and uncertain; the battle is not always to the strong or to the bold; an ill accident, unthought of, may turn the scale against the highest hopes. But Moses had warrant from God to assure Israel, that, notwithstanding the disadvantages they laboured under, they should certainly be victorious. A coward will fight when he is sure to be a conqueror. God undertakes to do the work, he will destroy these nations; and Israel shall do little else than divide the spoil, thou shalt possess them, v. 3. Two things might encourage their hopes of this. (1.) The victories they had already obtained over Sihon and Og, v. 4. From which they might infer both the power of God, that he could do what he had done, and the purpose of God, that he would finish what he had begun to do. Thus must we improve our experience. (2.) The command God had given them to destroy the Canaanites, ch. 7. 2.—12. 2. to which he refers here, v. 5. That ye may do unto them according to all which I have commanded you; and from which they might infer, that, if God had commanded them to destroy the Canaanites, no doubt he would put it into the power of their hands to do it. Note, What God has made our duty, we have reason to expect opportunity and assistance from him for the doing of; so that, from all this, he had reason enough to bid them be strong, and of a good courage, v. 6. While they had the power of God engaged for them, they had no reason to fear all the powers of Canaan engaged against them.

11. He encourages Joshua, v. 7. 8. Observe, 1. Though Joshua was an experienced general, and a man of approved gallantry and resolution, who had already signalized himself in many brave actions; yet Moses saw cause to bid him be of good courage, now that he was entering upon a new scene of action; and Joshua was far from taking it as an affront, or as an implicit questioning of his courage, to be thus charged, as sometimes we find proud and peevish spirits invidiously taking exhortations and admonitions for reproaches and reflections. Joshua himself is very well pleased to be admonished by Moses to be strong, and of good courage. 2. He gives him this charge in the sight of all Israel, that they might be the more observant of him whom they saw thus solemnly inaugurated, and that he might set himself the more to be an example of courage to the people, who were witnesses to this charge here given to him, as well as to themselves. 3. He gives him the same assurances of the Divine presence, and consequently of a glorious success, that he had given the people. God would be with him, would not forsake him, and therefore he should certainly accomplish the glorious enterprise to which he was called and commissioned, Thou shalt cause them to inherit the land of promise. Note, Those shall speed well that have God with them; and therefore they ought to be of good courage. Through God, let us do valiantly, for through him we shall do victoriously; if we resist the devil, he shall flee, and God shall shortly tread him under our feet.

9. And Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi, which bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and unto all the elders of Israel. 10. And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, 11. When all Israel come to appear before the LORD thy God in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing. 12. Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the LORD your God, and observe to do all the words of this law: 13. And that their children, which have not known any thing, may hear, and learn to fear the LORD your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it.

The law was given by Moses; so it is said, John, 1. 17. He was not only entrusted to deliver it to that generation, but to transmit it to the generations to come; and here it appears that he was faithful to that trust.

1. Moses wrote this law, v. 9. The learned Bishop Patrick understands this of all the five books of Moses, which are often called the Law; though he supposes that Moses had written most of the Pentateuch before, yet he did not finish it till now; now he put his last hand to that sacred volume. Many think that the law here (especially since it is called this law, this grand abridgment of the law) is to be understood of this book of Deuteronomy; all those discourses to the people, which have taken up this whole book, he, being in them divinely inspired, wrote them as the word of God. He wrote this law, 1. That they who had heard it might often review it themselves, and call it to mind. 2. That it might be the more safely handed down to posterity. Note, The church has received abundance of advantage from the writing, as well as from the preaching, of divine things; faith comes not only by hearing, but by reading. The same care that was taken of the law, thanks be to God, is taken of the gospel too; soon after was preached, it was written, that it might reach to them on whom the ends of the world shall come.

11. Having written it, he committed it to the care and custody of the priests and elders. He delivered one authentic copy to the priests, to be laid up by the ark, v. 26. there to remain as a standard, by which all other copies must be tried. And it is supposed that he gave another copy to the elders of each tribe, to be transcribed by all of that tribe that were so disposed. Some observe, that the elders, as well as the priests, were entrusted with the law, to intimate, that magistrates, by their power, as well as ministers, by their doctrine, are to maintain religion, and to take care that the law be not broken or lost.

III. He appointed the public reading of this law, in a general assembly of all Israel, every seventh year. The pious Jews (it is very probable) read the law daily in their families, and Moses of old time was read in the synagogue every sabbath-day, Acts, 15. 21. But once in seven years, that the law might be the more magnified and made honourable, it must be read in a general assembly. Though we read the word in private, we must not think it needless to hear it read in public.

Now, here he gives direction,

1. When this solemn reading of the law must be, that the time might add to the solemnity; it must be done, (1.) In the year of release. In that year the land rested, so that they could the better spare time to attend this service. Servants who were then discharged, and poor debtors who were then acquitted from their debts, must know, that, having the benefit of the law, it was justly expected they should yield obedience to it, and therefore give up themselves to be God's servants, because he had loosed their bonds. The year of release was typical of gospel grace, which therefore is called the acceptable year of the Lord; for our remission and liberty by Christ engage us to keep his commandments, Luke, 1. 74, 75. (2.) At the feast of tabernacles in that year. In that feast they were particularly required to rejoice before God, Lev. 23. 40. Therefore then they must read the law, both to qualify their mirth, and keep it in due bounds, and to sanctify their mirth, that they might make the law of God the matter of their rejoicing, and might read it with pleasure, and not as a task.

2. To whom it must be read: to all Israel, v. 11. men, women, and children, and the strangers, v. 12. The women and children were not obliged to go up to the other feasts, but to this only in which the law was read. Note, It is the will of God that all people should acquaint themselves with his word. It is a rule to all, and therefore should be read to all. It is supposed, since all Israel could not possibly meet in one place, or one man's voice reach them all, that as many as the courts of the Lord's house would hold, met there, and the rest at the same time in their synagogues. The Jewish doctors say, that the hearers were bound to prepare their hearts, and to hear with fear and reverence, and with joy and trembling, as in the day when the law was given on mount Sinai, and though they were great and wise men, who knew the whole law very well, yet they were bound to hear with great attention; for he that reads is the messenger of the congregation, to cause the words of God to be heard. I wish those that hear the gospel read and preached, would consider this.

3. By whom it must be read. Thou shalt read it, v. 11. "Thou, O Israel," by a proper person appointed for that purpose; or, "Thou, O Joshua, their chief ruler;" accordingly, we find that he did read the law himself, Josh. 8. 35. So did Josiah, 2 Chron. 34. 30. and Ezra, Neh. 8. 3. And the Jews say, that the king himself (when they had one) was the person that read in the courts of the temple; that a pulpit was set up for that purpose in the midst of the court, in which the king stood; that the book of the law was delivered him by the high priest; that he stood up to receive it, uttered a prayer (as every one did that was to read the law in public) before he read; and then, if he pleased, he might sit down and read; but if he read standing, it was thought the more commendable, as (they say) king Agrippa did. Here let me offer it as a conjecture, that Solomon is called the Preacher, in his Ecclesiastes, because he delivered the substance of that book in a discourse to the people, after his public reading of the law in the feast of tabernacles, according to this appointment here.

4. For what end it must be thus solemnly read. (1.) That the present generation might hereby keep up their acquaintance with the law of God, v. 12. They must hear, that they may learn, and fear God, and observe to do their duty. See here what we are to aim at in hearing the word; we must hear, that we may learn and grow in knowledge; and every time we read the scriptures, we shall find that there is still more and more to be learned out of them. We must learn, that we may fear God, that is, that we may be duly affected with divine things; and must fear God, that we may observe and do the words of his law; for in vain do we pretend to fear him, if we do not obey him. (2.) That the rising generation might sometimes be leavened with religion, v. 13. not only that those who know something may thus know more, but that the children, which have not known any thing, may sometimes know this, how much it is their interest, as well as duty, to fear God.

14. And the LORD said unto Moses, Behold, thy days approach that thou must die: call Joshua, and present yourselves in the tabernacle of the congregation, that I may give him a charge. And Moses and Joshua went, and presented themselves in the tabernacle of the congregation. 15. And the LORD appeared in the pillar of a cloud: and the pillar of the cloud stood over the door of the tabernacle. 16. And the LORD said unto Moses, Behold, thou shalt sleep with thy fathers; and this people will rise up, and go a whoring after the gods of the strangers of the land, whither they go to be among them, and will forsake me, and break my covenant which I have made with them. 17. Then my anger shall be kindled against them in that day, and I will forsake them, and I will hide my face from them, and they shall be devoured, and many evils and troubles shall befall them; so that they will say in that day, Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us? 18. And I will surely hide my face in that day, for all the evils which they shall have wrought, in that they are turned unto other gods. 19. Now therefore write ye this song for you, and teach it the children of Israel: put it in their mouths, that this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel. 20. For when I shall have brought them into the land which I swear unto their fathers, that floweth with milk and honey; and they shall have eaten and filled themselves, and waxen fat; then will they turn unto other gods, and serve them, and provoke me, and break my covenant. 21. And it shall come to pass, when many evils and troubles are befallen them, that this song shall testify against them as a witness; for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed: for I know their imagination which they go about, even now, before I have brought them into the land which I swear.

Here,

I. Moses and Joshua are summoned to attend the Divine Majesty at the door of the tabernacle, v. 14. Moses is told again that he must shortly die; even those that are most ready and willing to die, have need to be often reminded of its approach. In consideration of this, he must come himself to meet God; for whatever improves our communion with God furthers our preparation for death. He must also bring Joshua with him, to be presented to God for a successor, and to receive his commission and charge. Moses readily obeys the summons, for he was not one of those that look with an evil eye upon their successors, but, on the contrary, rejoiced in him.

II. God graciously gives them the meeting. He appeared in the tabernacle, (as the Shechinah used to appear,) in a pillar of a cloud, v. 15. This is the only time in all this book that we read of the glory of God appearing, whereas we often read of it in the three foregoing books; which perhaps signifies, that, in the latter days, under the evangelical law, such visible appearances as these of the Divine Glory are not to be expected, but we must take heed to the more sure word of prophecy.

III. He tells Moses, that, after his death, the covenant which he had taken so much pains to make between Israel and their God would certainly be broken.

1. That Israel would forsake God, v. 16. And we may be sure, that, if the covenant between God and man be broken, the blame must lie on man, it is he that breaks it; we have often observed it, That God never leaves any till they first leave him. Worshipping the gods of the Canaanites (who had been the natives, but from henceforward were to be looked upon as the strangers of that land) would undoubtedly be counted a deserting of God, and, like adultery, a violation of the covenant. Thus, still, those are revolters from Christ, and will be so adjudged, who either make a god of their money by reigning covetousness, or a god of their belly by reigning sensuality. They that turn to other gods, v. 18. forsake their own mercies. This apostacy of their's is foretold to be an effect of their prosperity, v. 20. They shall have eaten, and filled themselves, that is all they will aim at in eating, to gratify their own appetites, and then they will wax fat, grow secure, and sensual; their security will take off their dread of God and his judgments; and their sensuality will incline them to the idolatries of the heathen, which made provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts of it. Note, God has a clear and infallible foresight of all the wickedness of the wicked, and has often covenanted with those who, he knew, would deal very treacherously, Isa. 48. 8. and conferred many favours on those who, he knew, would deal very ungratefully.

2. That then God would forsake Israel; and justly does he cast them off, who had so unjustly cast him off, v. 17. My anger shall be kindled against them, and I will forsake them. His providence would forsake them, no longer to protect and prosper them, and then they would become a prey to all their neighbours. His Spirit and grace would forsake them, no longer to teach and guide them, and then they would be more and more bigoted, besotted, and hardened, in their idolatries. Thus many evils and troubles would befall them, v. 17, 21. which would be such manifest indications of God's displeasure against them, that they themselves would be constrained to own it, Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us? They that have sinned away their God, will find that thereby they pull all mischiefs upon their own heads. But that which completed their misery, was, that God would hide his face from them in that day, that day of their trouble and distress, v. 18. Whatever outward troubles we are in, if we have but the light of God's countenance, we may be easy. But, if God hide his face from us and our prayers, we are undone.

IV. He directs Moses to deliver them a song, in the composing of which he should be divinely inspired, and which should remain a standing testimony for God, as faithful to them, in giving them warning, and against them, as persons false to themselves, in not taking the warning, v. 19. The written word, in general, as well as this song in particular, is a witness for God against all those that break covenant with him. It shall be for a testimony, Matth. 24. 14. The wisdom of man has devised many ways of conveying the knowledge of good and evil, by laws, histories, prophecies, proverbs, and, among the rest, by songs; each has its advantages. And the wisdom of God has, in the scripture, made use of them all, that ignorant and careless men might be left inexcusable. 1. This song, if rightly improved, might be a means to prevent their apostacy; for, in the inditing of it, God had an eye to their present imagination, now, before they were brought into the land of promise, v. 21. God knew very well that there were in their hearts such gross conceits of the Deity, and such inclinations to idolatry, that they would be tinder to the sparks of that temptation; and therefore, in this song, he gives them warning of their danger that way. Note, The word of God is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of men's hearts, and meets with them strangely, by its reproofs and corrections, Heb. 4. 12. Compare 1 Cor. 14. 25. Ministers, who preach the word, know not the imaginations men go about, but God, whose word it is, knows perfectly. 2. If this song did not prevent their apostacy, yet it might help to bring them to repentance, and to reduce them from their apostacy. When their troubles are come upon them, this song shall not be forgotten, but may serve as a glass to shew them their own faces, that they may humble themselves, and return to Him from whom they have revolted. Note, Those whom God has mercy in store for, he may leave to fall, yet he will provide means for their recovery. Medicines are prepared beforehand for their cure.

22. Moses therefore wrote this song the same day, and taught it the children of Israel. 23. And he gave Joshua the son of Nun a charge, and said, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I swear unto them: and I will be with thee. 24. And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished, 25. That Moses commanded the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, saying, 26. Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee. 27. For I know thy rebellion, and thy stiff neck: behold, while I am yet alive with you this day, ye have been rebellious against the LORD; and how much more after my death? 28. Gather unto me all the elders of your tribes, and your officers, that I may speak these words in their ears, and call heaven and earth to record against them. 29. For I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you; and evil will befall you in the latter days; because ye will do evil in the sight of the LORD, to provoke him to anger through the work of your hands. 30. And Moses spake in the ears of all the congregation of Israel the words of this song, until they were ended.

Here,

I. The charge is given to Joshua, which God had said, v. 14. he would give him; the same, in effect, that Moses had given him, v. 7. Be strong, and of a good courage, v. 23. Joshua had now heard from God so much of the wickedness of the people whom he was to have the conduct of, as could not but be a discouragement to him; "Nay," says God, "how bad soever they are, thou shalt go through thy undertaking, for I will be with thee." Thou shalt put them into possession of Canaan; if they afterward by their sin throw themselves out of it again, that will be no fault of thine, nor any dishonour to thee, therefore be of good courage.

II. The solemn delivery of the book of the law to the Levites, to be deposited in the side of the ark, is here again related, v. 24. . 26. of which before, v. 9. Only they are here directed where to treasure up this precious original, not in the ark, there only the two tables were preserved, but in another box, by the side of the ark. It is probable that this was the very book that was found in the house of the Lord, (having been somehow or other misplaced,) in the days of Josiah, 2 Chron. 34. 14. and so perhaps the following words here, that it may be a witness against thee, may particularly point at that event, which happened so long after; for the finding of this very book occasioned the public reading of it by Josiah himself, for a witness against a people who were then almost ripe for their ruin by the Babylonians.

III. The song which follows, in the next chapter, is here delivered to Moses, and by him to the people. He wrote it, first, v. 22. as the Spirit of God indited it, and then spoke it in the ears of all the congregation, v. 30. and taught it them, v. 22. that is, gave out copies of it, and ordered the people to learn it by heart.

It was delivered by word of mouth first, and afterward in writing, to the elders and officers, as the representatives of their respective tribes, v. 28. by them to be transmitted to their several families and households. It is delivered to them with a solemn appeal to heaven and earth, concerning the fair warning which was given them by it, of the fatal consequences of their apostacy from God; and with a declaration of the little joy and little hope Moses had in and concerning them.

1. He declares what little joy he had had of them while he was with them, v. 27. It is not in a passion that he says, I know thy rebellion, (as once he said it unadvisedly, Hear now, ye rebels,) but it is the result of a long acquaintance with them, ye have been rebellious against the Lord. Their rebellions against himself he makes no mention of, those he had long since forgiven and forgotten; but their rebellions against God they must be made to hear of, that they may be ever repented of, and never repeated.

2. What little hopes he had of them, now that he was leaving them. From what God had now said to him, v. 16. more than from his own experience of them, though that was discouraging enough, he tells them, v. 29. I know that after my death you will utterly corrupt yourselves. Many a sad thought, no doubt, it occasioned to this good man, to foresee the apostacy and ruin of a people he had taken so much pains with, in order to do them good, and make them happy; but this was his comfort, that he had done his duty, and that God would be glorified, if not in their settlement, in their dispersion. Thus our Lord Jesus, a little before his death, foretold the rise of false Christs and false prophets, Matth. 24. 24. notwithstanding which, and all the apostacies of the later times, we may be confident that the gates of hell shall not prevail against the church, for the foundation of God stands sure.

CHAP. XXXII.

In this chapter we have, I. The song which Moses, by the appointment of God, delivered to the children of Israel, for a standing admonition to them to take heed of forsaking God. This takes up most of the chapter. In which we have, 1. The preface, v. 1, 2. 2. A high character of God, and, in opposition to that, a bad character of the people of Israel, v. 3. . 6. 3. A rehearsal of the great things God had done for them, and, in opposition to that, an account of their ill carriage toward him, v. 7. . 18. 4. A prediction of the wasting destroying judgments which God would bring upon them for their sins, in which God is here justified by the many aggravations of their impieties, v. 19. . 33. 5. A promise of the destruction of their enemies and oppressors at last, and the glorious deliverance of a remnant of Israel, v. 36. . 43. II. The exhortation with which Moses delivered this song to them, v. 44. . 47. III. The orders God gives to Moses to go up to mount Nebo and die, v. 48. . 52.

2. My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass: 3. Because I will publish the name of the Lord: ascribe ye greatness unto our God. 4. He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right is he. 5. They have corrupted themselves, their spot is not the spot of his children: they are a perverse and crooked generation. 6. Do ye thus requite the Lord, O foolish people and unwise? is not he thy father that hath bought thee? hath he not made thee, and established thee?

Here is,

I. A commanding preface or introduction to this song of Moses, v. 1, 2. He begins, 1. With a solemn appeal to heaven and earth concerning the truth and importance of what he was about to say, and the justice of the divine proceedings against a rebellious and backsliding people, for he had said, ch. 31. 28. that he would in this song call heaven and earth to record against them. Heaven and earth would sooner hear than this perverse and unthinking people; for they revolt not from their obedience to their Creator, but continue to this day, according to his ordinances, as his servants, Ps. 119. 89. . 91. and therefore will rise up in judgment against rebellious Israel. Heaven and earth will be witness against sinners, witnesses of the warning given them, and of their refusal to take the warning; see Job, 20. 27. the heaven shall reveal his iniquity, and the earth shall rise up against him. Or, heaven and earth are here put for the inhabitants of both, angels and men: both shall agree to justify God in his proceedings against Israel, and to declare his righteousness, Ps. 50. 6. See Rev. 19. 1, 2. 2. He begins with a solemn application of what he was about to say to the people, v. 2. My doctrine shall drop as the rain. (1.) "It shall be a beating sweeping rain, to the rebellious;" so one of the Chaldee paraphrasts expounds the first clause. Rain is sometimes sent for judgment, witness that with which the world was deluged; and so the word of God, as to some it is reviving and refreshing, and a savour of life unto life, so to others it is terrifying and killing, and a savour of death unto death. (2.) It shall be as a sweet and comfortable dew to those who are rightly prepared to receive it. Observe, [1.] The subject of this song is doctrine; he had given them a song of praise and thanksgiving, Exod. 15. but this is a song of instruction, for in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, we are not only to give glory to God, but to teach and admonish one another, Col. 3. 16. Hence many of David's psalms are intitled Maschil, to give instruction. [2.] This doctrine is fitly compared to rain and showers, which come from above, to make the earth fruitful, and accomplish that for which they are sent, Isa. 55. 10, 11. and depend not upon the wisdom or will of man, Mic. 5. 7. It is a mercy to have this rain come often upon us, and our duty to drink it in, Heb. 6. 7. [3.] He promises that his doctrine shall drop and distil as the dew, and the small rain, which descend silently, and without noise. The word preached is then likely to profit, when it comes gently, and sweetly insinuates itself into the hearts and affections of the hearers. [4.] He bespeaks their acceptance and entertainment of it, and that it might be as sweet, and pleasant, and welcome, to them, as rain to the thirsty earth, Ps. 72. 6. And the word of God is then likely to do us good, when it is thus acceptable. [5.] The learned Bishop Patrick understands it as a prayer, that his words, which were sent from heaven to them, might sink into their hearts, and soften them, as the rain softens the earth, and so make them fruitful in obedience.

II. An awful declaration of the greatness and righteousness of God, v. 3, 4. He begins with this, and lays it down as his first principle, 1. To preserve the honour of God, that no reproach might be cast upon him for the sake of the wickedness of his people Israel: how wicked and corrupt soever they are who are called by his name, he is just and right, and all that is good, and is not to be thought the worse of for their badness. 2. To aggravate the wickedness of Israel, who knew and worshipped such a holy God, and yet were themselves so unholy. And, 3. To justify God in his dealings with them; we must abide by it, that God is righteous, even when his judgments are a great deep, Jer. 12. 1. Ps. 36. 6.

I. GIVE ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth

Moses here sets himself to publish the name of the Lord, v. 3. that Israel, knowing what a God he is whom they had avouched for their's, might never be such fools as to exchange him for a false god, a dunghill-god. He calls upon them therefore to ascribe greatness to him. It will be of great use to us for the preventing of sin, and the preserving of us in the way of our duty, always to keep up high and honourable thoughts of God, and to take all occasions to express them. Ascribe greatness to our God. We cannot add to his greatness, for it is infinite; but we must acknowledge it, and give him the glory of it.

Now, when Moses would set forth the greatness of God, he does it, not by explaining his eternity and immensity, or describing the brightness of his glory in the upper world, but, by shewing the faithfulness of his word, the perfection of his works, and the wisdom and equity of all the administrations of his government; for in these his glory shines most clear to us, and these are the things revealed concerning him, which belong to us and our children, v. 4. (1.) He is the Rock. So he is called six times in this chapter, and the LXX all along translate it Θεός, God. The learned Mr. Hugh Broughton reckons, that God is called the Rock eighteen times (besides in this chapter) in the Old Testament, (though in some places we translate it, strength;) and charges it therefore upon the Papists, that they make St. Peter a god, when they make him the rock on which the church is built. God is the Rock, for he is in himself immutable and immovable, and he is to all that seek him, and fly to him, an impenetrable Shelter, and to all that trust in him, an everlasting Foundation. (2.) His work is perfect. His work of creation was so, all very good; his works of providence are so, or will be so in due time, and, when the mystery of God shall be finished, the perfection of his works will appear to all the world; nothing that God does can be mended, Eccl. 3. 14. God was now perfecting what he had promised and begun for his people Israel, and from the perfection of this work they must take occasion to give him the glory of the perfection of all his works. The best of men's works are imperfect, they have their flaws and defects, and are left unfinished: but as for God, his work is perfect; if he begin, he will make an end. (3.) All his ways are judgment. The ends of his ways are all righteous, and he is wise in the choice of the means in order to those ends. Judgment signifies both prudence and justice. The ways of the Lord are right, Hos. 14. 9. (4.) He is a God of truth; whose word we may take and rely upon, for he cannot lie, who is faithful to all his promises, nor shall his threatenings fall to the ground. (5.) He is without iniquity; one who never cheated any that trusted in him, never wronged any that appealed to his justice, nor ever was hard upon any that cast themselves upon his mercy. (6.) Just and right is he. As he will not wrong any, by punishing them more than they deserve, so he will not fail to recompense all those that serve him, or suffer for him. He is indeed just and right; for he will effectually take care that none shall lose by him. Now, what a bright and amiable idea does this one verse give us of the God whom we worship! and what reason have we then to love him and fear him, to live a life of delight in him, dependence on him, and devotedness to him! This is our Rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him, nor can there be, Ps. 92. 15.

III. A high charge exhibited against the Israel of God, whose character was in all respects the reverse of that of the God of Israel, v. 5. 1. They have corrupted themselves. Or, It has corrupted itself; the body of the people has: the whole head sick, and the whole heart faint. God did not corrupt them, for just and right is he; but they are themselves the sole authors of their own sin and ruin; and both are included in this word. They have debauched themselves: for every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust. And they have destroyed themselves, Hos. 13. 9. If thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear the guilt and grief, Prov. 9. 12. 2. Their spot is not the spot of his children. Even God's children have their spots, while they are in this imperfect state: for if we say, We have no sin, no spot, we deceive ourselves. But the sin of Israel was none of those; it was not an infirmity which they strove against, watched and prayed against, but an evil which their hearts were fully set in them to do: For, 3. They were a perverse and crooked generation, that were acted by a spirit of contradiction, and therefore would do what was forbidden, because it was forbidden; would set up their own humour and fancy in opposition to the will of God, were impatient of reproof, hated to be reformed, and went on proudly in the way of their heart. The Chaldee paraphrase reads this verse thus: They have scattered, or changed, themselves, and not him, even the children that served idols; a generation that has depraved its own works, and alienated itself. Idolaters cannot hurt God, or do any damage to his works, or make him a stranger to this world. See Job, 35. 6. No, all the hurt they do is to themselves and their own works. The learned Bishop Patrick gives another reading of it, Did he do him any hurt? That is, "Is God the rock to be blamed for the evils that should befall Israel? No, His children are their blot," that is, "All the evil that comes upon them is the fruit of their children's wickedness; for the whole generation of them is crooked and perverse. All that are ruined, ruin themselves; they die, because they will die."

IV. A pathetic expostulation with this provoking people for their ingratitude, v. 6. Do ye thus requite the Lord? Surely you will not hereafter be so base and disingenuous in your carriage toward him as you have been." 1. He reminds them of the obligations God had laid upon them to serve him, and to cleave to him. He had been a Father to them, had begotten them, fed them, carried them, nursed them, and borne their manners; and would they spurn at the bowels of a Father? He had bought them; had been at a vast expence of miracles to bring them out of Egypt: had given men for them, and people for their life, Isa. 43. 4. Is not he thy Father, thy Owner, (so some,) that has an incontestable propriety in thee? and the ox knoweth his owner. "He has made thee, and brought thee into being; established thee, and kept thee in being: Has he not done so? Can you deny the engagements you lie under to him, in consideration of the great things he has done and designed for you?" And are not our obligations, as baptized Christians, equally great and strong to our Creator that made us, our Redeemer that bought us, and our Sanctifier that has established us? 2. From hence he infers the evil of deserting him and rebelling against him. For, (1.) It was base ingratitude. Do ye thus requite the Lord? Are these the returns you make him for all his favours to you? The powers you have from him, will you employ them against him? See Mic. 6. 3, 4. John, 10. 32. This is such monstrous villany, as all the world will cry shame on; call a man ungrateful, and you can call him no worse. (2.) It was prodigious madness; O foolish people and unwise. "Fools, and double fools; who has bewitched you? Gal. 3. 1. "Fools indeed, to disoblige one on whom you have such a necessary dependence! To forsake your own mercies for lying vanities!" Note, All wilful sinners especially sinners in Israel, are the most unwise and the most ungrateful people in the world.

7. Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations: ask thy father, and he will shew thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee. 8. When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. 9. For the LORD's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inhe-itance. 10. He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye. 11. As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings: 12. So the LORD alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him. 13. He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock; 14. Butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat; and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape.

Moses, having in general represented God to them as their great Benefactor, whom they were bound in gratitude to observe and obey, in these verses gives particular instances of God's kindness to them, and concern for them.

1. Some instances were ancient; and for proof of them he appeals to the records, v. 7. Remember the days of old, that is, "Keep in remembrance the history of those days, and of the wonderful providences of God concerning the old world, and concerning your ancestors Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; you will find a constant series of mercies attending them, and how long since things were working toward that which is now come to pass." Note, The authentic histories of ancient times are of singular use, and especially the history of the church in its infancy, both the Old-Testament and the New-Testament church.

2. Others were more modern; and for proof of them he appeals to their fathers and elders that were now alive and with them. Parents must diligently teach their children, not only the word of God, his laws, ch. 6. 7. and the meaning of his ordinances, Exod. 12. 26, 27. but his works also, and the methods of his providence. See Ps. 78. 3, 4, 6, 7. And the children should desire the knowledge of those things which will be of use to engage them to their duty, and to direct them in it.

Three things are here enlarged upon as instances of God's kindness to his people Israel, and strong obligations upon them never to forsake him.

1. The early designation of the land of Canaan for their inheritance; for herein it was a type and figure of our heavenly inheritance, that it was of old ordained and prepared in the divine counsels, v. 8. When the earth was divided among the sons of men, in the days of Peleg, after the flood, and each family had its lot, in which it must settle, and by degrees grow up into a nation, then God had Israel in his thoughts, and in his eye; for, designing this good land, into which they were now going, to be in due time an inheritance for them, he ordered that the posterity of Canaan, rather than any other of the families then in being, should be planted there in the mean time, to keep possession, as it were, till Israel was ready for it; because those families were under the curse of Noah, by which they were condemned to servitude and ruin, Gen. 9. 25. and therefore would be the more justly, honourably, easily, and effectually, rooted out, when the fulness of time was come that Israel should take possession. Thus he set the bounds of that people with an eye to the designed number of the children of Israel, that they might have just as much as would serve their turn. And some observe, that Canaan himself, with his eleven sons, Gen. 10. 15, &c. makes up just the number of the twelve tribes of Israel. Note, 1. The wisdom of God has appointed the bounds of men's habitation, and determined both the place and time of our living in the world, Acts, 17. 26. When he gave the earth to the children of men, Ps. 115. 16. it was not that every man might catch as he could; no, he divides to nations their inheritance, and will have every one to know his own, and not to invade another's property. 2. Infinite Wisdom has a vast reach, and designs before-hand what is brought to pass long after; Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning to the end, Acts, 15. 18. but they are not so to us, Ecl. 3. 11. The great God, in governing the world, and ordering the affairs of states and kingdoms, has a special regard to his church and people, and consults their good in all. See 2 Chron. 16. 9. and Isa. 45. 4. The Canaanites thought they had as good and sure a title to their land as any of their neighbours had to their's; but God intended that they should only be tenants, till the Israelites, their landlords, came. Thus God serves his own purposes of kindness to his people, by those that neither know him nor love him, who mean not so, neither doth their heart think so, Isa. 10. 7. Mic. 4. 12.

The reason given for the particular care God took for this people, so long before they were either born or thought of, (as I may say,) in our world, does yet more magnify the kindness, and make it obliging beyond expression, v. 9. for the Lord's portion is his people. All the world is his, he is Owner and Possessor of heaven and earth, but his church is his in a peculiar manner; it is his demesne, his vineyard, his garden enclosed: he has a particular delight in it, it is the beloved of his soul, in it he walks, he dwells, it is his rest for ever. He has a particular concern for it, keeps it as the apple of his eye; he has particular expectations from it, as a man has from his portion; has a much greater rent of honour, glory, and worship, from that distinguished remnant, than from all the world besides. That God should be his people's portion is easy to be accounted for, for he is their joy and felicity; but how they should be his portion, who neither needs them, nor can be benefited by them, must be resolved into the wondrous condescensions of free grace. Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thine eyes so to call and count them.

11. The forming of them into a people, that they might be fit to enter upon this inheritance, like an heir at age, at the time appointed of the Father. And herein also Canaan was a figure of the heavenly inheritance: for as it was from eternity proposed and designed for all God's spiritual Israel, so they are, in time, (and it is a work of time,) fitted and made meet for it, Col. 1. 12. The deliverance of Israel out of slavery, by the destruction of their oppressors, was attended with so many wonders obvious to sense, and had been so often spoken of, that it needed not to be mentioned in this song: but the gracious works God wrought upon them would be less taken notice of than the glorious works he had wrought for them, and therefore he chooses rather to advert to them. A great deal was done to mold this people, to cast them into some shape, and to fit them for the great things designed them in the land of promise; and it is here most elegantly described.

1. He found him in a desert land, v. 10. This refers, no doubt, to the wilderness through which God brought them to Canaan, and in which he took so much pains with them; it is called the church in the wilderness, Acts, 7. 38. There it was born, and nursed, and educated, that all might appear to be divine and from heaven, since they had there no communication with any part of this earth either for food or learning. But because he is said to find them there, it seems designed also to represent both the bad state and the bad character of that people, when God began first to appear for them. (1.) Their condition was forlorn, Egypt was to them a desert land, and a waste howling wilderness, for they were bond-slaves in it, and cried by reason of their oppression, and were perfectly bewildered, and at a loss for relief; there God found them, and thence he fetched them. And, (2.) Their disposition was very unpromising; so ignorant were the generality of them in divine things, so stupid and unapt to receive the impressions of them, so peevish and humoursome, so froward and quarrelsome, and withal so strangely addicted to the idolatries of Egypt, that they might well be said to be found in a desert land; for one might as reasonably expect a crop of corn from a barren wilderness, as any good fruit of service to God from a people of such a character. Those that are renewed and sanctified by grace, should often remember what they were by nature.

2. He led him about and instructed him. When God had them in the wilderness, he did not bring them directly to Canaan, but made them go a great compass round, and so he instructed them; that is, (1.) By this means he took time to instruct them, and gave them commandments as they were able to receive them. Those whose business it is to instruct others, must not expect it will be done of a sudden; learners must have time to learn. (2.) By this means he tried their faith and patience, and dependence upon God, and inured them to the hardships of the wilderness, and so instructed them. Every stage had something in it that was instructive; even when he chastened them, he thereby taught them out of his law. It is said, Ps. 107. 7. that he led them forth by the right way; and yet here, that he led them about; for God always leads his people the right way, however to us it may seem about: so that the furthest way about proves, if not the nearest way, yet the best way home to Canaan. How God instructed them, is explained long after, Neh. 9. 13. Thou gavest them right judgments and true laws, good statutes and commandments; and especially, v. 20. Thou gavest them also thy good Spirit to instruct them; and he instructs effectually. We may well imagine how unfit that people had been for Canaan, had they not first gone through the discipline of the wilderness.

3. He kept him as the apple of his eye, with all the care and tenderness that could be, from the malignant influences of an open sky and air, and all the perils of an inhospitable desert. The pillar of a cloud and fire was both a guide and a guard to them.

4. He did that for them which the eagle does for her nest of young ones, v. 11, 12. The similitude was touched, Exod. 19. 4. I bare you on eagles' wings; here it is enlarged upon. The eagle is observed to have a strong affection for her young, and to shew it, not only as other creatures, by protecting them and making provision for them, but by educating them, and teaching them to fly. For that purpose, she stirs them out of the nest where they lie dozing, flutters over them, to shew them how they must use their wings, and then accustoms them to fly upon her wings till they have learned to fly upon their own. This, by the way, is an example to parents to train up their children to business, and not to indulge them in idleness and the love of ease. God did thus by Israel; when they were in love with their slavery, and loath to leave it, God, by Moses, stirred them up to aspire after liberty, and many a time kept them from returning to the house of bondage again. He carried them out of Egypt, led them into the wilderness, and now at length had led them through it. The Lord alone did lead him, he needed not any assistance, nor did he take any to be partner with him in the achievement; which was a good reason why they should serve the Lord only, and no other, so much as in partnership, much less in rivalry with him. There was no strange god with him to contribute to Israel's salvation, and therefore there should be none to share in Israel's homage and adoration, Ps. 81. 9.

III. The settling of them in a good land. This was done in part already, in the happy planting of the two tribes and a half, an earnest of what would speedily and certainly be done for the rest of the tribes.

1. They were blessed with glorious victories over their enemies; v. 13. He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that is, he brought him on with conquest, and brought him home with triumph. He rode over the high places or strong holds that were kept against him; sat in ease and honour upon the fruitful hills of Canaan; in Egypt they looked mean, and were so, in poverty and disgrace; but in Canaan they looked great, and were so, advanced and enriched, they rode in state, as a people whom the King of kings delighted to honour.

2. With great plenty of all good things. Not only the ordinary increase of the field, but, which was uncommon, Honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock. Which may refer, either, (1.) To their miraculous supply of fresh water out of the rock that followed them in the wilderness; which is called honey and oil, because the necessity they were reduced to, made it as sweet and acceptable as honey and oil at another time. Or, (2.) To the great abundance of honey and oil they should find in Canaan, even in those parts that were least fertile. The rocks of Canaan should yield a better increase than the fields and meadows of other countries. Other productions of Canaan are mentioned, v. 14. Such abundance, and such variety of wholesome food, (and every thing the best in its kind,) that every meal might be a feast, if they pleased. Excellent bread, made of the best corn, here called the kidneys of the wheat; (for a grain of wheat is not much unlike a kidney;) butter and milk in abundance; the flesh of cattle well fed; and for their drink, no worse than the pure blood of the grape. So indulgent a Father was God to them, and so kind a Benefactor. Ainsworth makes the plenty of good things in Canaan to be a figure of the fruitfulness of Christ's kingdom, and the heavenly comforts of his word and Spirit; for the children of his kingdom he has butter and milk, the sincere milk of the word; and strong meat for strong men, with the wine that makes glad the heart.

15. But Jeshurun waxed fat, and kicked: thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness; then he forsook God, which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation. 16. They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, with abominations provoked they him to anger. 17. They sacrificed unto devils, not to God; to gods whom they knew not, to new gods that came newly up, whom your fathers feared not. 18. Of the Rock that begat thee thou art unmindful, and hast forgotten God that formed thee.

We have here a description of the apostacy of Israel from God, which would shortly come to pass, and which already they had a disposition to. One would have thought that a people under so many obligations to their God, in duty, gratitude, and interest, should never have turned from him; but, alas! they turned aside quickly.

Here are two great instances of their wickedness, and each of them amounted to an apostacy from God.

I. Security and sensuality, pride and insolence, and the other common abuses of plenty and prosperity, v. 15. These people were called Jeshurun, an upright people, so some; a seeing people, so others: but they soon lost the reputation both of their knowledge and of their righteousness; for, being well fed, 1. They waxed fat, and grew thick, that is, they indulged themselves in all manner of luxury and gratifications of their appetites, as if they had nothing to do but to make provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts of it. They grew fat, that is, they grew big and unwieldy, unmindful of business, and unfit for it; dull and stupid, careless and senseless; and this was the effect of their plenty. Thus the prosperity of fools destroys them, Prov. 1. 32. Yet this was not the worst of it, 2. They kicked: they grew proud and insolent, and lifted up the heel even against God himself; if God rebuked them, either by his prophets or by his providence, they kicked against the goad, as an untamed heifer, or a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke, and in their rage persecuted the prophets, and flew in the face of Providence itself. And thus he forsook God that made him, (not paying due respects to his Creator, nor answering the ends of his creation,) and put an intolerable contempt upon the Rock of his salvation, as if he were not indebted to him for any past favours, nor had any dependence upon him for the future. Those that make a god of themselves, and a god of their bellies, in pride and wantonness, and cannot bear to be told of it, certainly thereby forsake God, and shew how lightly they esteem him.

II. Idolatry was the great instance of their apostacy, and which the former led them to, as it made them sick of their religion, self-willed, and fond of changes. Observe,

1. What sort of gods they chose and offered sacrifice to, when they forsook the God that made them, v. 16, 17. This aggravated their sin, that those very services which they should have done to the true God, they did, (1.) To strange gods, that could not pretend to have done them any kindness, or laid them under any obligation to them; gods that they had no knowledge of, nor could expect any benefit by, for they were strangers. Or, they are called strange gods, because they were other than the one only true God to whom they were betrothed, and ought to have been faithful. (2.) To new gods, that came newly up; for even in religion, the antiquity of which is one of its honours, vain minds have strangely affected novelty, and, in contempt of the Ancient of days, have been fond of new gods. A new god! Can there be a more monstrous absurdity? Would we find the right way to rest, we must ask for the good old way, Jer. 6. 16. It was true, their fathers had worshipped other gods, Josh. 24. 2. and perhaps it had been some little excuse if the children had returned to them; but to serve new gods whom their fathers feared not, and to like them the better for being new, was to open a door to endless idolatries. (3.) They were such as were no gods at all, but mere counterfeits and pretenders; their names, the inventions of men's fancies, and their images, the work of men's hands. Nay, (4.) They were devils. So far from being gods, fathers, and benefactors to mankind, they really were destroyers; so the word signifies; such as aimed to do mischief; if there were any spirits or invisible powers that possessed their idol-temples and images, they were evil spirits and malignant powers, whom yet they did not need to worship for fear they should hurt them, as they say the Indians do; for they that faithfully worship God are out of the devil's reach: nay, the devil can destroy those only that sacrifice to him. How mad are idolaters, who forsake the Rock of salvation, to run themselves upon the rock of perdition!

2. What a great affront this was to Jehovah their God.

(1.) It was justly interpreted a forgetting of him, v. 18. Of the Rock that begat thee thou art unmindful. Mindfulness of God would prevent sin, but, when the world is served and the flesh indulged, God is forgotten; and can any thing be more base and unworthy than to forget the God that is the Author of our being, by whom we subsist, and in whom we live and move? And see what comes of it, Isa. 17. 10, 11. Because thou hast forgotten the God of thy salvation, and hast not been mindful of the Rock of thy strength, though the strange slips be pleasant plants at first, yet the harvest at last will be a heap in the day of grief and of desperate sorrow. There is nothing got by forgetting God.

(2.) It was justly resented as an inexcusable offence. They provoked him to jealousy and to anger, (v. 16.) for their idols were abominations to him. See here God's displeasure against idols, whether they be set up in the heart, or in the sanctuary. [1.] He is jealous of them, as rivals with him for the throne in the heart. [2.] He hates them, as enemies to his crown and government. [3.] He is, and will be, very angry with those that have any respect or affection for them. Those consider not what they do that provoke God; for who knows the power of his anger?

19. And when the LORD saw it, he abhorred them, because of the provoking of his sons, and of his daughters. 20. And he said, I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be: for they are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith. 21. They have moved me to jealousy with that which is not god; they have provoked me to anger with their vanities: and I will move them to jealousy with those which are not a people; I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation. 22. For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains. 23. I will heap mischiefs upon them; I will spend mine arrows upon them. 24. They shall be burnt with hunger, and devoured with burning heat, and with bitter destruction: I will also send the teeth of beasts upon them, with the poison of serpents of the dust. 25. The sword without, and terror within, shall destroy both the young man and the virgin, the suckling also with the man of gray hairs.

The method of this song follows the method of the predictions in the foregoing chapter, and therefore, after the revolt of Israel from God, described in the foregoing verses, here follow immediately the resolves of divine justice concerning them; we deceive ourselves, if we think that God will be thus mocked by a foolish faithless people, that play fast and loose with him.

I. He had delighted in them, but now he would reject them with detestation and disdain, v. 19. When the Lord saw their treachery, and folly, and base ingratitude, he abhorred them, he despised them. So some read it. Sin makes us odious in the sight of the holy God; and no sinners are so loathsome to him, as those that he has called, and that have called themselves, his sons and his daughters, and yet have been provoking to him. Note, The nearer any are to God in profession, the more noisome are they to him, if they are defiled in a sinful way, Ps. 106. 39, 40.

II. He had given them the tokens of his presence with them, and his favour to them; but now he would withdraw, and hide his face from them, v. 20. His hiding his face signifies his great displeasure; they had turned the back upon God, and now God would turn his back upon them; (Compare Jer. 18. 17. with Jer. 2. 27.) but here it denotes also the slowness of God's proceedings against them in a way of judgment. They began in their apostacy with omissions of good, and so proceeded to commissions of evil. In like manner, God will first suspend his favours, and let them see what the issue of that will be, what a Friend they lose when they provoke God to depart, and will try whether that will bring them to repentance. Thus we find God hiding himself, as it were, in expectation of the event, Isa. 57. 17. To justify himself in leaving them, he shews that they were such as there was no dealing with: for, 1. They were froward, and a people that could not be pleased; or, obstinate in sin, and that could not be convinced and reclaimed. 2. They were faithless, and a people that could not be trusted. When he saved them, and took them into covenant, he said, Surely they are children that will not lie, Isa. 63. 8. but when they proved otherwise, children in whom is no faith, they deserved to be abandoned, and that the God of truth should have no more to do with them.

III. He had done every thing to make them easy, and to please them, but now he would do that against them which should be most vexatious to them. The punishment here answers the sin, v. 21. 1. They had provoked God with despicable deities, which were not gods at all, but vanities; creatures of their own imagination, that could not pretend either to merit, or to repay the respects of their worshippers; the more vain and vile the gods were after which they went a-whoring, the greater was the offence to that great and good God whom they set them up in competition with, and contradiction to. This put two great evils into their idolatry, Jer. 2. 13. 2. God would therefore plague them with despicable enemies, that were worthless, weak, and inconsiderable, and not deserving the name of a people, which was a great mortification to them, and aggravated the oppressions they groaned under. The more base the people were that tyrannised over them, the more barbarous they would be; none so insolent as a beggar on horseback; besides that it would be infamous to Israel, who had so often triumphed over great and mighty nations, to be themselves trampled upon by the weak and foolish, and to come under the curse of Canaan, who was to be a servant of servants. But God can make the weakest instrument a scourge to the strongest sinner; and they that by sin insult their mighty Creator, are justly insulted by the meanest of their fellow-creatures. This was remarkably fulfilled in the days of the judges, when they were sometimes oppressed by the very Canaanites themselves, whom they had subdued, as Judg. 4. 2. But the apostle applies it to the conversion of the Gentiles, who had been not a people in covenant with God, and foolish in divine things, yet were brought into the church, sorely to the grief of the Jews, who, upon all occasions, shewed a great indignation at it, which was both their sin and their punishment, as envy always is, Rom. 10. 19.

IV. He had planted them in a good land, and replenished them with all good things; but now he would strip them of all their comforts, and bring them to ruin. The judgments threatened are very terrible, v. 22. 25. 1. The fire of God's anger shall consume them, v. 22. Are they proud of their plenty? It shall burn up the increase of the earth. Are they confident of their strength? It shall destroy the very foundations of their mountains: there is no fence against the judgments of God, when they come with commission to lay all waste. It shall burn to the lowest hell, that is, it shall bring them to the very depth of misery in this world, which yet would be but a faint resemblance of the complete and endless misery of sinners in the other world. The damnation of hell (as our Saviour calls it) is the fire of God's anger, fastening upon the guilty conscience of a sinner, to its inexpressible and everlasting torment, Isa. 30. 33. 2. The arrows of God's judgments shall be spent upon them, till his quiver is quite exhausted, v. 23. The judgments of God, like arrows, fly swiftly, Ps. 64. 7. reaching those at a distance who flatter themselves with hopes of escaping them, Ps. 21. 8, 12. They come from an unseen hand, but wound mortally, for God never misses his mark, 1 Kings, 22. 34. The particular judgments here threatened, are, (1.) Famine, they shall be burnt, or parched with hunger. (2.) Pestilence and other diseases, here called burning heat, and bitter destruction. (3.) The insults of the inferior creatures; the teeth of beasts and the poison of serpents, v. 24. (4.) War and the fatal consequences of it, v. 25. [1.] Perpetual frights. When the sword is without, there cannot but be terror within; 2 Cor. 7. 5. without were fightings, within were fears: those who cast off the fear of God are justly exposed to the fear of enemies. [2.] Universal deaths; the sword of the Lord, when it is sent to lay all waste, will destroy without distinction; neither the strength of the young man, nor the beauty of the virgin, nor the innocency of the suckling, nor the gravity or infirmity of the man of gray hairs, will be their security from the sword, when it devours one as well as another. Such devastation does war make, especially when it is pushed on by men as ravenous as wild beasts, and as venomous as serpents, v. 24. See here what mischief sin does; and reckon those fools that make a mock at it.

26. I said, I would scatter them into corners, I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men: 27. Were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy, lest their adversaries should believe themselves strangely, and lest they should say, Our hand is high, and the LORD hath not done all this. 28. For they are a nation void of counsel, neither is there any understanding in them. 29. O that they were wise, that they understood this, that they would consider their latter end! 30. How should one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, except their Rock had sold them, and the LORD had shut them up? 31. For their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges. 32. For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah: their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter: 33. Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps. 34. Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up among my treasures? 35. To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence; their foot shall slide in due time: for the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste. 36. For the LORD shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth that their power is gone, and there is none shut up, or left. 37. And he shall say, Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted, 38. Which did eat the fat of their sacrifices, and drank the wine of their drink-offerings? let them rise up and help you, and be your protection.

After many terrible threatenings of deserved wrath and vengeance, we have here surprising intimations of mercy, undeserved mercy, which rejoices against judgment, and by which it appears that God has no pleasure in the death of sinners, but would rather they should turn and live.

I. In jealousy for his own honour, he will not make a full end of them, v. 26. 28. 1. It cannot be denied, but that they deserved to be utterly ruined, and that their remembrance should be made to cease from among men; so that the name of an Israelite should never be known but in history; for they were a nation void of counsel, v. 28. the most sottish inconsiderate people that ever were; that would not believe the glory of God, though they saw it, nor understand his loving-kindness, though they tasted it, and lived upon it. Of them who could cast off such a God, such a law, such a covenant, for vain and dunghill deities, it might truly be said, There is no understanding in them. 2. It had been an easy thing with God to ruin them, and blot out the remembrance of them; when the greatest part of them were cut off by the sword, it was but scattering the remnant into some remote obscure corners of the earth, where they should never have been heard of more, and the thing had been done. See Ezek. 5. 12. God can destroy those that are most strongly fortified, disperse those that are most closely united, and bury those names in perpetual oblivion that have been most celebrated. 3. Justice demanded it. I said, I would scatter them. It is fit they should be cut off from the earth, that have cut themselves off from their God; why should they not be dealt with according to their deserts? 4. Wisdom considered the pride and insolence of the enemy, which would take occasion, from the ruin of a people that had been so dear to God, and for whom he had done such great things, to reflect upon God, and to imagine, that, because they had got the better of Israel, they had carried the day against the God of Israel. The adversaries will say, Our hand is high; high indeed, when it has been too high for those whom God himself fought for; nor will they consider that the Lord has done all this, but will dream that they have done it in despite of him, as if the God of Israel were as weak and impotent, and as easily run down, as the pretended deities of other nations. 5. In consideration of this, Mercy prevails for the sparing of a remnant, and the saving of that unworthy people from utter ruin. I feared the wrath of the enemy. It is an expression after the manner of men; it is certain that God fears no man's wrath, but he acted in this matter as if he had feared it. Those few good people in Israel, that had a concern for the honour of God's name, feared the wrath of the enemy in this instance more than in any other, as Joshua, ch. 7. 9. and David often; and because they feared it, God himself is said to fear it. He needed not Moses to plead it with him, but reminded himself of it, What will the Egyptians say? Let all those whose hearts tremble for the ark of God and his Israel, comfort themselves with this, that God will work for his own name, and will not suffer it to be profaned and polluted.

how much soever we deserve to be disgraced, God will never disgrace the throne of his glory.

II. In concern for their welfare, he earnestly desires their conversion; and, in order to that, their serious consideration of their latter end, v. 29. Observe, 1. Though God had pronounced them a foolish people, and of no understanding, yet he wishes they were wise, as Dent. 5. 29. Oh that there were such a heart in them! and Ps. 94. 8. Ye fools, when will ye be wise? God delights not to see sinners ruin themselves, but desires they will help themselves; and, if they will, he is ready to help them. 2. It is a great piece of wisdom, and will contribute much to the return of sinners to God, seriously to consider the latter end, or the future state. It is here meant particularly of that which God by Moses had foretold concerning this people in the latter days: but it may be applied more generally. We ought to understand, and consider, (1.) The latter end of life, and the future state of the soul. To think of death, as our removal from a world of sense to a world of spirits, the final period of our state of trial and probation, and our entrance upon an unchangeable state of recompence and retribution. (2.) The latter end of sin, and the future state of those that live and die in it. Oh that men would consider the happiness they will lose, and the misery they will certainly plunge themselves into! If they go on still in their trespasses, what will be in the end thereof, Jer. 5. 31. Jerusalem forgot this, and therefore came down wonderfully, Lam. 1. 9.

III. He calls to mind the great things he had done for them formerly, as a reason why he should not quite cast them off. This seems to be the meaning of that, v. 30, 31. "How should one Israelite have been too hard for a thousand Canaanites, as they have been many a time, but that God, who is greater than all gods, fought for them?" And so it corresponds with that, Isa. 63. 10, 11. When he was turned to be their enemy, as here, and fought against them for their sins, then he remembered the days of old, saying, Where is he that brought them out of the sea? So here, his arm begins to awake as in the days of old against the wrath of the enemy, Ps. 138. 7. There was a time when the enemies of Israel were sold by their own rock, that is, their own idol-gods, who could not help them, but betray them, because Jehovah, the God of Israel, had shut them up as sheep for the slaughter. For the enemies themselves must own that their gods were a very unequal match for the God of Israel. For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, v. 32, 33. This must be meant of the enemies of Israel, who therefore fell so easily before the sword of Israel, because they were ripe for ruin, and the measure of their iniquity was full.

Yet these verses may be understood of the strange prevalency of the enemies of Israel against them, when God made use of them as the rod of his anger, Isa. 10. 5, 6. "How should one Canaanite chase a thousand Israelites," (as it is threatened against those that trust to Egypt for help, Isa. 30. 17. One thousand shall flee at the rebuke of one.) "unless Israel's Rock had deserted them, and given them up?" For otherwise, however they may impute their power to their gods, Hab. 1. 11. as the Philistines imputed their victory to Dagon; it is certain the enemies' rock could not have prevailed against the Rock of Israel; God would soon have subdued their enemies, (Ps. 81. 14.) but that the wickedness of Israel delivered them into their hands. For their vine, that is, Israel's, is of the vine of Sodom, v. 32, 33. They were planted a choice vine, wholly a right seed, but by sin were become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, Jer. 2. 21. and not only transcribed the iniquity of Sodom, but outdid it, Ezek. 16. 48. God called them his vineyard, his pleasant plant, Isa. 5. 7. But their fruits were, 1. Very offensive, and displeasing to God, bitter as gall. 2. Very malignant, and pernicious one to another, like the cruel venom of asps. Some understand this of punishment; their sin would be bitterness in the latter end, 2 Sam. 2. 26. it would bite like a serpent, and sting like an adder, Job, 20. 14. Prov. 23. 32.

IV. He resolves upon the destruction of those, at last, that had been their persecutors and oppressors. When the cup of trembling goes round, the king of Babel shall pledge it at last, Jer. 25. 26. and see Isa. 51. 22, 23. The day is coming, when the judgment, that began at the house of God, shall end with the sinner and ungodly, 1 Pet. 4. 17, 18.

God will in due time bring down the church's enemies.

1. In displeasure against their wickedness, which he takes notice of, and keeps an account of, v. 34, 35. Is not this implacable fury of their's, against Israel, laid up in store with me, to be reckoned for hereafter, when it shall be made to appear, that to me belongs vengeance? Some understand it of the sin of Israel; especially their persecuting the prophets, which was laid up in store against them, from the blood of righteous Abel, Matth. 23. 35. However, it teaches us, that the wickedness of the wicked is all laid up in store with God. (1.) He observes it, Ps. 90. 8. He knows both what the vine is, and what the grapes: what the temper of the mind, and what the actions of the life. (2.) He keeps a record of it, both in his own omniscience, and in the sinner's conscience; and this is sealed up among his treasures, which denotes both safety and secrecy: These books cannot be lost; nor will they be opened till the great day. See Hos. 13. 12. (3.) He often delays the punishment of sin for a great while, it is laid up in store, till the measure be full, and the day of divine patience be expired. See Job, 21. 29, 30. (4.) There is a day of reckoning coming, when all the treasures of guilt and wrath will be broken up, and the sin of sinners shall surely find them out. [1.] The thing itself will certainly be done, for the Lord is a God to whom vengeance belongs, and therefore he will repay, Isa. 59. 18. This is quoted by the apostle, to shew the severity of God's wrath against those that revolt from the faith of Christ, Heb. 10. 30. [2.] It will be done in due time; in the best time; nay, it will be done in a short time. The day of their calamity is at hand: and though it may seem to tarry, it lingers not, it slumbers not, but makes haste. In one hour shall the judgment of Babylon come.

2. He will do it in compassion to his own people, who, though they had greatly provoked him, yet stood in relation to him, and their misery appealed to his mercy, v. 36. The Lord shall judge his people, that is, judge for them against their enemies, plead their cause, and break the yoke of oppression under which they had long groaned, repenting himself for his servants; not changing his mind, but changing his way, and fighting for them, as he had fought against them, when he sees that their power is gone. This plainly points at the deliverances God wrought for Israel, by the judges, out of the hands of those to whom he had sold them for their sins; (see Judg. 2. 11. . 19.) and how his soul was grieved for the misery of Israel, Judg. 10. 16. And this when they were reduced to the last extremity; God helped them when they could not help themselves; for there was none shut up or left; that is, none that dwelt either in cities or walled towns, in which they were shut up, nor any that dwelt in scattered houses in the country, in which they were left at a distance from neighbours. Note, God's time to appear for the deliverance of his people, is, when things are at the worst with them. God tries his people's faith, and stirs up prayer, by letting things go to the worst, and then magnifies his own power, and fills the faces of his enemies with shame, and the hearts of his people with so much the greater joy, by rescuing them out of extremity, as brands out of the burning.

3. He will do it in contempt, and to the reproach, of the idol-gods, v. 37, 38. Where are their gods? Two ways it may be understood; (1.) That God would do that for his people, which the idols they had served could not do for them. They had forsaken God, and been very liberal in their sacrifices to idols; had brought to their altars the fat of their sacrifices, and the wine of their drink-offerings, which they supposed their deities to feed upon, and on which they feasted with them. "Now," says God, "will these gods you have made your court to, at so great an expence, help you in your distress, and so repay you for all your charges in their service? Go get you to the gods you have served, and let them deliver you," Judg. 10. 14. This is intended to convince them of their folly in forsaking a God that could help them, for those that could not, and so to bring them to repentance, and qualify them for deliverance. When the adulteress shall follow after her lovers, and not overtake them, pray to her idols, and receive no kindness from them, then thou shalt say, I will go and return to my first husband, Hos. 2. 7. See Isa. 16. 12. Jer. 2. 27, 28. Or, (2.) That God would do that against his enemies, which the idols they had served could not save them from. Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar boldly challenged the God of Israel to deliver his worshippers, Isa. 37. 10. Dan. 3. 15. and he did deliver them, to the confusion of their enemies. But the God of Israel challenged Bel and Nebo to deliver their worshippers, to rise up and help them, and to be their protection, Isa. 47. 12, 13. but they were so far from helping them, that they themselves, that is, their images, which was all that was of them, went into captivity, Isa. 46. 1, 2. Note, Those who trust to any rock but God, will find it sand in the day of their distress; it will fail them then, when they most need it.

39. See now that I, even I, am he, and there is no god with me: I kill, and I make alive; I wound, and I heal: neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand. 40. For I lift up my hand to heaven, and say, I live for ever. 41. If I whet my glittering sword, and mine hand take hold on judgment, I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me. 42. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh; and that with the blood of the slain and of the captives, from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy. 43. Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people: for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land, and to his people.

This conclusion of the song speaks three things:

I. Glory to God, v. 39. See now, upon the whole matter, that I, even I, am he. Learn this from the destruction of idolaters, and the inability of their idols to help them. The great God here demands the glory, 1. Of a self-existence; I, even I, am he. Thus Moses concludes with that name of God by which he was first made to know him, Exod. 4. 14. "I am that I am. I am he that I have been, that I will be, that I have promised to be, that I have threatened to be; all shall find me true to both." The Targum of Uzzielides paraphrases it thus, When the word of the Lord shall reveal himself to redeem his people, he shall say to all people, See, that I now am what I am, and have been, and I am what I will be: which we know very well how to apply to him, who said to John, I am he which is, and was, and is to come, Rev. 1. 8. These words, I, even I, am he, we meet often in those chapters of Isaiah, where God is encouraging his people to hope for their deliverance out of Babylon, Isa. 41. 4. — 43. 11, 13, 25. — 46. 4. 2. Of a sole supremacy; "There is no god with me. None to help with me, none to cope with me." See Isa. 43. 10, 11. 3. Of an absolute sovereignty, and universal agency; I kill, and I make alive, that is, All evil, and all good, come from his hand of providence, he forms both the light of life, and the darkness of death, Isa. 45. 7. Lam. 3. 37, 38. Or, he kills and wounds his enemies, but heals and makes alive his own people; kills and wounds with his judgments those that revolt from him, and rebel against him; but, when they return and repent, he heals them, and makes them alive with his mercy and grace. Or, it denotes his incontestable authority to dispose of all his creatures, and the beings he has given them, so as to serve his own purposes by them; whom he will, he slays, and whom he will, he keeps alive, when his judgments are abroad. Or, thus, Though he kill, yet he makes alive again; though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion, Lam. 3. 32. Though he have torn, he will heal us, Hos. 6. 1, 2. The Jerusalem Targum reads it, I kill those that are alive in this world, and make those alive in the other world that are dead. And some of the Jewish doctors themselves have observed, that death, and a life after it, that is, eternal life, is intimated in these words. 4. Of an irresistible power, which cannot be controuled; Neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand those that I have marked for destruction. As no exception can be made against the sentence of God's justice, so no escape can be made from the executions of his power.

II. Terror to his enemies, v. 40. . 42. Terror indeed to those that hate him, as all those do that serve other gods, that persist in wilful disobedience to the divine law, and that malign and persecute his faithful servants; these are they whom God will render vengeance to; those his enemies that will not have him to reign over them. In order to alarm such in time to repent and return to their allegiance, the wrath of God is here revealed from heaven against them, 1. The divine sentence is ratified with an oath, v. 40. He lifts up his hand to heaven, the habitation of his holiness; this was an ancient and very significant sign used in swearing, Gen. 14. 22. And, since he could swear by no greater, he swears by himself and his own life. Those are miserable without remedy, that have the word and oath of God against them. The Lord hath sworn, and will not repeat, that the sin of sinners shall be their ruin, if they go on in it. 2. Preparation is made for the execution; the glittering sword is whet. See Ps. 7. 12. It is a sword bathed in heaven, Isa. 34. 5. While the sword is in whetting, space is given to the sinner to repent and make his peace, which if he does not, the wound will be the deeper. And as the sword is whet, so the hand that is to wield it takes hold on judgment, with a resolution to go through with it. 3. The execution itself will be very terrible; the sword shall devour flesh in abundance, and the arrows be made drunk with blood, such vast quantities of it shall be shed; the blood of the slain in battle, and of the captives, to whom no quarter should be given, but who shall be put under military execution. When he begins revenge, he will make an end; for in this also his work is perfect. The critics are much perplexed with the last clause, From the beginning of revenges upon the enemy. The learned Bishop Patrick (that great master) thinks it may admit this reading, From the king to the slave of the enemies, Jer. 50. 35. . 37. When the sword of God's wrath is drawn, it will make bloody work, blood to the horse-bridles, Rev. 14. 20.

III. Comfort to his own people, v. 43. Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people. He concludes the song with words of joy; for in God's Israel there is a remnant whose end will be peace; God's people will rejoice at last, will rejoice everlastingly. Three things are here mentioned as matter of joy. 1. The enlarging of the church's bounds; the apostle applies the first words of this verse to the conversion of the Gentiles, Rom. 15. 10. Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people. See what the grace of God does in the conversion of souls, it brings them to rejoice with the people of God; for true religion brings us acquainted with true joy; so great a mistake are they under, that think it tends to make men melancholy. 2. The avenging of the church's controversies upon her adversaries. He will make inquisition for the blood of his servants, and it shall appear how precious it is to him, for they that spilt it shall have blood given them to drink. 3. The mercy God has in store for his church, and for all that belong to it; he will be merciful to his land, and to his people, that is, to all, every where, that fear and serve him. Whatever judgments are brought upon sinners, it shall go well with the people of God; in this let Jews and Gentiles rejoice together.

44. And Moses came and spake all the word of this song in the ears of the people, he, and Hoshea the son of Nun. 45. And Moses made an end of speaking all these words to all Israel: 46. And he said unto them, Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day, which ye shall command your children to observe to do, all the words of this law. 47. For it is not a vain thing for you; because it is your life: and through this thing ye shall prolong your days in the land, whither ye go over Jordan to possess it. 48. And the LORD spake unto Moses that self-same day, saying, 49. Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, that is over against Jericho; and behold the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel for a possession: 50. And die in the mount whither thou goest up, and be gathered unto thy people; as Aaron thy brother died in mount Hor, and was gathered unto his people: 51. Because ye trespassed against me among the children of Israel at the waters of Meribah-Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin; because ye sanctified me not in the midst of the children of Israel. 52. Yet thou shalt see the land before thee; but thou shalt not go thither unto the land which I give the children of Israel.

Here is,

I. The solemn delivery of this song to the children of Israel, v. 44, 45. Moses spake it to as many as could hear him, while Joshua, in another assembly, at the same time, delivered it to as many as his voice would reach. Thus coming to them from the mouth of both their governors, Moses, who was laying down the government, and Joshua, who was taking it up, they would see they were both in the same mind, that, though they changed their commander, there was no change in the divine command; Joshua, as well as Moses, would be a witness against them, if ever they forsook God.

II. An earnest charge to them to mind these and all the rest of the good words that Moses had said unto them. How earnestly does he long after them all, how very desirous that the word of God might make deep and lasting impressions upon them, how jealous over them with a godly jealousy, lest they should at any time let slip these great things; 1. The duties he charges upon them, are, (1.) Carefully to attend to these themselves; "Set your hearts both to the laws, and to the promises and threatenings; the blessings and curses, and now at last to this song. Let the mind be closely applied to the consideration of these things; be affected with them; be intent upon duty, and cleave to it with full purpose of heart." (2.) Faithfully to transmit these things to those that should come after them: "What interest you have in your children, or influence upon them, use it for this purpose; and command them (as your father Abraham did, Gen. 18. 19.) to observe to do all the words of this law." They that are good themselves, cannot but desire that their children may be so likewise; and that posterity may keep up religion in their day, and the entail of it may not be cut off. 2. The arguments he uses to persuade them to make religion their business, and to persevere in it, are, (1.) The vast importance of the things themselves which he had charged upon them, v. 47. "It is not a vain thing, because it is your life. It is not an indifferent thing, but of absolute necessity; it is not a trifle, but a matter of consequence, a matter of life and death; mind it, and you are made for ever; neglect it, and you are for ever undone." Oh that men were but fully persuaded of this, that religion is their life, even the life of their souls! (2.) The vast advantage it would be of to them: Through this thing you shall prolong your days in Canaan, which is a typical promise of that eternal life which, Christ has assured us, they shall enter into that keep the commandments of God, Matth. 19. 17.

III. Orders given to Moses concerning his death. Now that this renowned witness for God has finished his testimony, he must go up to mount Nebo and die; in the prophecy of Christ's two witnesses, there is a plain allusion to Moses and Elias, Rev. 11. 6 and perhaps their removal, being by martyrdom, is no less glorious than the removal either of Moses or Elias. Orders were given to Moses the self-same day, v. 48. Now that he had done his work, why should he desire to live a day longer? He had indeed formerly prayed that he might go over Jordan, but now he is entirely satisfied, and, as God had bidden him, saieth no more of that matter.

1. God here reminds him of the sin he had been guilty of, for which he was excluded Canaan, v. 51. that he might the more patiently bear the rebuke because he had sinned; and that now he might renew his sorrow for that unadvised word, for it is good for the best of men to die repenting of the infirmities they are conscious to themselves of. It was an omission that was thus displeasing to God; he did not sanctify God, as he ought to have done, before the children of Israel, he did not carry himself with a due decorum, in executing the orders he had then received.

2. He reminds him of the death of his brother Aaron, v. 50. to make his own the more familiar, and the less formidable. Note, It is a great encouragement to us, when we die, to think of our friends that have gone before us through that darksome valley, especially of Christ, our elder Brother and great High Priest.

3. He sends him up to a high hill, from thence to take a view of the land of Canaan, and then die, v. 49, 50. The remembrance of his sin might make death terrible, but the sight God gave him of Canaan took off the terror of it, as it was a token of God's being reconciled to him, and a plain indication to him, that though his sin shut him out of the earthly Canaan, yet it should not deprive him of that better country, which in this world can only be seen, and that with an eye of faith. Note, Those may die with comfort and ease whenever God calls for them, (notwithstanding the sins they remember against themselves,) who have a believing prospect, and a well-grounded hope, of eternal life beyond death.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Yet Moses has not done with the children of Israel; he seemed to have taken a final leave of them in the close of the foregoing chapter, but still he has something more to say. He had preached them a farewell sermon, a very copious and pathetic discourse. After sermon he had given out a psalm, a long psalm; and now nothing remains but to dismiss them with a blessing; that blessing he pronounces, in this chapter, in the name of the Lord, and so leaves them. I. He pronounces them all blessed in what God had done for them already, especially in giving them his law, v. 2. .5. II. He pronounces a blessing upon each tribe, which is both a prayer for, and a prophecy of, their felicity. 1. Reuben, v. 6. 2. Judah, v. 7. 3. Levi, v. 8. .11. 4. Benjamin, v. 12. 5. Joseph, v. 13. .17. 6. Zebulun and Issachar, v. 18, 19. 7. Gad, v. 20, 21. 8. Dan, v. 22. 9. Naphtali, v. 23. 10. Asher, v. 24, 25. III. He pronounces them all in general blessed, upon the account of what God would be to them, and do for them, if they were obedient, v. 26. .29.

1. AND this is the blessing, wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the children of Israel before his death. 2. And he said, The LORD came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from mount Paran, and he came with ten thousands of saints: from his right hand went a fiery law for them. 3. Yea, he loved the people; all his saints are in thy hand: and they sat down at thy feet; every one shall receive of thy words. 4. Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob. 5. And he was king in Jeshurun, when the heads of the people and the tribes of Israel were gathered together.

The first verse is the title of the chapter: It is a blessing. In the foregoing chapter he had thundered out the terrors of the Lord against Israel for their sin; it was a chapter, like Ezekiel's roll, full of lamentation, and mourning, and woe. Now, to soften that, and that he might not seem to part in anger, he here subjoins a blessing, and leaves his peace, which should descend and rest upon all those among them that were the sons of peace. Thus Christ's last work on earth was to bless his disciples, (Luke, 24. 50.) like Moses here, in token of parting friends. Moses blessed them, 1. As a prophet; a man of God. Note, It is a very desirable thing to have an interest in the prayers of those that have an interest in heaven; it is a prophet's reward. In this blessing, Moses not only expresses his good wishes to this people, but by the spirit of prophecy foretells things to come concerning them. 2. As a parent to Israel; for so good princes are to their subjects. Jacob upon his death-bed blessed his sons, Gen. 49. 1. in conformity to whose example, Moses here blesses the tribes that were descended from them, to shew, that, though they had been very provoking, yet the entail of the blessing was not cut off. The doing this, immediately before his death, would not only be the more likely to leave an impression upon them, but would be an indication of the great good-will of Moses to them, that he desired their happiness, though he must die, and not share in it.

He begins his blessing with a lofty description of the glorious appearances of God to them in giving them the law, and the great advantage they had by it.

I. There was a visible and illustrious discovery of the divine majesty; enough to convince and for ever silence atheists and infidels, to awaken and affect those who were most stupid and careless, and to put to shame all secret inclinations to other gods, v. 2. 1. His appearance was glorious: he shined forth like the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Even Seir and Paran, two mountains at some distance, were illuminated by the divine glory which appeared on mount Sinai, and reflected some of the rays of it; so bright was the appearance, and so much taken notice of by the adjacent countries. To this the prophet alludes, to set forth the wonders of divine providence, Hab. 3. 3, 4. Ps. 18. 7. 9. The Jerusalem Targum has a strange gloss upon this, that, "when God came down to give the law, he offered it on mount Seir to the Edomites, but they refused it, because they found in it, Thou shalt not kill. Then he offered it on mount Paran to the Ishmaelites, but they also refused it, because they found in it, Thou shalt not steal; and then he came to mount Sinai, and offered it to Israel, and they said, All that the Lord shall say, we will do." I would not have transcribed so groundless a conceit, but for the antiquity of it. 2. His attendance was glorious; he came with his holy myriads, as Enoch had long since foretold he should come in the last day to judge the world, Jude, 14. These were the angels, those chariots of God, in the midst of which the Lord was, on that holy place, Ps. 68. 17. They attended the Divine Majesty, and were employed as his ministers in the solemnities of the day. Hence the law is said to be given by the disposition of angels, Acts, 7. 53. Heb. 2. 2.

II. He gave them his law, which is, 1. Called a fiery law, because it was given them out of the midst of the fire, Deut. 4. 33. and because it works like fire; if it be received, it is melting, warming, purifying, and burns up the dross of corruption; if it be rejected, it hardens, sears, torments, and destroys. The Spirit descended in cloven tongues, as of fire; for the gospel also is a fiery law. 2. It is said to go from his right hand, either because he wrote it on tables of stone; or, denoting the power and energy of the law, and the divine strength that goes along with it, that it may not return void. Or, it came as a gift to them, and a precious gift it was, a right-hand blessing. 3. It was an instance of the special kindness he had for them. Yea, he loved the people, v. 3. and therefore, though it was a fiery law, yet it is said to go for them, v. 2. that is, in favour to them. Note, The law of God, written in the heart, is a certain evidence of the love of God shed abroad there: we must reckon God's law one of the gifts of his grace. Yea, he loved the people, or, laid them in his bosom; so the word signifies, which denotes not only the dearest love, but the most tender and careful protection. All his saints were in his hand. Some understand it particularly of his supporting them, and preserving them alive at mount Sinai, when the terror was so great, that Moses himself quaked; they heard the voice of God and lived, ch. 4. 33. Or, it denotes his forming them into a people by his law; he moulded and managed them, as the potter does the clay. Or, they were in his hand to be covered and protected, used and disposed of, as the seven stars were in the hand of Christ, Rev. 1. 16. Note, God has all his saints in his hand; and though there are ten thousands of his saints, v. 2. yet his hand, with which he measures the waters, is large enough, and strong enough, to hold them all, and we may be sure that none can pluck them out of his hand, John, 10. 28.

III. He disposed them to receive the law which he gave them; They sat down at thy feet, as scholars at the feet of their master, in token of reverence, in attendance, and humble submission, to what is taught; so Israel sat at the foot of mount Sinai, and promised to hear and do whatever God should say. They were struck to thy feet, so some read it; namely, By the terrors of mount Sinai, which greatly humbled them for the present, Exod. 20. 19. Every one then stood ready to receive God's words, and did so again when the law was publicly read to them, as Josh. 8. 34. It is a great privilege, when we have heard the words of God, to have opportunity of hearing them again, John, 17. 26. I have declared thy name, and will declare it. So Israel not only had received the law, but should still receive it, by their prayers, and other lively oracles.

The people are taught, v. 4, 5. in gratitude for the law of God, always to keep up an honourable remembrance both of the law itself, and of Moses, by whom it was given. Two of the Chaldee paraphrasts read it, The children of Israel said, Moses commanded us a law: And the Jews say, that, as soon as a child was able to speak, his father was obliged to teach him these words; Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob.

1. They are taught to speak with great respect of the law, and to call it, The inheritance of the congregation of Jacob. They looked upon it, (1.) As peculiar to them, and that by which they were distinguished from other nations, who neither had the knowledge of it, Ps. 147. 20. nor, if they had, were under those obligations to observe it that Israel were under: and therefore, (says Bishop Patrick,) "when the Jews conquered any country, they did not force any to embrace the law of Moses, but only to submit to the seven precepts of Noah." (2.) As entailed upon them; for so inheritances are to be transmitted to their posterity. And (3.) As their wealth and true treasure. Those that enjoy the word of God, and the means of grace, have reason to say, We have a goodly heritage. He is indeed a rich man, in whom the word of Christ dwells richly. Perhaps the law is called their inheritance, because it was given them with their inheritance, and was so annexed to it, that the forsaking of the law would be a forfeiture of the inheritance. See Ps. 119. 111.

2. They are taught to speak with great respect of Moses: and they were the more obliged to keep up his name, because he had not provided for the keeping of it up in his family; his posterity were never called the sons of Moses, as the priests were, the sons of Aaron. (1.) They must own Moses a great benefactor to their nation, in that he commanded them the law; for, though it came from the hand of God, it went through the hand of Moses. (2.) He was king in Jeshurun. Having commanded them the law, as long as he lived, he took care to see it observed and put in execution; and they were very happy in having such a king, who ruled them, and went in and out before them at all times, but did in a special manner look great, when the heads of the people were gathered together in parliament, as it were, and Moses was president among them. Some understand this of God himself; he did then declare himself their King, when he gave them the law, and he continued so, as long as they were Jeshurun, an upright people, and till they rejected him, 1 Sam. 12. 12. But it seems rather to be understood of Moses. A good government is a great blessing to any people, and what they have reason to be very thankful for; and that constitution is very happy, which, as Israel's, which, as our's, divides the power between the king in Jeshurun and the heads of the tribes, when they are gathered together.

6. Let Reuben live, and not die; and let not his men be few. 7. And this is the blessing of Judah; and he said, Hear, LORD, the voice of Judah, and bring him unto his people: let his hands be sufficient for him; and be thou an help to him from his enemies.

Here is,

I. The blessing of Reuben. Though Reuben had lost the honour of his birthright, yet Moses begins with him; for we should not insult over them that are disgraced, nor desire to perpetuate marks of infamy upon any, though never so justly fastened at first, v. 6. Moses desires and foretells, 1. The preserving of this tribe, though a frontier tribe on the other side Jordan, yet, "Let it live, and not be either ruined by its neighbours, or lost among them." And perhaps he refers to those chosen men of that tribe, who, having had their lot assigned them already, left their families in it, and were now ready to go over armed before their brethren, Numb. 32. 27. "Let them be protected in this noble expedition, and their heads covered in the day of battle." 2. The increase of this tribe, Let not his men be few; or, Let his men be a number. "Let it be a numerous tribe; though their other honours be lost, so that they shall not excel, yet let them multiply." Let Reuben live and not die, though his men be few; so Bishop Patrick thinks it may be rendered. "Though he must not expect to flourish, (Gen. 49. 4.) yet let him not perish." All the Chaldee paraphrasts refer this to the other world; Let Reuben live in life eternal, and not die the second death: So Onkelos. Let Reuben live in this world, and not die that death which the wicked die in the world to come: So Jonathan and the Jerusalem Targum.

II. The blessing of Judah; which is put before Levi, because our Lord sprang out of Judah, and (as Dr. Lightfoot says) because of the dignity of the kingdom above the priesthood. The blessing, v. 7. may refer, either, 1. To the whole tribe in general. Moses prays for, and prophesies, the great prosperity of that tribe. That God would hear his prayers, (see an instance, 2 Chron. 13. 14, 15.) settle him in his lot, prosper him in all his affairs, and give him victory over his enemies. It is taken for granted, that the tribe of Judah would be both a praying tribe and an active tribe. "Lord," says Moses, "hear his prayers, and give success to all his undertakings; let his hands be sufficient for him, both in husbandry and war." The voice of prayer should always be attended with the hand of endeavour, and then we may expect prosperity. Or, 2. It may refer in particular to David, as a type of Christ; that God would hear his prayers, Ps. 20. 1. (And Christ was heard always, John, 11. 42.) that he would give him victory over his enemies, and success in his great undertakings. See Ps. 89. 20, &c. And that prayer, that God would bring him to his people, seems to refer to Jacob's prophecies concerning Shiloh, That to him should the gathering of the people be, Gen. 49. 10.

The tribe of Simeon is omitted in the blessing, because Jacob had left it under a brand, and it had never done any thing, as Levi had done, to retrieve its honour. It was lessened in the wilderness more than any other of the tribes; and Zimri, who was so notoriously guilty in the matter of Peor but the other day, was of that tribe. Or, because the lot of Simeon was an appendage to that of Judah, that tribe is included in the blessing of Judah. Some copies of the LXX join Simeon with Reuben, Let Reuben live and not die, and let Simeon be many in number.

8. And of Levi he said, Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with thy holy one, whom thou didst prove at Massah, and with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah; 9. Who said unto his father and to his mother, I have not seen him; neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor knew his own children: for they have observed thy word, and kept thy covenant. 10. They shall teach Jacob thy judgments, and Israel thy law: they shall put incense before thee, and whole burnt sacrifice upon thine altar. 11. Bless, LORD, his substance, and accept the work of his hands: smite through the loins of them that rise against him, and of them that hate him, that they rise not again

Moses is large in blessing the tribe of Levi, not so much because it was his own tribe, (for he takes no notice of his relation to it,) as because it was God's tribe. The blessing of Levi has reference,

1. To the high priest, here called God's holy one, v. 8. because his office was holy, in token of which, Holiness to the Lord was written upon his forehead. 1. He seems to acknowledge, that God might justly have displaced Aaron and his seed, for his sin at Meribah, Numb. 20. 12. So many understand it. It is rather probable to me, that, on the contrary, he pleads with God the zeal and faithfulness of Aaron, and his boldness in stemming the tide of the people's murmurings at the other Meribah, Exod. 17. 7. which might be very remarkable, and which God might have an eye to in conferring the priesthood upon him, though no mention is made of it there. All the Chaldee paraphrasts agree, that it was a trial in which he was found perfect and faithful, and stood in the trial; therefore not that, Numb. 20. 12. 2. He prays that the office of the high priest might ever remain, Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with him. It was given him for some eminent piece of service, as appears, Mal. 2. 5. "Lord, let it never be taken from him." Notwithstanding this blessing, the Urim and Thummim were lost in the captivity, and never restored under the second temple: but it has its full accomplishment in Jesus Christ, God's Holy One, and our great High Priest, of whom Aaron was a type: with him who had lain in the Father's bosom from eternity, the Urim and Thummim shall remain; for he is the wonderful and everlasting Counsellor. Some translate the Thummim and Urim appellatively; the rather because the usual order is here inverted, and here only. Thummim signifies integrity, and Urim, illumination; Let these be with thy holy one, that is, "Lord, let the high priest ever be both an upright man and an understanding man." A good prayer to be put up for the ministers of the gospel, that they may have clear heads and honest hearts; light and sincerity make a complete minister.

II. To the inferior priests and Levites, v. 9. . 11.

1. He commends the zeal of this tribe for God, when they sided with Moses (and so with God) against the worshippers of the golden calf, Exod. 32. 26, &c. and, being employed in cutting off the ringleaders in that wickedness, they did it impartially: the best friends they had in the world, though as dear to them as their next relations, they did not spare, if they were idolaters. Note, Our regard to God, and to his glory, ought always to prevail above our regard to any creature whatsoever. And those who not only keep themselves pure from the common iniquities of the times and places in which they live, but, as they are capable, utter testimony against them, and stand up for God against the evil-doers, shall have special marks of honour put upon them. Perhaps Moses may have an eye to the sons of Korah, who refused to join with their father in his gainsaying, Numb. 26. 11. Also to Phinehas, who executed judgment, and stayed the plague. And, indeed, the office of the priests and Levites, which engaged their constant attendance, at least in their turns, at God's altar, laid them under a necessity of being frequently absent from their families, which they could not take such care of, nor make such provision for, as other Israelites might. This was the constant self-denial they submitted to, that they might observe God's word, and keep the covenant of priesthood. Note, Those that are called to minister in holy things, must sit loose to the relations and interests that are dearest to them in this world, and prefer the fulfilling of their ministry before the gratifying of the best friend they have, Acts, 21. 13.—20. 24. Our Lord Jesus knew not his mother and his brethren, when they would have taken him off from his work, Matth. 12. 48.

2. He confirms the commission granted this tribe to minister in holy things, which was the recompence of their zeal and fidelity, v. 10. (1.) They were to deal for God with the people. "They shall teach Jacob thy judgments, and Israel thy laws, both as preachers in their religious assemblies, reading and expounding the law, Neh. 8. 7, 8. and as judges, determining doubtful and difficult cases that were brought before them," 2 Chron. 17. 8, 9. The priests' lips kept this knowledge for the use of the people, who were to ask the law at their mouth, Mal. 2. 7. Even Haggai, a prophet, consulted the priests in a case of conscience, Hag. 2. 11, &c. Note, Preaching is necessary, not only for the first planting of churches, but for the preserving and edifying of churches when they are planted. See Ezek. 44. 23, 24. (2.) They were to deal for the people with God, in burning incense to the praise and glory of God, and offering sacrifices to make atonement for sin, and to obtain the divine favour. This was the work of the priests, but the Levites attended and assisted in it. Those that would have benefit by their incense and offerings, must diligently and faithfully observe their instructions.

3. He prays for them, v. 11. (1.) That God would prosper them in their estates, and make that which was allotted them for their maintenance, comfortable to them. Bless Lord, his substance. The provision made for them was very plentiful, and came to them easily, and yet they could have no joy of it unless God blessed it to them, and since God himself was their portion, a particular blessing might be expected to attend this portion. Bless, Lord, his virtue; so some read it. "Lord, increase thy graces in them, and make them more and more fit for their work." (2.) That he would accept them in their services. "Accept the work of his hands, both for himself, and for the people for whom he ministers." Acceptance with God is that which we should all aim at, and be ambitious of, in all our devotions, whether men accept us or no, 2 Cor. 5. 9. and it is the most valuable blessing we can desire either for ourselves or others. (3.) That he would take his part against all his enemies, smite through the loins of them that rise against him. He supposes that God's ministers would have many enemies: some would hate their persons for their faithfulness, and would endeavour to do them a mischief; others would envy them their maintenance, and endeavour sacrilegiously to deprive them of it; others would oppose them in the execution of their office, and not submit to the sentence of the priests; and some would aim to overthrow the office itself. Now he prays that God would blast all such attempts, and return the mischief upon the heads of the authors. This prayer is a prophecy, that God would certainly reckon with those that are enemies to his ministers, and will keep up a ministry in his church to the end of time, in spite of all the designs of the gates of hell against it. Saul rose up against the Lord's priests, 1 Sam. 22. 18. and it filled the measure of his sin.

12. And of Benjamin he said, The beloved of the LORD shall dwell in safety by him; and the LORD shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between his shoulders. 13. And of Joseph he said, Blessed of the LORD be his land, for the precious things of heaven, for the dew, and for the deep that coucheth beneath, 14. And for the precious fruits brought forth by the sun, and for the precious things put forth by the moon, 15. And for the chief things of the ancient mountains, and for the precious things of the lasting hills, 16. And for the precious things of the earth and fulness thereof, and for the good-will of him that dwelt in the bush: let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph, and upon the top of the head of him that was separated from his brethren. 17. His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns: with them he shall push the people together to the ends of the earth: and they are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh.

Here is,

1. The blessing of Benjamin, v. 12. Benjamin is put next to Levi, because the temple, where the priest's work lay, was just upon the edge of the lot of this tribe; and it is put before Joseph, because of the dignity of Jerusalem (part of which was in this tribe) above Samaria, which was in the tribe of Ephraim, and because Benjamin adhered to the house of David, and to the temple of the Lord, when the rest of the tribes deserted both with Jeroboam. 1. Benjamin is here called the beloved of the Lord, as the father of this tribe was Jacob's beloved son, the son of his right hand. Note, Those are blessed indeed that are beloved of the Lord. Saul the first king, and Paul the great apostle, were both of this tribe. 2. He is here assured of the divine protection; he shall dwell safely. Note, Those are safe whom God loves, Ps. 91. 1. 3. It is here intimated, that the temple, in which God would dwell, should be built in the borders of this tribe. Jerusalem, the holy city, was in the lot of this tribe, Josh. 18. 28. and though Sion, the city of David, is supposed to belong to Judah, yet mount Moriah, on which the temple was built, was in Benjamin's lot. God is therefore said to dwell between his shoulders, because the temple stood on that mount as the head of a man upon his shoulders. And by this means Benjamin was covered all the day long under the protection of the sanctuary, (Ps. 125. 2.) which is often spoken of as a place of refuge, Ps. 27. 4, 5. Neh. 6. 10. Benjamin, dwelling by the temple of God, dwelt in safety by him. Note, It is a happy thing to be in the neighbourhood of the temple. This situation of Benjamin, it is likely, was the only thing that kept that tribe close with Judah to the divine institutions, when the other ten tribes apostatized. Those have corrupt and wicked hearts indeed, who, the nearer they are to the church, are so much the further from God.

11. The blessing of Joseph, including both Manasseh and Ephraim. In Jacob's blessing, Gen. 49. that of Joseph is the largest, and so it is here; and from thence Moses here borrows the title he gives to Joseph, v. 16. that he was separated from his brethren, or, as it might be read, a Nazarite among them, both in regard of his piety, wherein it appears, by many instances, he excelled them all; and of his dignity in Egypt, where he was both their ruler and benefactor; his brethren separated him from them by making him a slave, but God distinguished him from them by making him a prince.

Now the blessings here prayed for, and prophesied of, for this tribe, are, great plenty, and great power.

1. Great plenty, v. 13. 16. In general, Blessed of the Lord be his land. They were very fruitful countries that fell into the lot of Ephraim and Manasseh, yet Moses prays they might be watered with the blessing of God, which makes rich, and on which all fruitfulness depends.

Now, (1.) He enumerates many particulars which he prays may contribute to the wealth and abundance of those two tribes, looking up to the Creator for the benefit and serviceableness of all the inferior creatures, for they are all that to us, which he makes them to be. He prays, [1.] For seasonable rains, and dews, the precious things of heaven; and so precious they are, though but pure water, that without them the fruits of the earth would all fail and be cut off. [2.] For plentiful springs, which help to make the earth fruitful, called here the deep that coucheth beneath; both are the rivers of God, Ps. 65. 9. for he is the Father of the rain, Job, 38. 28. and he made particularly the fountains of water, Rev. 14. 7. [3.] For the benign influences of the heavenly bodies; v. 14. for the precious fruits, (the word signifies that which is most excellent, and the best in its kind,) put forth by the quickening heat of the sun, and the cooling moisture of the moon. "Let them have the yearly fruits in their several months, according to the course of nature, in one month olives, in another dates," &c. So some understand it. [4.] For the fruitfulness even of their hills and mountains, which in other countries used to be barren, v. 15. let them have the chief things of the ancient mountains; and if the mountains be fruitful, the fruits on them will be first and best ripened. They are called ancient mountains, not because prior in time to other mountains, but because, like the first-born, they were superior in worth and excellency; and lasting hills, not only because as other mountains they were unmoveable, Hab. 3. 6. but because the fruitfulness of them should continue. [5.] For the productions of the lower grounds, v. 16. For the precious things of the earth. Though the earth itself seems an useless worthless lump of matter, yet there are precious things produced out of it for the support and comfort of human life, Job, 28. 5. Out of it cometh bread, because out of it came our bodies, and to it they must return. But what are the precious things of the earth to a soul that came from God, and must return to him? Or, what is its fulness to the fulness that is in Christ, whence we receive grace for grace? Some make these precious things here prayed for to be figures of spiritual blessings in heavenly things by Christ, the gifts, graces, and comforts, of the Spirit.

(2.) He crowns all with the good-will, or favourable acceptance, of him that dwelt in the bush, v. 16. that is, of God, that God who appeared to Moses in the bush that burned and was not consumed, (Exod. 3. 2.) to give him his commission for the bringing of Israel out of Egypt. Though God's glory appeared there but for a while, yet it is said to dwell there, because it continued as long as there was occasion for it: The good will of the Shechina in the bush; so it might be read, for Shechina signifies that which dwelleth: and though it was but a little while a dweller in the bush, yet it continued to dwell with the people of Israel. My dweller in the bush; so it should be rendered: that was an appearance of the Divine Majesty to Moses only, in token of the particular interest he had in God, which he desires to improve for the good of this tribe. Many a time God had appeared to Moses, but now, that he is just dying, he seems to have the most pleasing remembrance of that which was that time when his acquaintance with the visions of the Almighty first began, and his correspondence with heaven was first settled, that was a time of love never to be forgotten. It was at the bush that God declared himself the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and so confirmed the promise made to the fathers, that promise which reached as far as the resurrection of the body and eternal life, as appears by our Saviour's argument from it, Luke, 20. 37. So that, when he prays for the good-will of him that dwelt in the bush, he has an eye to the covenant then and there renewed, on which all our hopes of God's favour must be bottomed. Now he concludes it is large blessing with a prayer for the favour and good-will of God. [1.] Because that is the fountain and spring-head of all these blessings; they are the gifts of God's good-will, they are so to his own people, whatever they are to others. Indeed, when Ephraim (a descendant from Joseph) slid back from God, as a backsliding heifer, those fruits of his country were so far from being the gifts of God's good-will, that they were intended but to fatten him for the slaughter, as a lamb in a large place, Hos. 4. 16, 17. [2.] Because that is the comfort and sweetness of all these blessings; then we have joy of them, when we taste God's good-will in them. [3.] Because that is better than all these, infinitely better; for, if we have but the favour and good-will of God, we are happy, and may be easy in the want of all these things; and may rejoice in the God of our salvation, though the fig-tree do not blossom, and there be no fruit in the vine, Hab. 3. 17, 18.

2. Great power Joseph is here blessed with, v. 17. Here are three instances of this power foretold. (1.) His authority among his brethren. His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, or a young bull, which is a stately creature, and therefore formerly used as an emblem of royal majesty. Joshua, who was to succeed Moses, was of the tribe of Ephraim the son of Joseph, and his glory was indeed illustrious, and he was an honour to his tribe. In Ephraim was the royal city of the ten tribes afterward. And of Manasseh were Gideon, Jephthah, and Jair, who were all ornaments and blessings to their country. Some think he is compared to the firstling of the bullock, because the birthright, which Reuben lost, devolved upon Joseph, 1 Chron. 5. 1, 2. and to the firstling of his bullock, because Bashan, which was in the lot of Manasseh, was famous for bulls and cows, Ps. 22. 12. Amos, 4. 1. (2.) His force against his enemies, and victory over them; his horns are like the horns of an unicorn, that is, "The forces he shall bring into the field shall be very strong and formidable, and with them he shall push the people," that is, "He shall overcome all that stand in his way." It appears, from the Ephraimites' contests both with Gideon, Judg. 8. 1. and with Jephthah, Judg. 12. 1. that they were a warlike tribe and fierce. Yet we find the children of Ephraim, when they had forsaken the covenant of God, though they were armed, turning back in the day of battle, Ps. 78. 9, 10. for though here pronounced strong and bold as unicorns, when God was departed from them, they became as weak as other men. (3.) The numbers of his people, in which Ephraim, though the younger house, exceeded, Jacob having, in the foresight of the same thing, crossed hands, Gen. 48. 19. They are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and the thousands of Manasseh. Jonathan's Targum applies it to the ten thousands of Canaanites conquered by Joshua, who was of the tribe of Ephraim, and of the thousands of Midianites conquered by Gideon, who was of the tribe of Manasseh. And the gloss of the Jerusalem Targum upon the former part of this verse is observable; that "as the firstling of the bullock were never to be worked, nor could the unicorn ever be tamed, so Joseph should ever continue free; they would have continued free, if they had not by sin sold themselves."

18. And of Zebulun he said, Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and, Issachar, in thy tents. 19. They shall call the people unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness: for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand. 20. And of Gad he said, Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad: he dwelleth as a lion, and teareth the arm with the crown of the head. 21. And he provided the first part for himself, because there, in a portion of the lawgiver, was he seated; and he came with the heads of the people, he executed the justice of the LORD, and his judgments with Israel.

Here we have,

1. The blessings of Zebulun and Issachar put together, for they were both the sons of Jacob by Leah, and by their lot in Canaan they were neighbours; it is foretold,

1. That they should both have a comfortable settlement and employment, v. 18. Zebulun must rejoice, for he shall have cause to rejoice; and Moses prays that he may have cause in his going out, either to war, for Zebulun jeoparded their lives in the high places of the field, Judg. 5. 18. or rather to sea, for Zebulun was a haven of ships, Gen. 49. 13. And Issachar must rejoice in his tents, that is, in his business at home, his husbandry, to which the men of that tribe generally confined themselves, because they saw that rest was good, and, when the sea was rough, the land was pleasant, Gen. 49. 14, 15. Observe here, (1.) That the providence of God, as it variously appoints the bounds of men's habitations, some in the city, and some in the country, some in the sea-ports, and some in the inland towns, so it wisely disposes men's inclinations to different employments for the good of the public, as each member of the body is situated and qualified for the service of the whole. The genius of some men leads them to a book, of others, to the sea, of others, to the sword; some are inclined to rural affairs, others to trade, and some have a turn for mechanics; and it is well it is so; If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? 1 Cor. 12. 17. It was for the common good of Israel, that the men of Zebulun were merchants, and that the men of Issachar were husbandmen. (2.) That, whatever our place and business are, it is our wisdom and duty to accommodate ourselves to it, and it is a great happiness to be well pleased with it. Let Zebulun rejoice in his going out; let him thank God for the gains, and make the best of the losses and inconveniencies, of his merchandize, and not despise the meanness, or envy the quietness, of Issachar's tents; let Issachar rejoice in his tents, let him be well pleased with the retirements, and content with the small profits, of his country seat, and not grudge that he has not Zebulun's pleasure of travelling, and profit of trading. Every business has both its conveniencies and inconveniencies, and therefore, whatever Providence has made our business, we ought to bring our minds to it; and it is really a great happiness, whatever our lot is, to be easy with it. This is the gift of God, Eccl. 5. 19.

2. That they should both be serviceable in their places to the honour of God, and the interests of religion in the nation, v. 19. They shall call the people to the mountain, that is, to the temple, which Moses foresaw should be built upon a mountain. I see not why this should be confined (as it is by most interpreters) to Zebulun; if both Zebulun and Issachar receive the comfort of their respective employments, why may we not suppose that they both took care to give God the glory of them? Two things they shall do for God.

(1.) They shall invite others to his service; call the people to the mountain. [1.] Zebulun shall improve his acquaintance and commerce with the neighbouring nations, to whom he goes out, for this noble purpose, to propagate religion among them, and to invite them into the service of the God of Israel. Note, Men of great business, or large conversation, should wisely and zealously endeavour to recommend the practice of serious godliness to those with whom they converse, and among whom their business lies. Such are blessed, for they are blessings. It were well if the enlargement of trade with foreign countries might be made to contribute to the spreading of the gospel. This prophecy concerning Zebulun perhaps looks as far as the preaching of Christ and his apostles, which began in the land of Zebulun, Matth. 4. 14, 15. and they called the people to the mountain, that is, to the kingdom of the Messiah, which is called the mountain of the Lord's house, Isa. 2. 2. [2.] Issachar, that tarries at home and dwells in tents, shall call upon his neighbour to go up to the sanctuary, at the times appointed for their solemn feasts; either, because they should be more zealous and forward than their neighbours, (and it has been often observed, that though they that with Zebulun dwell in the haven of ships, which are places of concourse, have commonly more of the light of religion, they that with Issachar dwell in tents in the country, have more of the life and heat of it,) and may therefore with their zeal provoke those to a holy emulation that have more knowledge, Ps. 122. 1. or, because they were more observant of the times appointed for their feasts than others were. One of the Chaklee paraphrasts reads the foregoing verse, Rejoice, Issachar, in the tents of thy schools, supposing they would many of them be scholars, and would use their learning for that purpose, according to the revolutions of the year, to give notice of the times of the feasts; for almanacks were not then so common as they are now. And Onkelos more particularly, Rejoice, Issachar, when thou goest to compute the times of the solemnities at Jerusalem; for then the tribes of Israel shall be gathered to the mountain of the house of the sanctuary. So he reads the beginning of this verse: and many think this the meaning of that character of the men of Issachar in David's time, That they had understanding of the times to know what Israel ought to do, 1 Chron. 12. 32. And the character which follows, v. 33. of the men of Zebulun, that they were such as went forth to battle, expert in war, perhaps may explain the blessing of that tribe here. Note, Those that have not opportunity, as Zebulun had, of bringing into the church those that are without, may yet be very serviceable to its interest by helping to quicken, encourage, and build up, those that are within. And it is good work to call people to God's ordinances, to put those in remembrance that are forgetful, and to stir up those that are slothful, who will follow, but care not to lead.

(2.) They shall not only invite others to the service of God, but they shall abound in it themselves; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness. They shall not send others to the temple, and stay at home themselves, under pretence that they cannot leave their business; but, when they stir up others to go speedily to pray before the Lord, they shall say, We will go also, as it is Zech. 8. 21. Note, The good we exhort others to, we should ourselves be examples of. And, when they come to the temple, they shall not appear before the Lord empty, but shall bring for the honour and service of God according as he has prospered them, 1 Cor. 16. 2. [1.] It is here foretold that both these tribes should grow rich, Zebulun, that goes abroad, shall suck of the abundance of the seas, which are full breasts to the merchants, while Issachar, that tarries at home, shall enrich himself with treasures hid in the sand; either the fruits of the earth, or the underground treasures of metals and minerals, or, (because the word for sand here signifies properly the sand of the sea,) the rich things thrown up by the sea, for the lot of Issachar reached to the sea-side. Perhaps their success, in calling the people to the mount, is intimated by their sucking of the abundance of the seas, for we have a like phrase used for the bringing in of the nations to the church, Isa. 60. 5. The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee, and v. 16. Thou shalt suck the milk of the Gentiles. It is foretold, [2.] That these tribes, being thus enriched, should consecrate their gain unto the Lord, and their substance unto the Lord of the whole earth, Mic. 4. 13. That the merchandize of Zebulun, and the hire of Issachar, should be holiness to the Lord, Isa. 23. 18. for they shall out of it offer sacrifices of righteousness, that is, sacrifices according to the law. Note, We must serve and honour God with what we have; and where he sows plentifully, he expects to reap accordingly. Those that suck of the abundance of the seas, and of the treasures hid in the sand, ought to offer sacrifices of righteousness proportionable.

II. The blessing of the tribe of Gad comes next, v. 20, 21. This was one of the tribes that was already seated on that side Jordan where Moses now was. Now,

1. He foretells what this tribe would be, v. 20. (1.) That it would be enlarged, as at present it had a spacious allotment: and he gives God the glory both of its present and of its future extent. Blessed be he that enlargeth Gad. We find how this tribe was enlarged by their success in a war, which it seems they carried on very religiously against the Hagarites, 1 Chron. 5. 19, 20, 22. Note, God is to have the glory of all our enlargements. (2.) That it would be a valiant and victorious tribe; would, if let alone, dwell secure and fearless as a lion; but, if provoked, would, like a lion, tear the arm with the crown of the head; that is, would pull in pieces all that stood in his way, both the arm, that is, the strength and the crown of the head, that is, the policy and authority of his enemies. In David's time there were Gadites, whose faces were as the faces of lions, 1 Chron. 12. 8. Some reckon Jehu to be of this tribe, because the first mention we have of him is at Ramoth-Gilead, which belonged to Gad, and they think this may refer to his valiant acts.

2. He commends this tribe for what they had done, and were now doing, v. 21. (1.) They had done wisely for themselves, when they chose their lot with the first, in a country already conquered. He provided the first part for himself; though he had a concern for his brethren, yet his charity began at home, and he was willing to see himself first served, first settled. The Gadites were the first and most active movers for an allotment on that side Jordan, and therefore are still mentioned before the Reubenites in the history of that affair, Numb. 32. 2. And thus, while the other tribes had their portion assigned them by Joshua the conqueror, Gad and his companions had theirs from Moses the lawgiver, and in it they were seated by law; or, (as the word is,) covered or protected by a special providence which watched over them that were left behind, while the men of war went forward with their brethren. Note, Men will praise thee when thou doest well for thyself, (when thou providest first for thyself, as Gad did,) Ps. 49. 18. And God will praise thee when thou doest well for thy soul, which is indeed thyself, and providest the first part for that in a portion of the lawgiver. (2.) They were now doing honestly and bravely for their brethren; for they came with the heads of the people, before whom they went armed over Jordan, to execute the justice of the Lord upon the Canaanites under the conduct of Joshua, to whom we afterward find they solemnly vowed obedience, Josh. 1. 12, 16. This was what they undertook to do when they had their lot assigned them, Numb. 32. 27. This they did, Josh. 4. 12. And when the wars of Canaan were ended, Joshua dismissed them with a blessing, Josh. 22. 7. Note, It is a blessed and honourable thing to be helpful to our brethren in their affairs; and particularly to assist in executing the justice of the Lord, by suppressing that which is provoking to him; this was it that was counted to Phinehas for righteousness.

22. And of Dan he said, Dan is a lion's whelp: he shall leap from Bashan. 23. And of Naphtali he said, O Naphtali, satisfied with favour, and full with the blessing of the LORD: possess thou the west and the south. 24. And of Asher he said, Let Asher be blessed with children; let him be acceptable to his brethren, and let him dip his foot in oil. 25. Thy shoes shall be iron and brass; and as thy days, so shall thy strength be.

Here is,

1. The blessing of Dan, v. 22. Jacob in his blessing had compared him to a serpent for subtilty; Moses compares him to a lion for courage and resolution; and what could stand before those that had the head of a serpent and the heart of a lion? He is compared to the lions that leaped from Bashan, a mountain noted for fierce lions, from whence they came down to leap upon their prey in the plains. This may refer, either, 1. To the particular victories obtained by Samson (who was of his tribe) over the Philistines; the Spirit of the Lord began to move him in the camp of Dan, when he was very young, as a lion's whelp, so that in his attacks upon the Philistines he surprised them and overpowered them by main strength, as a lion does his prey; and one of his first exploits was the rending of a lion. Or, 2. To a more general achievement of that tribe, when a party of them, upon information brought them of the security of Laish, which lay in the furthest part of the land of Canaan from them, surprised it, and soon made themselves masters of it. See Judg. 18. 27. And the mountains of Bashan lying not far from that city, probably from thence they made their descent upon it; and therefore are here said to leap from Bashan.

II. The blessing of Naphtali, v. 23. He looks upon this tribe with wonder, and applauds it. "O Naphtali, thou art happy, thou shalt be so, mayest thou be ever so!" Three things make up the happiness of this tribe. 1. Be thou satisfied with favour. Some understand it of the favour of men, their good-will, and good word; Jacob had described this tribe to be, generally, courteous obliging people, giving goodly words, as the loving hind, Gen. 49. 21. Now what should they get by being so? Moses here tells them they should have an interest in the affections of their neighbours, and be satisfied with favour. They that are loving, shall be beloved. But others understand it of the favour of God; and with good reason: for that only is the favour that is satisfying to the soul, and puts true gladness into the heart. Those are happy indeed that have the favour of God: and those shall have it that place their satisfaction in it, and reckon that, in having that, they have enough, and desire no more. 2. Be thou full with the blessing of the Lord, that is, not only with those good things that are the fruits of the blessing, eorn, and wine, and oil, but with the blessing itself; that is, the grace of God, according to his promise and covenant. Those who have that blessing may well reckon themselves full, they need nothing else to make them happy. "The portion of the tribe of Naphtali," (the Jews say,) "was so fruitful, and the productions so forward, though it lay north, that they of that tribe were generally the first that brought their first-fruits to the temple; and so they had first the blessing from the priest, which was the blessing of the Lord." Capernaum, in which Christ chiefly resided, lay in this tribe. 3. Be thou in possession of the sea and the south; so it may be read, that is, of that sea which shall lie south of thy lot, that was the sea of Galilee; which we so often read of in the gospels, directly north of which the lot of this tribe lay; and which was of great advantage to this tribe, witness the wealth of Capernaum and Bethsaida, which lay within this tribe, and upon the shore of that sea. See how Moses was guided by a spirit of prophecy in these blessings; for before the lot was cast into the lap, he foresaw and foretold how the disposal of it would be.

III. The blessing of Asher, v. 24, 25. Four things he prays for, and prophesies concerning this tribe, which carries blessedness in its name; for Leah called the father of it Asher, saying, Happy am I, Gen. 30. 13. 1. The increase of their numbers. They are now a numerous tribe, Numb. 26. 47. Let it be more so; Let Asher be blessed with children. Note, Children, especially children of the covenant, are blessings, not burdens. 2. Their interest in their neighbours; Let him be acceptable to his brethren. Note, It is a very desirable thing to have the love and good-will of those we live among: it is what we should pray to God for, who has all hearts in his hand; and what we should endeavour to gain by meekness and humility, and a readiness, as we have ability and opportunity, to do good to all men. 3. The richness of their land. (1.) Above ground; Let him dip his foot in oil, that is, "Let him have such plenty of it in his lot, that he may not only anoint his head with it, but, if he pleases, wash his feet in it," which was not commonly done; yet we find our blessed Saviour, so acceptable to his brethren, that his feet were anointed with the most precious ointment, Luke, 7. 46. (2.) Under ground; Thy shoes shall be iron and brass, that is, "Thou shalt have great plenty of these metals (mines of them) in thine own ground, which by an uncommon blessing shall have both its surface and its bowels rich;" or, if they had them not as the productions of their own country, they should have them imported from abroad; for the lot of this tribe lay on the sea-coast. The Chaldee paraphrasts understand it figuratively; "Thou shalt be strong and bright, as iron and brass." 4. The continuance of their strength and vigour; As thy days so shall thy strength be. Many paraphrase it thus, "The strength of thine old age shall be like that of thy youth; thou shalt not feel a decay, nor be the worse for the wearing, but shalt renew thy youth; as if not thy shoes only, but thy bones, were iron and brass." The day is often in scripture put for the events of the day; and, taking it so here, it is a promise that God would graciously support them under their trials and troubles, whatever they were. And so it is a promise friends, he will have them about him when he lies a-dying. But if, either through God's providence, or their unkindness, it should so happen, that we should then be alone, we need fear no evil, if the great and good Shepherd be with us, Ps. 23. 4.

2. Though his sight was very good, and he had all the advantage of high ground that he could desire for the prospect, yet he could not have seen what he now saw, all Canaan from end to end, (reckoned about 160 miles,) and from side to side, (reckoned about 50 or 60 miles,) if his sight had not been miraculously assisted and enlarged, and therefore it is said, The Lord shewed it him. Note, All the pleasant prospects we have of the better country we are beholden to the grace of God for; it is he that gives the Spirit of Wisdom as well as the Spirit of Revelation, the eye as well as the object. This sight, which God here gave Moses of Canaan, probably, the devil designed to mimic, and pretended to outdo, when, in an airy phantom, he shewed to our Saviour, whom he had placed, like Moses, upon an exceeding high mountain, all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them, not gradually, as here, first one country and then another, but all in a moment of time.

3. He saw it at a distance: such a sight the Old-Testament saints had of the kingdom of the Messiah, they saw it afar off: thus Abraham, long before this, saw Christ's day; and, being fully persuaded of it, embraced it in the promise, leaving others to embrace it in the performance, Heb. 11. 13. Such a sight believers now have, through grace, of the bliss and glory of their future state. The word and ordinances are to them what mount Pisgah was to Moses, from them they have comfortable prospects of the glory to be revealed, and rejoice in hope of it.

4. He saw it, but must never enjoy it. As God sometimes takes his people away from the evil to come, so at other times he takes them away from the good to come, that is, the good which shall be enjoyed by the church in the present world. Glorious things are spoken of the kingdom of Christ in the latter days, its advancement, enlargement, and flourishing state; we foresee it, but we are not likely to live to see it. Those that shall come after us, we hope, will enter that promised land, which is a comfort to us when we find our own carcases falling in this wilderness. See 2 Kings, 7. 2.

5. He saw all this just before his death. Sometimes God reserves the brightest discoveries of his grace to his people, to be the support of their dying moments. Canaan was Immanuel's land, (Isa. 8. 8.) so that in viewing it he had a view of the blessings we enjoy by Christ. It was a type of heaven, Heb. 11. 16. which faith is the substance and evidence of. Note, Those may leave this world with a great deal of cheerfulness, that die in the faith of Christ, and in the hope of heaven, and with Canaan in their eye. Having thus seen the salvation of God, we may well say, Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace.

5. So Moses the servant of the LORD died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the LORD. 6. And he buried him in a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor: but no man knoweth of his sepulchre unto this day. 7. And Moses was an hundred and twenty years old when he died: his eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated. 8. And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days: so the days of weeping and mourning for Moses were ended.

Here is,

1. The death of Moses, v. 5. Moses the servant of the Lord died. God told him he must not go over Jordan, and though at first he prayed earnestly for the reversing of the sentence, yet God's answer to his prayer sufficed him, and now he spake no more of that matter, ch. 3. 26. Thus our blessed Saviour prayed that the cup might pass from him, yet, since it might not, he acquiesced, with Father, thy will be done. Moses had reason to desire to live a while longer in the world. He was old, it is true, but he had not yet attained to the years of the life of his fathers; his father Amram lived to be 137; his grandfather Kohath 133; his great-grandfather Levi 137, Exod. 6. 16. 20. And why must Moses, whose life was more serviceable than any of theirs, die at 120; especially since he felt not the decays of age, but was as fit for service as ever? Israel could ill spare him at this time; his conduct and his converse with God would be as great a happiness to them in the conquest of Canaan as the courage of Joshua. It bore hard upon Moses himself, when he had gone through all the fatigues of the wilderness, to be prevented from enjoying the pleasures of Canaan; when he had borne the burthen and heat of the day, to resign the honour of finishing the work to another, and that not his son, but his servant, who must enter into his labours; we may suppose that this was not pleasant to flesh and blood. But the man Moses was very meek; God will have it so, and he cheerfully submits. 1. He is here called the servant of the Lord, not only as a good man, all the saints are God's servants; but as a useful man, eminently useful, who had served God's counsels in bringing Israel out of Egypt, and leading them through the wilderness. It was more his honour to be the servant of the Lord than to be king in Jeshurun. 2. Yet he dies. Neither his piety nor his usefulness would exempt him from the stroke of death. God's servants must die, that they may rest from their labours, receive their recompence, and make room for others. When God's servants are removed, and must serve him no longer on earth, they go to serve him better, to serve him day and night in his temple. 3. He dies in the land of Moab, short of Canaan, while as yet he and his people were in an unsettled condition, and not entered into their rest. In the heavenly Canaan there will be no more death. 4. He dies according to the word of the Lord. At the mouth of the Lord. So the word is. The Jews say, "with a kiss from the mouth of God." No doubt, he died very easily, (it was an εὐθρασία—a delightful death.) There were no bands in his death; and he had in his death a most pleasing taste of the love of God to him: but that he died in the mouth of the Lord, means no more but that he died in compliance with the will of God. Note, The servants of the Lord, when they have done all their other work, must die at last, in obedience to their Master, and be freely willing to go home whenever he sends for them, Acts, 21. 13.

II. His burial, v. 6. It is a groundless conceit of some of the Jews, that Moses was translated to heaven as Elijah was, for it is expressly said, he died and was buried; yet probably, he was raised to meet Elias, to grace the solemnity of Christ's transfiguration. 1. God himself buried him, namely, by the ministry of angels, which made this funeral, though very private, yet very magnificent. Note, God takes care of the dead bodies of his servants; as their death is precious, so is their dust, not a grain of it shall be lost, but the covenant with it shall be remembered. When Moses was dead, God buried him; when Christ was dead, God raised him; for the law of Moses was to have an end, but not the gospel of Christ; believers are dead to the law, that they might be married to another, even to Him who is raised from the dead, Rom. 7. 4. It should seem Michael, that is Christ, (as some think,) had the burying of Moses, for by him the Mosaical ordinances were abolished and taken out of the way, nailed to his cross, and buried in his grave, Col. 2. 14. 2. He was buried in a valley over against Beth-peor. How easily could the angels, that buried him, have conveyed him over Jordan, and buried him with the patriarchs in the cave of Machpelah! But we must learn not to be over solicitous about the place of our burial; if the soul be at rest with God, the matter is not great where the body rests. One of the Chaldee paraphrasts says, "He was buried over against Beth-peor, that whenever Baal-peor boasted of the Israelites being joined to him, the grave of Moses over against his temple might be a check to him." 3. The particular place was not known, lest the children of Israel, who were so very prone to idolatry, should have enshrined and worshipped the dead body of Moses, that great founder and benefactor of their nation. It is true, we read not, among all the instances of their idolatry, that they worshipped relics, the reason of which perhaps was, because they were thus prevented from worshipping Moses, and so could not for shame worship any other. Some of the Jewish writers say, that the body of Moses was concealed, that necromancers, who inquired of the dead, might not disquiet him, as the witch of En-dor did Samuel, to bring him up; God would not have the name and memory of his servant Moses thus abused. Many think this was the contest between Michael and the devil about the body of Moses, mentioned Jude, 9. The devil would make the place known, that it might be a snare to the people, and Michael would not let him. Those therefore who are for giving divine honours to the relics of departed saints, side with the devil against Michael our prince.

III. His age, v. 7. His life was prolonged, 1. To old age. He was one hundred and twenty years old, which, though far short of the years of the patriarchs, yet much exceeded the years of most of his contemporaries, for the ordinary age of man had been lately reduced to seventy, Ps. 90. 10. The years of the life of Moses were three forties; the first forty he lived a courtier, at ease and in honour in Pharaoh's court; the second forty he lived a poor desolate shepherd in Midian; the third forty he lived a king in Jeshurun, in honour and power, but encumbered with a great deal of care and toil; so changeable is the world we live in, and allayed with such mixture; the world before us is unmix'd and unchangeable. 2. To a good old age. His eye was not dim, as Isaac's, Gen. 27. 1. and Jacob's, Gen. 48. 10. Nor was his natural force abated; there was no decay either of the strength of his body or of the vigour and activity of his mind, but he could still speak, and write, and walk, as well as ever; his understanding as clear, and his memory as strong, as ever. "His visage was not wrinkled," say some of the Jewish writers; "he had lost never a tooth," say others; and many of them expound it of the shining of his face, Exod. 34. 30. that that continued to the last. This was the general reward of his services; and it was in particular the effect of his extraordinary meekness, for that is a grace which is, as much as any other, health to the navel and marrow to the bones. Of the moral law, which was given by Moses, though the condemning power be vacated to true believers, yet the commands are still binding, and will be to the end of the world; the eye of them is not waxen dim, for they shall discern the thoughts and intents of the heart, nor is their natural force or obligation abated, but still we are under the law to Christ.

IV. The solemn mourning that there was for him, v. 8. It is a debt owing to the surviving honour of deceased worthies, to follow them with our tears, as those who loved and valued them, are sensible of our loss of them, and are truly humbled for those sins which have provoked God to deprive us of them; for penitential tears very fitly mix with these. Observe, 1. Who the mourners were; the children of Israel: they all conformed to the ceremony, whatever it was; though some of them perhaps, who were ill-affected to his government, were but mock-mourners. Yet we may suppose there were those among them who had formerly quarrelled with him and his government, and perhaps had been of those who spake of stoning him, who now were sensible of their loss, and heartily lamented him when he was removed from them, though they knew not how to value him when he was with them. Thus they who had murmured were made to learn doctrine, Isa. 29. 24. Note, The loss of good men, especially good governors, is to be much lamented and laid to heart: those are stupid who do not consider it. 2. How long they mourned, thirty days; so long the formality lasted, and we may suppose there were some, in whom the mourning continued much longer. Yet the ending of the days of weeping and mourning for Moses is an intimation, that, how great soever our losses have been, we must not abandon ourselves to perpetual grief, we must suffer the wound at least to heal up in time. If we hope to go to heaven rejoicing, why should we resolve to go to the grave mourning? The ceremonial law of Moses is dead and buried in the grave of Christ; but the Jews have not yet ended the days of their mourning for it.

9. And Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him, and the children of Israel hearkened unto him, and did as the Lord commanded Moses. 10. And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face. 11. In all the signs and the wonders, which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land, 12. And in all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses shewed in the sight of all Israel.

We have here a very honourable encomium passed both on Moses and Joshua; each has his praise, and should have. It is ungrateful so to magnify our living friends, as to forget the merits of those that are gone, to whose memories there is a debt of honour due: all the respect must not be paid to the rising sun; and, on the other hand, it is unjust so to cry up the merits of those that are gone, as to despise the benefit we have in those that survive and succeed them. Let God be glorified in both, as here.

1. Joshua is praised as a man admirably qualified for the work to which he was called, v. 9. Moses brought Israel to the borders of Canaan, and then died and left them, to signify that the law made nothing perfect, Heb. 7. 19. It brings men into a wilderness of conviction, but not into the Canaan of rest and settled peace. It is an honour reserved for Joshua, (our Lord Jesus, of whom Joshua was a type,) to do that for us which the law could not do, in that it was weak through the flesh, Rom. 8. 3. Through him we enter into rest; the spiritual rest of conscience and eternal rest in heaven. Three things concurred to clear Joshua's call to this great undertaking. 1. God fitted him for it. He was full of the spirit of wisdom; and so he had need, who had such a peevish people to rule, and such a politic people to conquer. Conduct is as requisite in a general as courage. Herein Joshua was a type of Christ, in whom are hid the treasures of wisdom. 2. Moses by the divine appointment had ordained him to it: He had laid his hands upon him; so substituting him to be his successor, and praying to God to qualify him for the service to which he had called him; and this comes in as a reason why God gave him a more than ordinary spirit of wisdom, because his designation to the government was God's own act; those whom God employs, he will in some measure make fit for the employment; and because this was the thing that Moses had asked of God for him, when he laid his hands on him. When the bodily presence of Christ withdrew from his church, he prayed the Father to send another Comforter, and obtained what he prayed for. 3. The people cheerfully owned him, and submitted to him. Note, An interest in the affections of people is a great advantage, and a great encouragement to those that are called to public trusts, of what kind soever. It was also a great mercy to the people, that, when Moses was dead, they were not as sheep having no shepherd, but had one ready among them, in whom they did unanimously, and might with the highest satisfaction, acquiesce.

II. Moses is praised, v. 10. 12. and with good reason.

1. He was indeed a very great man, especially upon two accounts. (1.) His intimacy with the God of nature; God knew him face to face, and so he knew God. See Numb. 12. 8. He saw more of the glory of God than any (at least) of the Old-Testament saints ever did. He had more free and frequent access to God, and was spoken to, not in dreams, and visions, and slumberings on the bed, but when he was awake and standing before the cherubims. Other prophets, when God appeared and spoke to them, were struck with terror, Dan. 10. 7. but Moses, whenever he received a divine revelation, kept his temper. (2.) His interest and power in the kingdom of nature; the miracles of judgment he wrought in Egypt before Pharaoh, and the miracles of mercy he wrought in the wilderness before Israel, served to demonstrate that he was a particular favourite of Heaven, and had an extraordinary commission to act as he did on this earth. Never was there any man whom Israel had more reason to love, or whom the enemies of Israel had more reason to fear. Observe, The historian calls the miracles Moses wrought, signs and wonders, done with a mighty hand and great terror; which may refer to the terrors of mount Sinai, by which God fully ratified Moses's commission, and demonstrated it beyond exception to be divine, and this in the sight of all Israel.

2. He was greater than any other of the prophets of the Old Testament: though they were men of great interest in heaven, and great influence upon earth, yet they were none of them to be compared with this great man; none of them either evidenced or executed a commission from heaven so as Moses did. This seems to have been written long after, yet then there had not risen any prophet like unto Moses, nor did there arise any such between that and the sealing up of the vision and prophecy. By Moses God gave the law, and moulded and formed the Jewish Church; by the other prophets he only sent particular ~~revel~~ vs, directions, and predictions. The last of the prophets concludes with a charge to remember the law of Moses, Mal. 4. 4. Christ himself often appealed to the writings of Moses, and vouched him for a witness, as one that saw his day at a distance, and spake of him. But, as far as the other prophets came short of him, our Lord Jesus went beyond him; his doctrine more excellent, his miracles more illustrious, and his communion with his Father more intimate, for he had lain in his bosom from eternity, and by him God does now in these last days speak to us. The history of Moses leaves him buried in the plains of Moab, and concludes with the period of his government; but the history of our Saviour leaves him sitting at the right hand of the Majesty on high, and we are assured that of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end. The apostle, in his epistle to the Hebrews, largely proves the pre-eminence of Christ above Moses, as a good reason why we, that are Christians, should be obedient, faithful, and constant, to that holy religion which we make profession of. God, by his grace, make us all so!

TO THE Historical Books.

THIS methodized and practical Exposition of the Historical Books ventures abroad, with fear and trembling, in the same plain and homely dress with the former, on the Pentateuch: ornari res ipsa negat, contenta doceri—The subject requires no ornament, to have it apprehended is all. But I trust, through grace, it proceeds from the same honest design, that is, to promote the knowledge of the scripture, in order to the reforming of men's hearts and lives. If I may but be instrumental to make my readers wise and good, wiser and better, more watchful against sin, and more careful of their duty both to God and man, and, in order to that, more in love with the word and law of God, I have all I desire, all I aim at. May he that ministereth seed to the sower, multiply the seed sown, by increasing the fruits of righteousness, 2 Cor. 9. 10.

It is the history of the Jewish Church and Nation, from their first settlement in the promised land, after their four hundred and thirty years' bondage in Egypt, and their forty years' wandering in the wilderness, to their re-settlement there, after their seventy years' captivity in Babylon—from Joshua to Nehemiah. The five books of Moses were taken up more with their laws, institutes, and charters; but all these books are purely historical, and, in that way of writing, a great deal of very valuable learning and wisdom has been conveyed from one generation to another.

The chronology of this history, and the ascertaining of the times when the several events contained in it happened, would very much illustrate the history, and add to the brightness of it; it is therefore well worthy the search of the curious and ingenious, and they may find both pleasure and profit in perusing the labours of many learned men, who have directed their studies that way. I confess I could willingly have entertained myself and reader, in this preface, with a calculation of the times through which this history passes: but I consider, that such a babe in knowledge as I am could not pretend either to add to or correct what has been done by so many great writers, much less to decide the controversies that have been agitated among them. I had, indeed, some thoughts of consulting my worthy and ever-honoured friend, Mr. Tallents of Shrewsbury, the learned author of the View of Universal History, and to have begged some advice and assistance from him in methodizing the contents of this history; but, in the very week in which I put my last hand to this part, it pleased God to put an end to his useful life, (and useful it was to the last,) and to call him to his rest, in the eighty-ninth year of his age: so that purpose was broken off, that thought of my heart. But that elaborate performance of his, commonly called his Chronological Tables, gives great light to this, as, indeed, to all other parts of history. And Dr. Lightfoot's Chronology of the Old Testament, and Mr. Cradock's History of the Old Testament, methodized, may also be of great use to such readers as I write for.

As to the particular chronological difficulties which occur in the thread of this history, I have not been large upon them, because many times I could not satisfy myself; and how, then, could I satisfy my reader concerning them? I have not, indeed, met with any difficulties so great, but that solutions might be given of them, which are sufficient to silence the atheists and anti-scripturists, and roll away from the sacred records all the reproach of contradiction and inconsistency with themselves; for, to do that, it is enough to shew that the difference may be accommodated either this way or that, when, at the same time, one cannot satisfy one's self which way is the right.

But it is well that these are things about which we may very safely and very comfortably be ignorant and unresolved. What concerns our salvation is plain enough, and we need not perplex ourselves about the niceties of chronology, genealogy, or geography. At least, my undertaking leads me not into those labyrinths. What is profitable for doctrine, for reproof ror correction, and for instruction in righteousness, is what I intend to observe; and I would endeavour to open what is dark and hard to be understood, only in order to that. Every author must be taken in his way of writing; the sacred penmen, as they have not left us formal systems, so they have not left us formal annals, but useful narratives of things proper for our direction in the way of duty, which some great judges of common writers have thought to be the most pleasant and profitable histories, and most likely to answer the end. The word of God, manifestis pascit, obscuris exercet, (Aug. in Joh. Tract. 45.) as one of the ancients expresses it; that is, it has enough in it that is easy, to nourish the meanest to life eternal, yet enough that is difficult, to try the industry and humility of the greatest.

There are several things which should recommend this part of sacred writ to our diligent and constant search.

I. That it is history, and therefore entertaining and very pleasant, edifying, and very serviceable to the conduct of human life. It gratifies the inquisitive with the knowledge of that which the most intense speculation could not discover any other way. By a retirement into ourselves, and a serious contemplation of the objects we are surrounded with, close reasoning may advance many excellent truths, without being beholden to any other. But, for the knowledge of past events, we are entirely indebted (and must be so) to the reports and records of others. A notion or hypothesis of a man's own framing may gain him the reputation of a wit, but a history of a man's own framing will lay him under the reproach of a cheat, any further than as it respects that which he himself is an eye or ear witness of. How much are we indebted, then, to the Divine Wisdom and Goodness for these writings, which have made things so long since past as familiar to us as any of the occurrences of the age and place we live in!

History is so edifying, that parables and apologues have been invented, to make up the deficiencies of it, for our instruction concerning good and evil; and, whatever may be said of other history, we are sure, that, in this history, there is no matter of fact recorded but what has its use, and will help either to expound God's providence or guide man's prudence.

II. That it is true history, and what we may rely upon the credit of, and need not fear being deceived in. That which the heathens reckoned tempus æθηλον, that is, which they knew nothing at all of, and tempus μυθικόν, that is, the account of which was wholly fabulous, is to us tempus ιστορικόν, that is, what we have a most authentic account of. The Greeks were, with them, the most celebrated historians, and yet their successors in learning and dominion, the Romans, put them into no good name for their credibility; witness that of the poet, Et quicquid Græcia mendax audit in historiâ—All that lying Greece has dared to record, Juv. Sat. 10. But the history which we have before us is of undoubted certainty, and no cunningly-devised fable. To be well assured of this is a great satisfaction, especially since we meet with so many things in it truly miraculous, and many more great and marvellous.

III. That it is ancient history, far more ancient than was ever pretended to come from any other hand. Homer, the most ancient genuine heathen writer, now entirely extant, is reckoned to have lived at the beginning of the Olympiads, near the time when it is computed that the city of Rome was founded by Romulus, which was but about the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah. And his writings pretend not to be historical, but poetical fiction all over; rhapsodies, indeed, they are, and the very Alcoran of Paganism.

The most ancient authentic historians now extant are Herodotus and Thucydides, who were contemporaries with the latest of our historians, Ezra and Nehemiah, and could not write with any certainty of events much before their own time. The obscurity, deficiency, and uncertainty of all ancient history, except that which we find in the scripture, is abundantly made out by the learned Bishop Stillingfleet, in that most useful book, his Origines Sacræ, Lib. 1. Let the antiquity of this history not only recommend it to the curious, but recommend to us all that way of religion it directs us in, as the good old way, in which if we walk, we shall find rest to our souls, Jer. 6. 16.

IV. That it is church history, the history of the Jewish Church, that sacred society, incorporated for religion, and the custody of the oracles and ordinances of God, by a charter under the broad seal of Heaven, a covenant confirmed by miracles. Many great and mighty nations there were at this time in the world, celebrated, it is likely, for wisdom, and learning, and valour, illustrious men, and illustrious actions; yet the records of them are all lost, either in silence or fables, while that little inconsiderable nation of the Jews, that dwelt alone, and was not reckoned among the nations, (Numb. 23. 9.) makes so great a figure in the best known, most ancient, and most lasting, of all histories, while no notice is taken in it of the affairs of other nations, except only as they fall in with the affairs of the Jews; for the Lord's portion is his people, Jacob is the lot of his inheritance, Deut. 32. 8, 9. Such a concern has God for his church in every age, and so dear have its interests been to him; let them, therefore, be so to us, that we may be followers of him, as dear children.

V. That it is a divine history, given by inspiration of God, and a part of that blessed book which is to be the standing rule of our faith and practice. And we are not to think it a part of it which might have been spared, or which we may now pass over, or cast a careless eye upon, as if it were indifferent whether we read it or no; but we are to read it as a sacred record, preserved for our benefit, on whom the ends of the world are come.

I. This history is of great use for the understanding of some other parts of the Old Testament. The account we have here of David's life and reign, and especially of his troubles, is a key to many of his psalms. And much light is given to most of the prophecies by these histories.

PREFACE.

2. Though we have not altogether so many types of Christ here as we had in the history of the law of Moses, yet even here we meet with divers who were figures of Him that was to come, such as Joshua, Samson, Solomon, Cyrus, but especially David, whose kingdom was typical of the kingdom of the Messiah, and the covenant of royalty made with him, a dark representation of the covenant of redemption made with the Eternal Word; nor know we how to call Christ the son of David, unless we be acquainted with this history; nor how to receive it that John Baptist was the Elias that was to come, Matth. 11. 14.

3. The state of the Jewish Church, which is here set before us, was typical of the Gospel Church, and the state of that in the days of the Messiah; and as the prophecies which related to it looked further to the latter days, so did the histories of it; and still these things happened to them for ensamples, 1 Cor. 10. 11. By the tenor of this history, we are given to understand these three things concerning the church; for the thing that hath been, is that which shall be, Eccl. 1. 9. (1.) That we are not to expect the perfect purity and unity of the church in this world, and therefore not to be stumbled, though we are grieved, at its corruptions, distempers, and divisions; not to think it strange concerning them, as though some strange thing happened, much less to think the worse of its laws and constitutions for the sake of them, or to despair of its perpetuity. What wretched stains of idolatry, impiety, and immorality, appear on the Jewish Church; and what a woful breach was there between Judah and Ephraim, yet God took them (as I may say) with all their faults, and never wholly rejected them, till they rejected the Messiah. Israel hath not been forsaken, nor Judah, of her God, though their land was filled with sin against the Holy One of Israel, Jer. 31. 5. (2.) That we are not to expect the constant tranquillity and prosperity of the church. It was then often oppressed and afflicted from its youth, had its years of servitude, as well as its days of triumph, was often obscured, diminished, impoverished, and brought low; and yet still God secured to himself a remnant, a holy seed, which was the substance thereof, Isa. 6. 13. Let us not, then, be surprised to see the Gospel Church sometimes under hatches, and driven into the wilderness, and the gates of hell prevailing far against it. (3.) That yet we need not fear the utter extirpation of it. The Gospel Church is called the Israel of God, (Gal. 6. 16.) and the Jerusalem which is above, (Gal. 4. 26.) the heavenly Jerusalem: for as Israel after the flesh, and the Jerusalem that then was, by the wonderful care of the Divine Providence, outrode all the storms with which they were tossed and threatened, and continued in being till they were made to resign all their honours to the Gospel Church, which they were the figures of; so shall that also, notwithstanding all its shocks, be preserved, till the mystery of God shall be finished, and the kingdom of Grace shall have its perfection in the kingdom of Glory.

4. This history is of great use to us for our direction in the way of our duty; it was written for our learning, that we may see the evil we should avoid, and be armed against it, and the good we should do, and be quickened to it. Though they are generally judges, and kings, and great men, whose lives are here written, yet in them even those of the meanest rank may see the deformity of sin, and hate it, and the beauty of holiness, and be in love with it; nay, the greater the person is, the more evident are both these; for, if the great be good, it is their goodness that makes their greatness honourable; if bad, their greatness does but make their badness the more shameful. The failings even of good people are also recorded here for our admonition, that he who thinks he stands may take heed lest he fall, and that he who has fallen may not despair of forgiveness, if he recover himself by repentance.

5. This history, as it shews what God requires of us, so it shews what we may expect from his providence, especially concerning states and kingdoms. By the dealings of God with the Jewish nation, it appears, that, as nations are, so they must expect to fare; that, while princes and people serve the interests of God's kingdom among men, he will secure and advance their interests; but that, when they shake off his government, and rebel against him, they can look for no other than an inundation of judgments. It was so all along with Israel; while they kept close to God, they prospered; when they forsook him, every thing went cross. That great man, Archbishop Tillotson, (Vol. I. Sermon 3. on Prov. 14. 34.) suggests, That though, as to particular persons, the providences of God are promiscuously administered in this world, because there is another world of rewards and punishments for them, yet it is not so with nations as such; but national virtues are ordinarily rewarded with temporal blessings, and national sins punished with temporal judgments; because, as he says, public bodies and communities of men, as such, can be rewarded and punished only in this world, for in the next they will all be dissolved. So plainly are God's way of disposing kingdoms laid before us in the glass of this history, that I could wish Christian statesmen would think themselves as much concerned as preachers to acquaint themselves with it; they might fetch as good maxims of state and rules of policy from this as from the best of the Greek and Roman historians. We are blessed (as the Jews were) with a divine revelation, and make a national profession of religion and relation to God, and therefore are to look upon ourselves as in a peculiar manner under a divine regimen, so that the things which happened to them were designed for ensamples to us.

I cannot pretend to write for great ones. But if what is here done may be delightful to any in reading, and helpful in understanding and improving, this sacred history, and governing themselves by the dictates of it, let God have all the glory, and let all the rivers return to the Ocean from whence they came. When I look back on what is done, I see nothing to boast of, but a great deal to be ashamed of; and when I look forward on what is to be done, I see nothing in myself to trust to for the doing of it; I have no sufficiency of my own, but, by the grace of God, I am what I am, and that grace shall, I trust, be sufficient for me. Surely in the Lord have I righteousness and strength. That blessed ἐπιχορηγία, which the apostle speaks of, (Phil. 1. 19.) that continual supply or communication of the Spirit of Jesus Christ, is what we may in faith pray for, and depend upon, to furnish us for every good word and work.

PREFACE.

my skill, not without some care and application of mind, in the same method and manner with that; I wish I could have done it in less compass, that it might have been more within reach of the poor of the flock. But then it would not have been so plain and full as I desire it may be for the benefit of the *lamb*s of the flock; Brevis esse laboro, obscurus fio— Labouring to be concise, I become obscure.

With a humble submission to the Divine Providence, and its disposals, and a humble reliance on the Divine Grace, and its conduct and operation, I purpose still to proceed, as I have time, in this work. Two volumes more will, if God permit, conclude the Old Testament; and then, if my friends encourage me, and God spare me, and enable me for it, I intend to go on to the New Testament. For though many have taken in hand to set forth in order a declaration of those parts of scripture which are yet before us, (Luke, 1. 1.) whose works praise them in the gates, and are likely to outlive mine, yet, while the subject is really so copious as it is, and the manner of handling it may possibly be so various, and while one book comes into the hands of some, and another into the hands of others, and all concur in the same design, to advance the common interests of Christ's kingdom, the common faith once delivered to the saints, and the common salvation of precious souls, (Tit. 1. 4. Jude, 3.) I hope store of this kind will be thought no sore. I make bold to mention my purpose to proceed thus publicly, in hopes I may have the advice of my friends in it, and their prayers for me, that I may be made more ready and mighty in the scriptures, that understanding and utterance may be given to me, and that I may obtain of the Lord Jesus to be found his faithful servant, who am less than the least of all that call him Master.

AN

WITH

Practical Observations,

UPON THE BOOK OF

J O S H U A.

1. We have now before us, the history of the Jewish nation, in this book, and those that follow it to the end of the book of Esther. These books, to the end of the books of the Kings, the Jewish writers call, the first book of the prophets, to bring them within the distribution of the books of the Old Testament, into the law, the prophets, and the Hagiographa, or Hagiographa, Luke, 24. 44. The rest they make part of the Hagiographa. For though history is their subject, it is justly supposed that prophets were their penmen: to those books that are purely and properly prophetical the name of the prophet is prefixed, because the credibility of the prophecies depended much upon the character of the prophets; but these historical books, it is probable, were collections of the authentic records of the nation, which some of the prophets (the Jewish Church was for many ages more or less continually blessed with such) were divinely directed and helped to put together for the service of the Church to the end of the world; as their other officers, so their Historiographers, had their authority from Heaven.—It should seem that though the substance of the several histories was written when the events were fresh in memory, and written under a divine direction, yet that, under the same direction, they were put into the form in which we now have them, by some other hand, long afterward, probably, all by the same hand, or about the same time. The grounds of the conjecture are, 1. Because former writings are so often referred to, as the Book of Jasher, Josh. 10. 13. and 2 Sam. 1. 18. and the Chronicles of the kings of Israel and Judah often; and the books of Gad, Nathan, and Iddo. 2. Because the days when the things were done are spoken of sometimes as days long since passed; as 1 Sam. 9. 9. He that is now called a prophet was then called a seer. And 3. Because we so often read of things remaining unto this day, as stones, Josh. 4. 9.—7. 26.—8. 29.—10. 27. 1 Sam. 6. 18. Names of places, Josh. 5. 9.—7. 26. Judg. 1. 26.—15. 19.—18. 12. 2 Kings, 14. 7. Rights and possessions, Judg. 1. 21. 1 Sam. 27. 6. Customs and usages, 1 Sam. 5. 5. 2 Kings, 17. 41. Which clauses have been since added to the history by the inspired collectors, for the confirmation and illustration of it to those of their own age. And, if one may offer a mere conjecture, it is not unlikely that the historical books to the end of the Kings were put together by Jeremiah the prophet a little before the captivity, for it is said of Ziklag, 1 Sam. 27. 6. it pertains to the kings of Judah (which style began after Solomon, and ended in the captivity) unto this day: And it is still more probable that those which follow were put together by Ezra the scribe, some time after the captivity. However, though we are in the dark concerning their authors, we are in no doubt concerning their authority; they were a part of the oracles of God, which were committed to the Jews, and were so received and referred to by our Saviour and the apostles.—In the five books of Moses we had a very full account of the rise, advance, and constitution, of the Old-Testament Church, the family out of which it was raised, the promise, that great charter by which it was incorporated, the miracles by which it was built up, and the laws and ordinances by which it was to be governed. From which one would conceive an expectation of its character and state very different from what we find in this history. A nation that had statutes and judgments so righteous, one would think, should have been very holy; and that had promises so rich, should have been very happy. But, alas! a great part of the history is a melancholy representation of their sins and miseries, for the law made nothing perfect; that was to be done by the bringing in of a better hope. And yet, if we compare the history of the Christian Church with its constitution, we shall find the same cause for wonder, so many have been its errors and corruptions; for neither does the Gospel make any thing perfect in this world, but leaves us still in expectation of a better hope in the future state.

JOSHUA, I.

11. We have next before us the book of Joshua, so called, perhaps, not because it was written by him, for that is uncertain. However that be, it is written concerning him, and, if any other wrote it, it was collected out of his journals, or memoirs. It contains the history of Israel under the command and government of Joshua, how he presided as general of their armies, 1. In their entrance into Canaan, ch. 1. to 5. 2. In their conquest of Canaan, ch. 6. to 12. 3. In the distribution of the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel, ch. 13. to 21. 4. In the settlement and establishment of religion among them, ch. 22. to 24. In all which he was a great example of wisdom, courage, fidelity, and piety, to all that are in places of public trust. But that is not all the use that is to be made of this history; we may see in it, (1.) Much of God and his providence; his power in the kingdom of nature; his justice in punishing the Canaanites when the measure of their iniquity was full; his faithfulness to his covenant with the patriarchs; and his kindness to his people Israel, notwithstanding their provocations. We may see him, as the Lord of Hosts, determining the issues of war, and, as the Director of the lot, determining the bounds of men's habitations. (2.) Much of Christ and his grace. Though Joshua is not expressly mentioned in the New Testament as a type of Christ, yet all agree that he was a very eminent one. He bore our Saviour's name, as did also another type of him, Joshua the high priest, Zech. 6. 11, 12. The LXX giving the name of Joshua a Greek termination, call him all along, Ἰησοῦς Jesus, and so he is called, Acts, 7. 45. and Heb. 4. 8. Justin Martyr, one of the first writers of the Christian Church, (Dialog. cum Tryph. p. mibi 300.) makes that promise, Exod. 23. 20. Mine angel shall bring thee into the place I have prepared, to point at Joshua; and these words My name is in him, to refer to this, that his name should be the same with that of the Messiah; it signifies, He shall save. Joshua saves God's people from the Canaanites; our Lord Jesus saves them from their sins. Christ, as Joshua, is the Captain of our Salvation, a Leader and Commander of the people, to tread Satan under their feet, and to put them in possession of the heavenly Canaan, and to give them rest, which (it is said, Heb. 4. 8.) Joshua did not.

Dr. Lightfoot thinks that Phineas wrote it. Bishop Patrick is clear that Joshua wrote it himself.

Before Christ 1451

Joshua directed and encouraged.

CHAP. I.

The book begins with the history, not of Joshua's life, (many remarkable passages of that we had before in the books of Moses,) but of his reign and government. In this chapter, I. God appoints him in the stead of Moses, gives him an ample commission, full instructions, and great encouragements, v. 1. .9. II. He accepts the government, and addresses himself immediately to the business of it, giving orders to the officers of the people in general, v. 10, 11. And particularly to the two tribes and a half, v. 12. .15. III. The people agree to it, and take an oath of fealty to him, v. 16. .18. A reign which thus began with God, could not but be honourable to the prince, and comfortable to the subject. The last works of Moses are still verified, Happy art thou, O Israel! who is like unto thee, O people? Dent. 33. 29.

1. NOW after the death of Moses the servant of the LORD it came to pass, that the LORD spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying, 2. Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel. 3. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses. 4. From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast. 5. There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life: as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. 6. Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I swear unto their fathers to give them. 7. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. 8. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success. 9. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the LORD thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest.

Honour is here put upon Joshua, and great power lodged in his hand, by Him that is the Fountain of honour and power, and by whom kings reign; instructions are given him by infinite wisdom, and encouragements by the God of all consolation. God had before spoken to Moses concerning him, Numb. 27. 18. But now he speaks to him, v. 1. probably, as he spake to Moses, Lev. 1. 1. out of the tabernacle of the congregation, where Joshua had with Moses presented himself, Dent. 31. 14. to learn the way of attending there. Though Eleazar had the breastplate of judgment, which Joshua was directed to consult as there was occasion, Numb. 27. 21. yet, for his greater encouragement, God here speaks to him immediately, some think, in a dream or vision, (as Job, 33. 15.) for though God has tied us to instituted ordinances, in them to attend him, yet he has not tied himself to them, but that he may, without them, make himself known to his people, and speak to their hearts otherwise than by their ears.

Concerning Joshua's call to the government, observe here,

I. The time when it was given him, After the death of Moses. As soon as ever Moses was dead, Joshua took upon him the administration, by virtue of his solemn ordination in Moses's life-time; an interregnum, though but for a few days, might have been of ill consequence; but, it is probable, that God did not speak to him to go forward toward Canaan, till after the thirty days of mourning for Moses were ended; not, as the Jews say, because the sadness of his spirit during those days unfitted him for communion with God; (he sorrowed not as one that had no hope;) but, by this solemn pause, and a month's adjournment of the public councils, even now, when time was so very precious to them, God would put an honour upon the memory of Moses, and give time to the people, not only to lament their loss of him, but to repent of their miscarriages toward him during the forty years of his government.

II. The place Joshua had been in before he was thus preferred. He was Moses's minister, that is, an immediate attendant upon his person, and assistant in business. The LXX translate it ὑπεργός, a workman, under Moses, under his direction and command. Observe, 1. He that was here called to honour, had been long bred to business. Our Lord Jesus himself took upon him the form of a servant, and then God highly exalted him. 2. He was trained up in subjection, and under command. Those are fittest to rule, that have learnt to obey. 3. He that was to succeed Moses was intimately acquainted with him, that he might fully know his doctrine and manner of life, his purpose and long-suffering, (2 Tim. 3. 10.) might take the same measures, walk in the same spirit, in the same steps, having to carry on the same work. 4. He was herein a type of Christ, who might therefore be called Moses's Minister, because he was made under the law, and fulfilled all the righteousness of it.

III. The call itself that God gave him, which is very full.

1. The consideration upon which he was called to the government; Moses my servant is dead, v. 2. All good men are God's servants; and it is no disparagement, but an honour, to the greatest of men to be so; angels themselves are his ministers. Moses was called to extraordinary work, was a steward in God's house, and, in the discharge of the trusts reposed in him, he served not himself, but God who employed him; he was faithful as a servant, and, with an eye to the Son, as is intimated, Heb. 3. 5. where what he did is said to be for a testimony of the things that should be spoken after; God will own his servants, will confess them in the great day. But Moses, though God's servant, and one that could ill be spared, is dead; for God will change hands, to shew, that, whatever instruments he uses, he is not tied to any. Moses, when he has done his work as a servant, dies, and goes to rest from his labours, and enters into the joy of his Lord. Observe, God takes notice of the death of his servants. It is precious in his sight, Ps. 116. 15.

2. The call itself; Now therefore arise. (1.) Though Moses is dead, the work must go on, therefore arise, and go about it. Let not weeping hinder sowing, nor the withering of the most useful hands be the weakening of our's; for, when God has work to do, he will either find or make instruments fit to carry it on. Moses, the servant, is dead, but God, the Master, is not, he lives for ever. (2.) "Because Moses is dead, therefore the work devolves upon thee as his successor, for herunto thou wast appointed. Therefore there is need of thee to fill up his place, Up, and be doing." Note, [1.] The removal of useful men should quicken survivors to be so much the more diligent in doing good. Such and such are dead, and we must die shortly, therefore let us work while it is day. [2.] It is a great mercy to a people, if, when useful men are taken away in the midst of their usefulness, others are raised up in their stead to go on where they broke off. Joshua must arise to finish what Moses began, thus the latter generations enter into the labours of the former. And thus Christ, our Joshua, does that for us which could never be done by the law of Moses, justifies, Acts. 13. 39. and sanctifies, Rom. 8. 3. The life of Moses made way for Joshua, and prepared the people for what was to be done by him: thus the law is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ. And then the death of Moses made room for Joshua: thus we are dead to the law of our first husband, that we may be married to Christ, Rom. 7. 4.

3. The particular service he was now called out to. "Arise, go over this Jordan, this river, which you have in view, and on the banks of which you lie encamped." This was a trial to the faith of Joshua, whether he would give orders to make preparation for passing the river, when there was no visible way of getting over it, at least, not at this place, and at this time, when all the banks were overflowed, ch. 3. 15. He had no pontoons, or bridge of boats, by which to convey them over, and yet he must believe that God, having ordered them over, would open a way for them. Going over Jordan was going into Canaan; thither Moses might not, could not, bring them, Deut. 31. 2. Thus the honour of bringing the many sons to glory is reserved for Christ, the Captain of our salvation, Heb. 2. 10.

4. The grant of the land of Canaan to the children of Israel is here repeated, v. 2. 4. I do give it them. To the patriarchs it was promised, I will give it, but now that the fourth generation was expired, the iniquity of the Amorites was full, and the time was come for the performance of the promise, it is actually conveyed, and they are put in possession of that which they had long been in expectation of, "I do give it, enter upon it, it is all your own, nay, v. 3. I have given it; though it be yet unconquered, it is as sure to you as if it were in your hands." Observe, (1.) The persons to whom the conveyance is made, to them, even to the children of Israel, v. 2. because they are the seed of Jacob, who was called Israel then when this promise was made to him, Gen. 35. 10. 12. The children of Israel, though they had been very provoking in the wilderness, yet, for their fathers' sakes, should have the entail preserved. And it was the children of the murmurers that God said should enter Canaan, Numb. 14. 31. (2.) The land itself that is conveyed, from the river Euphrates eastward to the Mediterranean sea westward, v. 4. Though their sin cut them short of this large possession, and they never replenished all the country within the bounds here mentioned; yet, had they been obedient, God would have given them this and much more. Out of all these countries, and many others, there were, in process of time, proselytes to the Jewish religion, as appears, Acts, 2. 5, &c. If their church was enlarged, though their nation was not multiplied, it cannot be said that the promise was of none effect. And if this promise had not its full accomplishment in the letter, believers might thence infer that it had a further meaning, and was to be fulfilled in the kingdom of the Messiah, both that of grace, and that of glory. (3.) The condition is here implied, upon which this grant is made, in those words, as I said unto Moses, that is, "upon the terms that Moses told you of many a time; if ye will keep my statutes, you shall go in and possess that good land. Take it under those provisos and limitations, and not otherwise. The precept and promise must not be separated." (4.) It is intimated with what ease they should gain the possession of this land, if it were not their own fault, in these words, "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon (within the following bounds) shall be your own. Do but set your foot upon it, and you have it."

5. The promises God here makes to Joshua for his encouragement. (1.) That he should be sure of the presence of God with him in this great work to which he was called, v. 5. "As I was with Moses to direct and strengthen him, to own and prosper him, and give him success in bringing Israel out of Egypt, and leading them through the wilderness, so I will be with thee to enable thee to settle them in Canaan." Joshua was sensible how far he came short of Moses, in wisdom and grace, but what Moses did was done by virtue of the presence of God with him; and, though Joshua had not always the same presence of mind that Moses had, yet, if he had always the same presence of God, he would do well enough. Note, It is a great comfort to the rising generation of ministers and Christians, that the same grace which was sufficient for those that went before them, shall not be wanting to them, if they be not wanting to themselves in the improvement of it. It is repeated here again, v. 9. "The Lord thy God is with thee as a God of power, and that power engaged for thee whithersoever thou goest. Note, Those that go where God sends them, shall have him with them wherever they go, and they need desire no more to make them easy and prosperous. (2.) That the presence of God should never be withdrawn from him, I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee, v. 5. Moses had assured him of this, Deut. 31. 8. that though he must now leave him, God never would; and here God himself confirms that word of his servant Moses, (Isa. 44. 26.) and engages never to leave Joshua. We need the presence of God, not only when we are beginning our work to set us in, but in the progress of it, to further us with a continual help. If that at any time fail us, we are gone; but this we may be sure of, that the Lord is with us while we are with him. This promise here made to Joshua is applied to all believers, and improved as an argument against covetousness, Heb. 13. 5. Be content with such things as ye have, for he hath said, I will never leave thee. (3.) That he should have victory over all the enemies of Israel, v. 5. There shall not any man, that comes against thee, be able to stand before thee. Note, There is no standing before those that have God on their side; If he be for us, who can be against us? God promises him clear success, the enemy should not make any head against him; and constant success, all the days of his life; however it might be with Israel when he was gone, all his reign should be graced with triumphs. What Joshua had himself encouraged the people with long ago, Numb. 14. 9. God here encourages him with. (4.) That he should himself have the dividing of this land among the people of Israel, v. 6. It was a great encouragement to him, in beginning this work, that he was sure to see it finished, and his labour should not be in vain. Some make it a reason why he should arm himself with resolution, and be of good courage, because of the bad character of the people whom he must cause to inherit that land; he knew well what a froward discontented people they were, and how unmanageable they had been in his predecessor's time; let him therefore expect vexation from them, and be of good courage.

6. The charge and command he gives to Joshua, which is,

(1.) That he conform himself in every thing to the law of God, and make that his rule, v. 7, 8. God does, as it were, put the book of the law into Joshua's hand; as, when Joash was crowned, they gave him the testimony, 2 Kings, 11. 12. And concerning this book, he is charged, [1.] To meditate therein day and night, that he might understand it, and have it ready to him upon all occasions. If ever any man's business might have excused him from meditation, and other acts of devotion, one would think Joshua's might at this time; it was a great trust that was lodged in his hands, the care of it was enough to fill him, if he had ten souls, and yet he must find time and thoughts for meditation. Whatever affairs of this world we have to mind, we must not neglect the one thing needful. [2.] Not to let it depart out of his mouth, that is, all his orders to the people, and his judgments upon appeals made to him, must be consonant to the law of God; upon all occasions he must speak according to this rule; Isa. 8. 20. Joshua was to maintain and carry on the work that Moses had begun, and therefore he must not only complete the salvation Moses had wrought for them, but must uphold the holy religion he had established among them. There was no occasion to make new laws, but that good thing which was committed to him, he must carefully and faithfully keep, 2 Tim. 1. 14. [3.] He must observe to do according to all this law. To this end he must meditate therein, not for contemplation sake only, or to fill his head with notions, or that he might find something to puzzle the priests with, but that he might, both as a man and as a magistrate, observe to do according to what was written therein; and several things were written there which had particular reference to the business he had now before him, as the laws concerning their wars, the destroying of the Canaanites, and the dividing of Canaan, &c. these he must religiously observe. Joshua was a man of great power and authority, yet he must himself be under command, and do as he is bidden. No man's dignity or dominion, how great soever, sets him above the law of God. Joshua must not only govern by law, and take care that the people observe the law, but he must observe it himself, and so by his own example maintain the honour and power of it. First, He must do what was written; it is not enough to hear and read the word, to commend and admire it, and know and remember it, to talk and discourse of it, but we must do it. Secondly, He must do according to what was written, exactly observing the law as his copy, and doing, not only that which was there required, but in all circumstances according to the appointment. Thirdly, He must do according to all that was written, without exception or reserve, having a respect to all God's commandments, even those which are most displeasing to flesh and blood. Fourthly, He must observe to do so, observe the checks of conscience, the hints of providence, and all the advantages of opportunity; careful observance is necessary to universal obedience. Fifthly, He must not turn from it, either in his own practice, or in any act of government, to the right hand or to the left, for there are errors on both hands, and virtue is in the mean. Sixthly, He must be strong and courageous, that he may do according to the law. So many discouragements there are in the way of duty, that those who will proceed and persevere in it, must put on resolution. And (lastly) to encourage him in his obedience, he assures him, that then he shall do wisely, (as it is in the margin,) and make his way prosperous, v. 7, 8. They that make the word of God their rule, and conscientiously walk by that rule, shall both do well and speed well; it will furnish them with the best maxims by which to order their conversation, Ps. 111. 10. And it will entitle them to the best blessings; God shall give them the desire of their heart.

(2.) That he encourage himself herein with the promise and presence of God, and make those his stay, v. 6. Be strong and of a good courage. And again, v. 7. as if this was the one thing needful, only be strong and very courageous. And he concludes with this, v. 9. Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed. Joshua had long since signalized his valour, in the war with Amalek, and in his dissent from the report of the evil spies, and yet God sees fit thus to inculcate this precept upon him. Those that have grace, have need to be called upon again and again to exercise grace, and to improve in it. Joshua was humble and low in his own eyes, not distrustful of God, and his power, and promise, but diffident of himself, and of his own wisdom, and strength, and sufficiency for the work, especially coming after so great a man as Moses; and therefore God repeats this so often, Be strong and of a good courage; let not the sense of thine own infirmities dishearten thee, God is all-sufficient. Have not I commanded thee? [1.] "I have commanded the work to be done, and therefore it shall be done, how invincible soever the difficulties may seem that lie in the way." Nay, [2.] "I have commanded, called, and commissioned thee to do it, and therefore will be sure to own thee and strengthen thee, and bear thee out in it." Note, When we are in the way of our duty, we have reason to be strong and very courageous; and it will help very much to animate and embolden us, if we keep our eye upon the divine warrant, and hear God saying, Have not I commanded thee? I will therefore help thee, succeed thee, accept thee, reward thee." Our Lord Jesus, as Joshua here, was borne up under his sufferings by a regard to the will of God, and the commandment he had received from his Father, John, 10. 18.

10. Then Joshua commanded the officers of the people, saying, 11. Pass through the host, and command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals; for within three days ye shall pass over this Jordan, to go in to possess the land, which the LORD your God giveth you to possess it. 12. And to the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to half the tribe of Manasseh, spake Joshua, saying, 13. Remember the word which Moses the servant of the LORD commanded you, saying, The LORD your God hath given you rest, and hath given you this land. 14. Your wives, your little ones, and your cattle, shall remain in the land which Moses gave you on this side Jordan; but ye shall pass before your brethreen armed, all the mighty men of valour, and help them; 15. Until the LORD have given your brethren rest, as he hath given you, and they also have possessed the land which the LORD your God giveth them: then ye shall return unto the land of your possession, and enjoy it, which Moses the LORD's servant gave you on this side Jordan toward the sun-rising.

Joshua, being settled in the government, immediately applies himself to business; not to take state or to take his pleasures, but to further the work of God among the people over which God had set him. As he that desires the office of a minister, (1 Tim. 3. 1.) so he that desires the office of a magistrate, desires a work, a good work; neither is preferred to be idle.

I. He issues out orders to the people to provide for a march; and they had been so long encamped in their present post, that it would be a work of some difficulty to decamp. The officers of the people that commanded under Joshua in their respective tribes and families, attended him for orders, which they were to transmit to the people. Inferior magistrates are as necessary and as serviceable to the public good in their places as the supreme magistrate in his. What could Joshua have done without officers? We are therefore required to be subject, not only to the king as supreme, but to governors, as to them that are sent by him, 1 Pet. 2. 13, 14. By these officers, 1. Joshua gives public notice, that they were to pass over Jordan within three days. These orders, I suppose, were not given till after the return of the spies that were sent to bring an account of Jericho, though the story of that affair follows, ch. 2. And perhaps that was such an instance of his jealousy, and expressive caution, as made it necessary that he should be so often bidden as he was, to be strong and of a good courage. Observe, with what assurance Joshua says it to the people, because God had said to him, Ye shall pass over Jordan, and shall possess the land. We greatly honour the truth of God, when we stagger not at the promise of God. 2. He gives them directions to prepare victuals, not to prepare transport vessels; he that bore them out of Egypt upon eagles' wings, would in like manner bear them into Canaan, to bring them to himself, Exod. 19. 4. But those that were minded to have other victuals beside the manna, which had not yet ceased, must prepare it, and have it ready against the time appointed. Perhaps, though the manna did not quite cease till they were come into Canaan, (ch. 5. 12.) yet since they were come into a land inhabited, (Exod. 16. 35.) where they might be furnished in part with other provisions, it did not fall so plentifully, nor did they gather so much as when they had it first given them in the wilderness, but decreased gradually, and therefore they are ordered to provide other victuals, in which perhaps was included all other things necessary to their march. And some of the Jewish writers considering that having manna, they needed not to provide other victuals, understand it figuratively, that they must repent of their sins, and make their peace with God, and resolve to live a new life, that they might be ready to receive this great favour. See Exod. 19. 10, 11.

II. He reminds the two tribes and a half of the obligation they were under to go over Jordan with their brethren, though they left their possessions and families on this side. Interest would make the other tribes glad to go over Jordan, but in these it was an act of self-denial, and against the grain: therefore it was needful to produce the agreement which Moses had made with them, when he gave them their possession before their brethren, (v. 13.) Remember the word which Moses commanded you. Some of them perhaps were ready to think now that Moses was dead, who they thought was too hard upon them in this matter, they might find some excuse or other to discharge themselves from this engagement, or might prevail with Joshua to dispense with them; but he holds them to it, and lets them know, though Moses was dead, his commands and their promises were still in full force. He reminds them, 1. Of the advantages they had received in being first settled: "The Lord your God hath given you rest, given your minds rest, you know what you have to trust to, and are not as the rest of the tribes, waiting the issue of the war first and then of the lot. He has also given your families rest, your wives and children, whose settlement is your satisfaction. He has given you rest, by giving you this land, this good land, which you are in full and quiet possession of." Note, When God by his providence has given us rest, we ought to consider how we may honour him with the advantages of it, and what service we may do to our brethren who are unsettled, or not so well settled as we are. When God had given David rest, (2 Sam. 7. 1.) see how restless he was till he had found out a habitation for the ark, Ps. 132. 4, 5. When God has given us rest, we must take heed of slothfulness, and of settling upon our lees. 2. He reminds them of their agreement to help their brethren in the wars of Canaan, till God had in like manner given them rest, v. 14, 15. This was, (1.) Reasonable in itself: so closely were all the tribes incorporated, that they must needs look upon themselves as members one of another. (2.) It was enjoined them by Moses, the servant of the Lord; he commanded them to do this, and Joshua his successor would see his commands observed. (3.) It was the only expedient they had to save themselves from the guilt of a great sin in settling on that side Jordan, a sin which would one time or other find them out, Numb. 32. 23. (4.) It was the condition of the grant Moses had made them of the land they were possessed of, so that they could not be sure of a good title to, or a comfortable enjoyment of, the land of their possession, as it is here called, (v. 15.) if they did not fulfil the condition. (5.) They themselves had covenanted and agreed thereunto, (Numb. 32. 25.) Thy servants will do as my Lord commandeth. Thus we all lie under manifold obligations to strengthen the hands one of another, and not to seek our own welfare only, but one another's.

16. And they answered Joshua, saying, All that thou commandest us, we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us we will go. 17. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee: only the LORD thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses. 18. Whosoever he be that doth rebel against thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy words in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to death: only be strong and of a good courage.

This answer was given not by the two tribes and a half only, (though they are spoken of immediately before,) but by the officers of all the people, (v. 10.) as their representatives, concurring with the divine appointment, by which Joshua was set over them, and they did it heartily, and with a great deal of cheerfulness and resolution.

1. They promise him obedience, (v. 16.) not only as subjects to their prince, but as soldiers to their general, of whose particular orders they are to be observant; he that hath soldiers under him, saith to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; Matth. 8. 9. Thus the people of Israel here engage themselves to Joshua, "All that thou commandest us to do we will readily do, without murmuring or disputing; and whithersoever thou sendest us, though upon the most difficult and perilous expedition, we will go." We must thus swear allegiance to our Lord Jesus, as the Captain of our salvation, and bind ourselves to do what he commands us by his word, and to go whither he sends us by his providence.

And since Joshua, being humbly conscious to himself how far short he came of Moses, feared he should not have such influence upon the people, and such an interest in them, as Moses had, they here promise that they would be as obedient to him as ever they had been to Moses, v. 17. To speak truth, they had no reason to boast of their obedience to Moses, he had found them a stiff-necked people, Deut. 9. 24. But they mean that they would be as observant of Joshua as they should have been, and as some of them were (the generality of them at least sometimes) of Moses. Note, We must not so magnify them that are gone, how eminent soever they were, either in the magistracy or in the ministry, as to be wanting in the honour and duty we owe to those that survive and succeed them, though in gifts they may come short of them. Obedience for conscience sake will continue, though Providence change the hands by which it rules and acts.

2. They pray for the presence of God with him, v. 17. "Only the Lord thy God be with thee, to bless and prosper thee, and give thee success, as he was with Moses." Prayers and supplications are to be made for all in authority, 1 Tim. 2. 1, 2. And the best thing we can ask of God for our magistrates, is, that they may have the presence of God with them; that will make them blessings to us, so that in seeking this for them, we consult our own interest. A reason is here intimated, why they would obey him as they had obeyed Moses, because they believed (and in faith prayed) that God's presence would be with him, as it was with Moses. Those that we have reason to think have favour from God, should have honour and respect from us. Some understand it as a limitation of their obedience; "We will obey only as far as we perceive the Lord is with thee, but no further. While thou keepest close to God, we will keep close to thee; hitherto shall our obedience come, but no further." But they were so far from having any suspicion of Joshua's deviating from the divine rule, that there needed not such a proviso.

3. They pass an act to make it death for any Israelite to disobey Joshua's orders, or rebel against his commandment, v. 13. Perhaps, if such a law had been made in Moses's time, it might have prevented many of the rebellions that were formed against him, or most men fear the sword of the magistrate more than the justice of God. Yet there was a special reason for the making of this law, now that they were entering upon the wars of Canaan, for, in time of war, the severity of military discipline is more necessary than at other times. Some think, that in this statute they have an eye to that law concerning the prophet God would raise up like unto Moses, which, they think, though it refer chiefly to Christ, yet takes in Joshua by the way, as a type of him, that whosoever would not hearken to him, should be cut off from his people, Deut. 18. 19. I will require it of him.

4. They animate him to go on with cheerfulness in the work to which God had called him; and, in desiring that he would be strong, and of a good courage, they do, in effect, promise him that they would do all they could, by an exact, bold, and cheerful observance of all his orders, to encourage him. It very much heartens those that lead in a good work, to see those that follow, follow with a good will. Joshua, though of approved valour, did not take it as an affront, but as a great kindness, for the people to bid him be strong, and of a good courage.

CHAP. II.

I. This we have an account of the scouts that were employed to bring an account to Joshua of the posture of the city of Jericho; Observe here, I. How Joshua sent them, v. 1. II. How Rahab received them, and protected them, and told a lie for them, v. 2. 7. so that they escaped out of the hands of the enemy. III. The account she gave them of the present posture of Jericho, and the panic-fear they were struck with upon the approach of Israel, v. 8. 11. IV. The bargain she made with them for the security of herself and her relations in the ruin she saw coming upon her city, v. 12. 21. V. Their safe return to Joshua, and the account they gave him of their expedition, v. 22. 24. And that which makes this story most remarkable, is, that Rahab, the person principally concerned in it, is twice celebrated in the New Testament, as a great believer, Heb. 11. 31. and as one whose faith proved itself by good works, James, 2. 25.

I. AND Joshua the son of Nun sent out of Shittim two men to spy secretly, saying, Go view the land, even Jericho. And they went, and came into an harlot's house, named Rahab, and lodged there. 2. And it was told the king of Jericho, saying, Behold, there came men in hither to-night of the children of Israel to search out the country. 3. And the king of Jericho sent unto Rahab, saying, Bring forth the men that are come to thee, which are entered into thine house, for they be come to search out all the country. 4. And the woman took the two men, and hid them, and said thus, There came men unto me, but I wist not whence they were: 5. And it came to pass about the time of shutting of the gate, when it was dark, that the men went out: whither the men went, I wot not: pursue after them quickly; for ye shall overtake them. 6. But she had brought them up to the roof of the house, and hid them with the stalks of flax, which she had laid in order upon the roof. 7. And the men pursued after them the way to Jordan unto the fords: and as soon as they which pursued after them were gone out, they shut the gate.

In these verses we have,

I. The prudence of Joshua, in sending spies to observe this important pass, which was likely to be disputed at the entrance of Israel into Canaan, v. 1. Go view the land, even Jericho. Moses had sent spies, Numb. 13. (Joshua himself was one of them,) and it proved of ill consequence: yet Joshua now sends spies, not as the former were sent, to survey the whole land, but Jericho only; not to bring the account to the whole congregation, but to Joshua only, who, like a watchful general, was continually projecting for the public good, and was particularly careful to take the first step well, and not to stumble at the threshold. It was not fit that Joshua should venture over Jordan, to make his remarks incognito—in disguise, but he sends two men, two young men (say the LXX.) to view the land, that from their report he might take his measures in attacking Jericho. Observe, 1. There is no remedy, but great men must see with other people's eyes, which makes it very necessary that they be cautious in the choice of those they employ, since so much often depends on their fidelity. 2. Faith in God's promise ought not to supersede, but encourage, our diligence in the use of proper means. Joshua is sure he has God with him, and yet sends men before him. We do not trust God, but tempt him, if our expectations slacken our endeavours. See how ready these men were to go upon this hazardous enterprise; though they put their lives in their hands, yet they ventured, in obedience to Joshua their general, in zeal for the service of the camp, and in dependence upon the power of that God who, being the Keeper of Israel in general, is the Protector of every particular Israelite in the way of his duty.

II. The providence of God, directing the spies to the house of Rahab. How they got over Jordan we are not told, but into Jericho they came, which was about seven or eight miles from the river, and there, seeking for a convenient inn, were directed to the house of Rahab, here called a harlot; a woman that had formerly been of ill fame, the reproach of which stuck to her name, though of late she had repented and reformed. Simon the leper, (Matth. 26. 6.) though cleansed from his leprosy, wore the reproach of it in his name as long as he lived; so Rahab the harlot, and she is so called in the New Testament, where both her faith and her good works are praised; to teach us, 1. That the greatness of sin is no bar to pardoning mercy, if it be truly repented of in time. We read of publicans and harlots entering into the kingdom of the Messiah, and being welcomed to all the privileges of that kingdom, Matth. 21. 31. (2.) That there are many, who before their conversion were very wicked and vile, and yet afterward come to great eminence in faith and holiness. 3. Even those that through grace have repented of the sins of their youth, must expect to bear the reproach of them, and when they hear of their old faults must renew their repentance; and, as an evidence of that, hear of them patiently.

God's Israel, for aught that appears, had but one friend, but one well-wisher in all Jericho, and that was Rahab, a harlot. God has often served his own purposes and his church's interests by men of indifferent morals. Had these scouts gone to any other house than this, they had certainly been betrayed, and put to death without mercy. But God knew where they had a friend that would be true to them, though they did not, and directed them thither. Thus, that which seems to us most contingent and accidental is often overruled by the Divine Providence, to serve its great ends. And those that faithfully acknowledge God in their ways, he will guide them with his eye. See Jer. 36. 19, 26.

III. The piety of Rahab in receiving and protecting these Israelites. Those that keep public-houses entertain all comers, and think themselves obliged to be civil to their guests. But Rahab shewed her guests more than common civility, and went upon an uncommon principle in what she did; it was by faith that she received those with peace, against whom her king and country had denounced war, Heb. 11. 31. 1. She bid them welcome to her house, they lodged there, though it appears, by what she said to them, v. 9. she knew both whence they came, and what their business was. 2. Perceiving that they were observed coming into the city, and that umbrage was taken at it, she hid them upon the roof of the house, which was flat, and covered them with stalks of flax, (v. 6.) so that, if the officers should come thither to search for them, there they might lie undiscovered. By these stalks of flax, which she herself had laid in order upon the roof to dry in the sun, in order to the beating of it, and making it ready for the wheel, it appears she had one of the good characters of the virtuous women, however in others of them she might be deficient, that she sought wool and flax, and wrought willingly with her hands, Prov. 31. 13. From which instance of her honest industry, one would hope, that, whatever she had been formerly, she was not now a harlot. 3. When she was examined concerning them, she denied they were in her house, turned off the officers that had a warrant to search for them with a sham, and so secured them. No marvel that the king of Jericho sent to inquire after them, v. 2, 3. he had cause to fear when the enemy was at his door, and his fear made him suspicious and jealous of all strangers; he had reason to demand from Rahab that she should bring forth the men, to be dealt with as spies; but Rahab not only disowned that she knew them, or where they were, but, that no further search might be made for them in the city, told the pursuers they were gone away again, and in all probability might be overtaken, v. 4, 5.

Now, (1.) We are sure this was a good work: it is canonized by the apostle, James, 2. 25. where she is said to be justified by works, and this is instanced in that she received the messengers, and sent them out another way, and she did it by faith, such a faith as set her above the fear of man, even of the wrath of the king. She believed, upon the report she had heard of the wonders wrought for Israel, that their God was the only true God, and that therefore their declared design upon Canaan would undoubtedly take effect, and in this faith she sided with them, protected them, and courted their favour. Had she said, "I believe God is your's, and Canaan your's, but I dare not shew you any kindness," her faith had been dead and inactive, and would not have justified her. But by this it appeared to be both alive and lively, that she exposed herself to the utmost peril, even of life, in obedience to her faith.

Note, Those only are true believers, that can find in their hearts to venture for God; and those that by faith take the Lord for their God, take his people for their people, and cast in their lot among them. They that have God for their refuge and hiding-place, must testify their gratitude by their readiness to shelter his people when there is occasion: let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Isa. 16. 3, 4. And we must be glad of an opportunity of testifying the sincerity and zeal of our love to God, by hazardous services to his church and kingdom among men.

But, (2.) There is that in it which it is not easy to justify, and yet it must be justified, or else it could not be so good a work as to justify her. [1.] It is plain that she betrayed her country by harbouring the enemies of it, and aiding those that were designing its destruction, which could not consist with her allegiance to her prince, and her affection and duty to the community she was a member of. But that which justifies her in this, is, that she knew the Lord had given them this land, v. 9. knew it by the incontestable miracles God had wrought for them, which confirmed that grant; and her obligations to God were higher than her obligations to any other. If she knew God had given them this land, it would have been a sin to join with those that hindered them from possessing it. But, since no such grant of any land to any people can now be proved, this will by no means justify any such treacherous practices against the public welfare. [2.] It is plain that she deceived the officers that examined her, with an untruth. That she knew not whence the men were, that they were gone out, that she knew not whither they were gone. What shall we say to this? If she had either told the truth, or been silent, she had betrayed the spies, and that had certainly been a great sin: and it does not appear that she had another way of concealing them, than by this ironical direction to the officers to pursue them another way, which if they would suffer themselves to be deceived by, let them be deceived. None are bound to accuse themselves, or their friends, of that which, though inquired after as a crime, they know to be a virtue. This case was altogether extraordinary, and therefore cannot be drawn into a precedent; and that may be justified here, which would be by no means lawful in a common case. Rahab knew, by what was already done on the other side Jordan, that no mercy was to be shewed to the Canaanites, and from thence inferred, if mercy were not owing them, truth was not; they that might be destroyed, might be deceived. Yet divines generally conceive that it was a sin, which however admitted of this extenuation, that, being a Canaanite, she was not better taught the evil of lying; but God accepted her faith, and pardoned her infirmity: however it was in this case, we are sure it is our duty to speak every man the truth to his neighbour, to dread and detest lying, and never to do evil, that evil, that good may come of it, Rom. 3. 8. But God accepts what is sincerely and honestly intended, though there be a mixture of frailty and folly in it, and is not extreme to mark what we do amiss. Some suggest, that what she said might possibly be true of some other men.*

8. And before they were laid down, she came up unto them upon the roof; 9. And she said unto the men, I know that the Lord hath given you the land, and that your terror is fallen upon us, and that all the inhabitants of the land faint because of you. 10. For we have heard how the LORD dried up the water of the Red sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites, that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed. 11. And

* However the guilt of Rahab's falsehood may be extenuated, it seems best to admit nothing which tends to explain it away. We are sure that God discriminated between what was good in her conduct, and what was bad, rewarding the former, and pardoning the latter. Her views of the divine law must have been exceedingly dim and contracted; a similar falsehood, told by those who enjoy the light of revelation, however laudable the motive, would of course deserve much heavier censure.

as soon we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man, because of you: for the LORD your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath. 12. Now therefore, I pray you, swear unto me by the LORD, since I have shewed you kindness, that ye will also shew kindness unto my father's house, and give me a true token: 13. And that ye will save alive my father, and my mother, and my brethren, and my sisters, and all that they have, and deliver our lives from death. 14. And the men answered her, Our life for your's, if ye utter not this our business. And it shall be, when the LORD hath given us the land, that we will deal kindly and truly with thee. 15. Then she let them down by a cord through the window: for her house was upon the town wall, and she dwelt upon the wall. 16. And she said unto them, Get you to the mountain, lest the pursuers meet you; and hide yourselves there three days, until the pursuers be returned: and afterward may ye go your way. 17. And the men said unto her, We will be blameless of this thine oath which thou hast made us swear. 18. Behold, when we come into the land, thou shalt bind this line of scarlet thread in the window which thou didst let us down by: and thou shalt bring thy father, and thy mother, and thy brethren, and all thy father's household, home unto thee. 19. And it shall be, that whosoever shall go out of the doors of thy house into the street, his blood shall be upon his head, and we will be guiltless: and whosoever shall be with thee in the house, his blood shall be on our head, if any hand be upon him. 20. And if thou utter this our business, then we will be quit of thine oath which thou hast made us to swear. 21. And she said, According unto your words, so be it. And she sent them away, and they departed: and she bound the scarlet line in the window.

The matter is here settled between Rahab and the spies, respecting the service she was now to do for them, and the favour they were afterward to shew to her. She secures them, on condition that they should secure her.

1. She gives them, and by them sends to Joshua and Israel, all the encouragement that could be desired, to make their intended descent upon Canaan. This was what they came for, and it was worth coming for. Being got clear of the officers, she comes up to them to the roof of the house where they lay hid, finds them perhaps somewhat dismayed at the peril they apprehended themselves in from the officers, and scarcely recovered from the fright, but has that to say to them which will give them abundant satisfaction. 1. She lets them know that the report of the great things God had done for them was come to Jericho, v. 10. not only that they had an account of their late victories obtained over the Amorites, in the neighbouring country, on the other side the river, but that their miraculous deliverance out of Egypt, and passage through the Red sea, a great way off, and forty years ago, were remembered and talked of afresh in Jericho, to the amazement of every body. Thus this Joshua and his fellows were men wondered at, Zecl. 3.8. See how God makes his wonderful works to be remembered, Ps. 111.4. so that men shall speak of the might of his terrible acts, Ps. 145.6. 2. She tells them what impressions the tidings of these things had made upon the Canaanites, your terror has fallen upon us, v. 9. our hearts did melt, v. 11. If she kept a public house, that would give her an opportunity of understanding the sense of various companies, and of travellers from other parts of the country; so that they could not know this any way better than by her information; and it would be of great use to Joshua and Israel to know it, it would put courage into the most cowardly Israelite to hear how their enemies were dispirited; and it was easy to conclude, that they, who now fainted before them, would infallibly fall before them: especially because it was the accomplishment of a promise God had made them, that he would lay the fear and dread of them upon all this land, Dent. 11.25. and so it would be an earnest of the accomplishment of all the other promises God had made them. Let not the stout man glory in his courage, any more than the strong man in his strength, for God can weaken both mind and body. Let not God's Israel be afraid of their most powerful enemies, for their God can, when he pleases, make their most powerful enemies afraid of them. Let none think to harden their hearts against God and prosper, for he that made man's soul can at any time make the sword of his terrors approach to it. 3. She hereupon makes the profession of her faith in God and his promise; and perhaps there was not found so great faith (all things considered,) no, not in Israel, as in this woman of Canaan. (1.) She believes God's power and dominion over all the world, v. 11. "Jehovah your God, whom you worship and call upon, is so far above all gods, that he is the only true God; for he is God in heaven above and in earth beneath, and is served by all the hosts of both." A vast distance there is between heaven and earth, yet both are equally under the inspection and government of the great Jehovah. Heaven is not above his power, nor earth below his cognizance. (2.) She believes his promise to his people Israel, v. 9. I know that the Lord hath given you the land. The king of Jericho had heard as much as she had of the great things God has done for Israel, yet he cannot infer from thence that the Lord had given them this land, but resolves to hold it out against them to the last extremity: for the most powerful means of conviction will not of themselves attain the end without divine grace, and by that grace, Rahab the harlot, who had only heard of the wonders God had wrought, speaks with more assurance of the truth of the promise made to the fathers, than all the elders of Israel had done, who were eye-witnesses of those wonders, many of whom perished through unbelief of this promise. Blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed; so Rahab did; O woman, great is thy faith!

II. She engaged them to take her and her relations under their protection, that they might not perish in the destruction of Jericho, v. 12, 13. Now, 1. It was an evidence of the sincerity and strength of her faith concerning the approaching revolution in her country, that she was so solicitous to make an interest for herself with the Israelites, and courted their kindness. She foresaw the conquest of her country, and in the belief of that bespoke in time the favour of the conquerors. Thus Noah, being moved with fear, prepared an ark to the saving of his house, and the condemning of the world, Heb. 11.7. They who truly believe the divine revelation, concerning the ruin of sinners, and the grant of the heavenly land to God's Israel, will give diligence to flee from the wrath to come, and to lay hold on eternal life, by joining themselves to God and to his people. 2. The provision she made for the safety of her relations, as well as for her own, is a laudable instance of natural affection, and an intimation to us in like manner to do all we can for the salvation of the souls of those that are dear to us, and, with ourselves, to bring them, if possible, into the bond of the covenant. No mention is made of her husband and children, but only her parents, and brothers, and sisters, whom, though she was herself a housekeeper, she retained a due concern for. 3. Her request, that they would swear unto her by Jehovah, is an instance of her acquaintance with the only true God, and her faith in him, and devotion toward him, one act of which is religiously to swear by his name. 4. Her petition is very just and reasonable, that, since she had protected them, they should protect her; and since her kindness to them extended to their people, for whom they were now negotiating, their kindness to her should take in all her's. It was the least they could do for one that had saved their lives with the hazard of her own. Note, Those that shew mercy may expect to find mercy. Observe, She does not demand any preferment by way of reward for her kindness to them, though they lay so much at her mercy that she might have made her own terms, but only indents for her life, which in a general destruction would be a singular favour. Thus God promised Ebed-Melech, in recompence for his kindness to Jeremiah, that in the worst of times he should have his life for a prey, Jer. 39. 18. Yet this Rahab was afterward advanced to be a princess in Israel, the wife of Salmon, and one of the ancestors of Christ, Matth. 1. 5. Those that faithfully serve Christ, and suffer for him, he will not only protect, but prefer, and will do for them more than they are able to ask or think.

III. They solemnly engaged for her preservation in the common destruction, v. 14. "Our life for your's. We will take as much care of your lives as of our own, and would as soon hurt ourselves as any of you." Nay, they imprecate God's judgments on themselves, if they should violate their promise to her. She had pawned her life for their's, and now they in requital pawn their lives for her's, and (as public persons) with them they pawn the public faith and the credit of their nation, for they plainly interest all Israel in the engagement in those words, When the Lord has given us the land, meaning not themselves only, but the people whose agents they were. No doubt, they knew themselves sufficiently authorised to treat with Rahab concerning this matter, and were confident that Joshua would ratify what they did, else they had not dealt honestly; the general law, that they should make no covenant with the Canaanites, (Deut. 7. 2.) did not forbid them to take under their protection a particular person, that was heartily come into their interests, and had done them real kindnesses: The law of gratitude is one of the laws of nature. Now observe here,

1. The promises they made her. In general, "We will deal kindly and truly with thee, v. 14. We will not only be kind in promising now, but true in performing what we promise; and not only true in performing just what we promise; but kind in outdoing thy demands and expectations." The goodness of God is often expressed by his kindness and truth, (Ps. 117. 2.) and in both these we must be followers of him. In particular, "If a hand be upon any in the house with thee, his blood shall be on our head, v. 19. If hurt come, through our carelessness to those whom we are obliged to protect, we thereby contract guilt, and blood will be found a heavy load."

2. The provisos and limitations of their promises. Though they were in haste, and it may be in some confusion, yet we find them very cautious in settling this agreement, and the terms of it, not to bind themselves to more than was fit for them to perform. Note, Covenants must be made with care, and we must swear in judgment, lest we find ourselves perplexed and entangled, when it is too late, after vows, to make inquiry. They that will be conscientious in keeping their promises, will be cautious in making them, and perhaps may insert conditions which others may think frivolous.

Their promise is here accompanied with three provisos, and they were necessary ones. They will protect Rahab, and all her relations always, provided, (1.) That she tie the scarlet cord, with which she was now about to let them down, in the window of her house, v. 18. This was to be a mark upon the house, which the spies would take care to give notice of to the camp of Israel, that no soldier, how hot and eager soever he was in military executions, might offer any violence to the house that was thus distinguished. This was like the blood sprinkled upon the door-post, which secured the first-born from the destroying angel, and, being of the same colour, some allude to this also, to represent the safety of believers, under the protection of the blood of Christ sprinkled on the conscience. The same cord that she made use of for the preservation of these Israelites was to be made use of for her preservation. What we serve and honour God with, we may expect he will bless and make comfortable to us. (2.) That she should have all those whose safety she had desired in the house with her, and keep them there; and that, at the time of taking the town, none of them should dare to stir out of doors, v. 18, 19. This was a necessary proviso, for Rahab's kindred could not be distinguished any other way than by being in her distinguished house; should they mingle themselves with their neighbours, there was no remedy, but the sword would devour one as well as another. It was a reasonable proviso, that, since they were saved purely for Rahab's sake, her house should have the honour of being their castle; and that, if they would not perish with them that believed not, they should thus far believe the certainty and severity of the ruin coming upon their city, as to retire into a place made safe by promise, as Noah into the ark, and Lot into Zoar, and should save themselves from this untoward generation, by separating from them. It was likewise a significant proviso, intimating to us, that those who are added to the church, that they may be saved, must keep close to the society of the faithful, and, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust, must take heed of being again entangled therein. (3.) That she should keep counsel, v. 14, 20. If thou utter this our business, that is, "If thou betray us when we are gone, or if thou make this agreement public, so as that others tie scarlet lines in their windows, and so confound us, then we will be quit of thine oath." They are unworthy of the secret of the Lord, that know not how to keep it to themselves when there is occasion.

IV. She then took effectual care to secure her new friends, and sent them out another way, James, 2. 25. Having fully understood the bargain they made with her, and consented to it, v. 21. she then let them down by a cord over the city wall, v. 15. the situation of her house befriending them herein: Thus Paul made his escape out of Damascus, 2 Cor. 11. 33. She also directed them which way to go for their own safety, being better acquainted with the country than they were, v. 16. She directs them to leave the high road, and abscond in the mountains till the pursuers were returned, for till then they could not safely venture over Jordan. Those that are in the way of God and their duty, may expect that Providence will protect them, but that will not excuse them from taking all prudent methods for their own safety. God will keep us, but then we must not wilfully expose ourselves. Providence must be trusted, but not tempted. Calvin thinks that their charge to Rahab to keep this matter secret, and not to utter it, was intended for her safety, lest she, boasting of her security from the sword of Israel, should, before they came to protect her, fall into the hands of the king of Jericho, and be put to death for treason: thus do they prudently advise her for her safety, as she advised them for their's. And it is good advice, which we should at any time be thankful for, to take heed to ourselves.

22. And they went, and came unto the mountain, and abode there three days, until the pursuers were returned: and the pursuers sought them throughout all the way, but found them not.

23. So the two men returned, and descended from the mountain, and passed over, and came to Joshua the son of Nun, and told him all things that befell them: 24. And they said unto Joshua, Truly the Lord hath delivered into our hands all the land; for even all the inhabitants of the country do faint because of us.

We have here the safe return of the spies Joshua had sent, and the great encouragement they brought with them to Israel to proceed in their descent upon Canaan. Had they been minded to discourage the people, as the evil spies did that Moses sent, they might have told them what they had observed of the height and strength of the walls of Jericho, and the extraordinary vigilance of the king of Jericho, and how narrowly they escaped out of his hands: but they were of another spirit, and, depending themselves upon the divine promise, they animated Joshua likewise.

1. Their return in safety was itself an encouragement to Joshua, and a token for good. That God provided for them so good a friend as Rahab was, in an enemy's country, and that, notwithstanding the rage of the king of Jericho, and the eagerness of the pursuers, they were come back in peace, was such an instance of God's great care concerning them for Israel's sake, as might assure the people of the divine conduct and care they were under, which would undoubtedly make the progress of their arms glorious. He, that so wonderfully protected their scouts, would preserve their men of war, and cover their heads in the day of battle.

2. The report they brought was much more encouraging, v. 24. "All the inhabitants of the country, though resolved to stand it out, yet do faint because of us, they have neither wisdom to yield, nor courage to fight;" whence they conclude, "Truly the Lord has delivered into our hands all the land, it is all our own, we have nothing to do, in effect, but to take possession." Sinners' frights are sometimes sure presages of their fall. If we resist our spiritual enemies, they will flee before us, which will encourage us to hope that in due time we shall be more than conquerors.

CHAP. III.

*This chapter, and that which follows it, gives us the history of Israel's passing through Jordan into Canaan, and a very memorable history it is. Long after, they are bid to remember what God did for them between Shittim (whence they decamped, v. 1.) and Gilgal, where they next pitched, ch. 4. 19. Mic. 6. 5. That they might know the righteousness of the Lord. By Joshua's order they marched up to the river's side, v. 1. and then almighty power led them through it. They passed through the Red sea unexpectedly, and in their flight by night, but they have notice some time before of their passing through Jordan, and their expectations raised. I. The people are directed to follow the ark, v. 2. .4. II. They are commanded to sanctify themselves, v. 5. III. The priests with the ark are ordered to lead the van, v. 6. IV. Joshua is magnified and made commander in chief, v. 7, 8. V. Public notice is given of what God is about to do for them, v. 9. .13. VI. The thing is done, Jordan is divided, and Israel brought safely through it, v. 14. .17. This was the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes.*

1. AND Joshua rose early in the morning; and they removed from Shittim, and came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel, and lodged there before they passed over. 2. And it came to pass after three days, that the officers went through the host; 3. And they commanded the people, saying, When ye see the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it. 4. Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits by measure: come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go: for ye have not passed this way heretofore. 5. And Joshua said unto the people, Sanctify yourselves: for to-morrow the LORD will do wonders among you. 6. And Joshua spake unto the priests, saying, Take up the ark of the covenant, and pass over before the people. And they took up the ark of the covenant, and went before the people.

Rahab, in mentioning to the spies the drying up of the Red sea, ch. 2. 10. as the report of which terrified the Canaanites more than any thing else, intimates, that they on that side the water expected that Jordan, that great defence of their country, would in like manner give way to them; whether the Israelites had any expectation of it, does not appear. God often did things for them which they looked not for, Isa. 64. 3. Now here we are told,

1. That they came to Jordan, and lodged there, v. 1. Though they were not yet told how they should pass the river, and were unprovided for the passing of it in any ordinary way, yet they went forward in faith, having been to'd, ch. 1. 11. that they should pass it. We must go on in the way of our duty, though we foresee difficulties, trusting God to help us through them, when we come to them. Let us proceed as far as we can, and depend on divine sufficiency for that which we find ourselves not sufficient for. In this march Joshua led them, and particular notice is taken of his early rising; as there is afterward upon other occasions, ch. 6. 12. —7. 16.—8. 10. which intimates how little he loved his ease, how much he loved his business, and what care and pains he was willing to take in it. Those that would bring great things to pass must rise early. Love not sleep, lest thou come to poverty. Joshua herein set a good example to the officers under him, and taught them to rise early, and to all that are in public stations especially to attend continually to the duty of their place.

II. That the people were directed to follow the ark; officers were appointed to go through the host to give these directions, v. 2. that every Israelite might know both what to do, and what to depend upon.

1. They might depend upon the ark to lead them; that is, upon God himself, of whose presence the ark was an instituted sign and token. It seems, the pillar of cloud and fire was removed, else that had led them, unless we suppose that that now hovered over the ark, and so they had a double guide; honour was put upon the ark, and a defence upon that glory. It is called here the ark of the covenant of the Lord their God. What greater encouragement could they have than this, That the Lord was their God, a God in covenant with them? Here was the ark of the covenant; if God be our's, we need not to fear any evil. He was nigh to them, present with them, went before them: What could come amiss to them that were thus guided, thus guarded? Formerly, the ark was carried in the midst of the camp, but now it went before them to search out a resting-place for them, Numb. 10. 33. and, as it were, to give them livery and seisin of the promised land, and put them in possession of it. In the ark the tables of the law were, and over it the mercy-seat, for the divine law and grace reigning in the heart are the surest pledges of God's presence and favour; and those that would be led to the heavenly Canaan must take the law of God for their guide, (if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments,) and have the great Propitiation in their eye, looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

2. They might depend upon the priests and Levites, who were appointed for that purpose to carry the ark before them. The work of ministers is to hold forth the word of life, and to take care of the administration of those ordinances which are the tokens of God's presence, and the instruments of his power and grace; and herein they must go before the people of God in their way to heaven.

3. The people must follow the ark. Remove from your place, and go after it; (1.) As those that are resolved never to forsake it; wherever God's ordinances are, there we must be; if they flit, we must remove, and go after them. (2.) As those that are entirely satisfied in its guidance, that it will lead, in the best way, to the best end; and, therefore, Lord, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest. This must be all their care, to attend the motions of the ark, and follow it with an implicit faith. This must we walk after the rule of the word, and the direction of the Spirit, in every thing, so shall peace be upon us, as it now was upon the Israel of God. They must follow the priests as far as they carried the ark, but no further; so we must follow our ministers only as they follow Christ.

4. In following the ark, they must keep their distance, v. 4. They must none of them come within a thousand yards of the ark. (1.) They must thus express their awful and reverent regard to that token of God's presence, lest its familiarity with them should breed contempt. This charge to them, not to come near, was agreeable to that dispensation of darkness, bondage, and terror: but we now, through Christ, have access with boldness. (2.) Thus it was made to appear, that the ark was able to protect itself, and needed not to be guarded by the men of war, but was itself a guard to them. With what a noble defiance of the enemy did it leave all its friends half a mile behind, but the unarmed priests that carried it, as perfectly sufficient for its own safety and their's that followed it! (3.) Thus it was the better seen by those that were to be led by it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go, seeing it, as it were, chalked out or tracked by the ark. Had they been allowed to come near it, they would have surrounded it, and none would have had the sight of it but those that were close to it; but, as it was put at such a distance before them, they would all have the satisfaction of seeing it, and would be animated by the sight. And it was with good reason that this provision was made for their encouragement, for ye have not passed this way heretofore. This had been the character of all their way through the wilderness, it was an untrodden path, but this especially through Jordan. While we are here, we must expect and prepare for unusual events, to pass ways that we have not passed before: and much more when we go hence; our way through the valley of the shadow of death is a way we have not gone before, which makes it the more formidable. But, if we have the assurance of God's presence, we need not fear; that will furnish us with such strength as we never had, when we come to do a work we never did.

III. They were commanded to sanctify themselves, that they might be prepared to attend the ark; and for this there was good reason, for to-morrow the Lord will do wonders among you, v. 5. See how magnificently he speaks of God's works, he doeth wonders, and is therefore to be adored, admired, and trusted in. See how intimately acquainted Joshua was with the divine counsels, he could tell beforehand what God would do, and when. See what preparation we must make to receive the discoveries of God's glory, and the communications of his grace, we must sanctify ourselves. This we must do when we are to attend the ark, and God by it is about to do wonders among us; we must separate ourselves from all other cares, devote ourselves to God's honour, and cleave ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit. The people of Israel were now entering into the holy land, and therefore must sanctify themselves. God was about to give them uncommon instances of his favour, which, by meditation and prayer, they must compose their minds to a very careful observation of, that they might give God the glory, and take to themselves the comfort, of these appearances.

IV. The priests were ordered to take up the ark and carry it before the people, v. 6. It was the Levites' work ordinarily to carry the ark, Numb. 4. 15. But on this great occasion the priests were ordered to do it. And they did as they were commanded, took up the ark, and did not think themselves disparaged, went before the people, and did not think themselves exposed; the ark they carried was both their honour and their defence. And now we may suppose that prayer of Moses used, when the ark set forward, Numb. 10. 35. Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered. Magistrates are here instructed to stir up ministers to their work, and to make use of their authority for the furtherance of religion; ministers must likewise learn to go before in the way of God, and not to shrink or draw back when dangers are before them. They must expect to be most struck at, but they know whom they have trusted.

7. And the LORD said unto Joshua, This day will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel, that they may know that, as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee. 8. And thou shalt command the priests that bear the ark of the covenant, saying, When ye are come to the brink of the water of Jordan, ye shall stand still in Jordan. 9. And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, Come hither, and hear the words of the LORD your God. 10. And Joshua said, Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you, and that he will without fail drive out from before you the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Hivites, and the Perizzites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Jebusites. 11. Behold, the ark of the covenant of the LORD of all the earth passeth over before you into Jordan. 12. Now therefore take you twelve men out of the tribes of Israel, out of every tribe a man. 13. And it shall come to pass, as soon as the soles of the feet of the priests that bear the ark of the LORD, the LORD of all the earth, shall rest in the waters of Jordan, that the waters of Jordan shall be cut off from the waters that come down from above; and they shall stand upon an heap.

We may observe here how God honours Joshua, and, by this wondrous work he is about to do, designs to make Israel know that he is their governor. And then, how Joshua honours God, and endeavours by it to make Israel know that he is their God. Thus those that honour God he will honour, and those whom he has advanced should do what they can in their places to exalt him.

1. God speaks to Joshua to put honour upon him, v. 7, 8.

1. It was a great honour God did him, that he spake to him, as he had done to Moses, from off the mercy-seat, before the priests removed it with the ark. This would make Joshua easy in himself, and great among the people, that God was pleased to speak so familiarly to him.

2. That he designed to magnify him in the sight of all Israel. He had told him before he would be with him, ch. 1. 5, that comforted him, but now all Israel shall see it, and that magnified him. Those are truly great with whom God is, and whom he employs and owns in his service. God magnified him, because he would have the people magnify him. Pious magistrates are to be highly honoured and esteemed as public blessings, and the more we see of God with them, the more we should honour them. By the dividing of the Red sea, Israel was convinced that God was with Moses in bringing them out of Egypt; therefore they are said to be baptized unto Moses in the sea, 1 Cor. 10. 2. And upon that occasion they believed him, Exod. 14. 31. And now, by the dividing of Jordan, they shall be convinced that God is, in like manner, with Joshua in bringing them into Canaan. God had magnified Joshua before on several occasions, but now he began to magnify him as the successor of Moses in the government. Some have observed, it was at the banks of Jordan that God began to magnify Joshua, and at the same place he began to magnify our Lord Jesus as Mediator; for John was baptizing at Bethabara, the house of passage, and there it was that, when our Saviour was baptized, it was proclaimed concerning him, This is my beloved Son.

3. That by him he gave orders to the priests themselves, though they were his immediate attendants, v. 8. Thou shalt command the priests, that is, "Thou shalt make known to them the divine command in this matter, and take care that they observe it, to stand still at the brink of Jordan while the waters part, that it may appear to be at the presence of the Lord, of the mighty God of Jacob, that Jordan is driven back," Ps. 114. 5, 7. God could have divided the river without the priests, but they could not without him. The priests must herein set a good example to the people, and teach them to do their utmost in the service of God, and trust him for help in time of need.

II. Joshua speaks to the people, and therein honours God.

1. He demands attention, v. 9. "Come hither to me, as many as can come within hearing, and, before you see the works, hear the words, of the Lord your God, that you may compare them together, and they may illustrate each other." He had commanded them to sanctify themselves, and therefore calls them to hear the word of God, for that is the ordinary means of sanctification, John, 17. 17.

2. He now tells them, at length, by what way they should pass over Jordan, by the stopping of its stream, v. 13. The waters of Jordan shall be cut off. God could by a sudden and miraculous frost have congealed the surface, so that they might all have gone over upon the ice; but that being a thing sometimes done, even in that country, by the ordinary power of nature, (Job, 38. 30.) it would not have been such an honour to Israel's God, nor such a terror to Israel's enemies; it must therefore be done in such a way as had no precedent but the dividing of the Red sea: and that miracle is here repeated, to shew that God has the same power to finish the salvation of his people, that he had to begin it, for he is the Alpha and the Omega; and that the Word of the Lord, (as the Chaldee reads it, v. 7.) the essential Eternal Word, was as truly with Joshua as he was with Moses. And by the dividing of the waters from the waters, and the making of the dry land to appear which had been covered, God would remind them of that which Moses by revelation had instructed them in, concerning the work of creation, Gen. 1. 6. 9. That, by what they now saw, their belief of that which they there read might be assisted, and they might know that the God whom they worshipped was the same God that made the world, and that it was the same power that was engaged and employed for them.

3. The people, having been directed before to follow the ark, are here told that it should pass before them into Jordan, v. 11. Observe, (1.) The ark of the covenant must be their guide. During the reign of Moses, the cloud was their guide, but now, in Joshua's reign, the ark; both were visible signs of God's presence and presidency, but divine grace, under the Mosaic dispensation, was wrapt up as in a cloud, and covered with a veil, while by Christ, our Joshua, it is revealed in the ark of the covenant unvailed. (2.) It is called the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth. "He that is your God, v. 9. in covenant with you, is the Lord of all the earth, has both right and power to command, controul, use, and dispose of all nations, and of all creatures. He is the Lord of all the earth, therefore he needs not you, nor can be benefited by you; therefore it is your honour and happiness to have him in covenant with you: if he be your's, all the creatures are at your service, and, when he pleases, shall be employed for you." When we are praising and worshipping God as Israel's God, and our's through Christ, we must remember that he is the Lord of the whole earth, and reverence him and trust in him accordingly. Some observe an accent in the original, which they think directs us to translate it somewhat more emphatically, Behold the ark of the covenant, even the ark of the Lord, or even of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth. (3.) They are told that the ark should pass before them into Jordan. God would not appoint them to go any where, but where he himself would go before them, and go with them; and they might safely venture, even into Jordan itself, if the ark of the covenant led them. While we make God's precepts our rule, his promises our stay, and his providence our guide, we need not dread the greatest difficulties we may meet with in the way of duty. That promise is sure to all the seed, Isa. 43. 2. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.

4. From what God was now about to do for them, he infers an assurance of what he would yet further do. This he mentions first, so much was his heart upon it, and so great a satisfaction did it give him, v. 10. Hereby ye shall know that the living God (the true God, and God of power, not one of the dead gods of the heathen) is among you, though you see him not, nor are to have any image of him; is among you to give you law, secure your welfare, and receive your homage; is among you in this great undertaking now before you; and therefore you shall, nay, he himself, will, without fail, drive out from before you the Canaanites." So that the dividing of Jordan was intended to be to them, (1.) A sure token of God's presence with them; by this they could not but know that God was among them, unless their unbelief was as obstinate, against the most convincing evidence, as that of their fathers was, who, presently after God had divided the Red sea before them, impudently asked, Is the Lord among us, or is he not? Exod. 17. 7. (2.) A sure pledge of the conquest of Canaan; if the living God is among you, expelling he will expel, (so the Hebrew phrase is,) from before you the Canaanites. He will do it certainly, and do it effectually. What should hinder him? What can stand in his way, before whom rivers are divided, and dried up? The forcing of the lines was a certain presage of the ruin of all their hosts: how could they stand their ground, when Jordan itself was driven back? When they had not courage to dispute this pass, but trembled at the approach of the mighty God of Jacob? Ps. 114. 7. What opposition could they ever make after this? This assurance, which Joshua here gives them, was so well grounded, as that it would enable one Israelite to chase a thousand Canaanites, and two to put ten thousand to flight; and it would be abundantly strengthened by remembering the song of Moses, dictated forty years before, which plainly foretold the dividing of Jordan, and the influence it would have upon the driving out of the Canaanites, Exod. 15. 15. . 17. The inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away, and so be effectually driven out, they shall be as still as a stone till thy people pass over, and then thou shalt bring them in and plant them. Note, God's glorious appearances for his church and people ought to be improved by us for the encouragement of our faith, and hope for the future. As for God, his work is perfect. If Jordan's flood cannot keep them out, Canaan's force cannot turn them out again.

5. He directs them to get twelve men ready, one of each tribe, who must be within call, to receive such orders as Joshua should afterward give them, v. 12. It does not appear that they were to attend the priests, and walk with them when they carried the ark, that they might more immediately be witnesses of the wonders done by it, as some think; but they were to be at hand for the service they were called to, ch. 4. 4, &c.

14. And it came to pass, when the people removed from their tents, to pass over Jordan, and the priests bearing the ark of the covenant before the people; 15. And as they that bare the ark were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water, (for Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest,) 16. That the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap very far from the city Adam, that is beside Zaretan: and those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the Salt sea, failed, and were cut off: and the people passed over right against Jericho. 17. And the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan, and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clean over Jordan.

Here we have a short and plain account of the dividing of the river Jordan, and the passage of the children of Israel through it. The story is not garnished with the flowers of rhetoric, gold needs not to be painted; but it tells us, in short, matter of fact.

1. That this river was now broader and deeper than usually it was at other times of the year, v. 15. The melting of the snow on the mountains of Lebanon, near which this river had its rise, was the occasion, that, at the time of harvest, barley-harvest, which was the spring of the year, Jordan overflowed all his banks. This great flood, just at that time, (which Providence might have restrained for once, or which he might have ordered them to cross at another time of the year,) very much magnified the power of God and his kindness to Israel. Note, Though the opposition given to the salvation of God's people have all imaginable advantages, yet God can and will conquer it. Let the banks of Jordan be filled to the brink, filled till they run over, it is as easy to Omnipotence to divide them, and dry them up, as if they were never so narrow, never so shallow; it is all one with the Lord.

2. That, as soon as ever the feet of the priests dipped in the brim of the water, the stream stopped immediately, as if a sluice had been made to dam it up, v. 15, 16. So that the waters above swelled, stood on a heap, and ran back, and yet, as it should seem, did not spread, but congealed; which unaccountable rising of the river was observed with amazement by those that lived upward upon it many miles off, and the remembrance of it remained among them long after; the waters on the other side this invisible dam ran down, of course, and left the bottom of the river dry as far downward, it is likely, as they swelled upward. When they passed through the Red sea, the waters were a wall on either hand, here only on the right hand. Note, The God of nature can, when he pleases, change the course of nature, and alter its properties, can turn fluids into solids, waters into standing rocks, as, on the contrary, rocks into standing waters, to serve his own purposes. See Ps. 114. 5, 8. What cannot God do? What will he not do for the perfecting of his people's salvation? Sometimes he cleaves the earth with rivers, Hab. 3. 9. and sometimes, as here, cleaves the rivers without earth. It is easy to imagine how, when the course of this strong and rapid stream was arrested on a sudden, the waters roared and were troubled, so that the mountains seemed to shake with the swelling thereof, Ps. 46. 3. how the floods lifted their voice, the floods lifted up their waves, while the Lord on high shewed himself mightier than the noise of these many waters, Ps. 93. 3, 4. With reference to this, the prophet asks, Was the Lord displeased against the rivers, was thine anger against the rivers? Hab. 3. 8. No, Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people, v. 13. In allusion to this, it is foretold among the great things God will do for the gospel-church in the latter days, that the great river Euphrates shall be dried up, that the way of the kings of the east may be prepared, Rev. 16. 12. When the time is come for Israel's entrance into the land of promise, all difficulties shall be conquered, mountains shall become plains, Zech. 4. 7. and rivers become dry, for the ransomed of the Lord to pass over. When we have finished our pilgrimage through this wilderness, death will be like this Jordan between us and the heavenly Canaan, but the ark of the covenant has prepared us a way through it, it is the last enemy that shall be destroyed.

3. That the people passed over right against Jericho, which was (1.) An instance of their boldness, and a noble defiance of their enemies; Jericho was one of the strongest cities, and yet they dared to face it at their first entrance. (2.) It was an encouragement to them to venture through Jordan, for Jericho was a goodly city, and the country about it extremely pleasant; and, having that in view as their own, what difficulties could discourage them from taking possession? (3.) It would increase the confusion and terror of their enemies, who, no doubt, strictly observed their motions, and were the amazed spectators of this work of wonders.

4. That the priests stood still in the midst of Jordan while the people passed over, v. 17. There the ark was appointed to be, to shew that the same power that parted the waters, kept them parted as long as there was occasion, and had not the divine presence, of which the ark was a token, been their security, the water had returned upon them and buried them. There the priests were appointed to stand still. (1.) To try their faith, whether they could venture to take their post when God assigned it them, with mountains of water over their heads; as they made a bold step when they set the first foot into Jordan, so now they made a bold stand when they tarried longest in Jordan; but they knew they carried their own protection with them. Note, Ministers in times of peril should be examples of courage and confidence in the divine goodness. (2.) It was to encourage the faith of the people, that they might go triumphantly into Canaan, and fear no evil, no not in this valley of the shadow of death, (for so the divided river was,) being assured of God's presence, which interposed between them and the greatest danger, between them and the proud waters, which otherwise had gone over their souls. Thus in the greatest dangers the saints are comforted with his rod and his staff, Ps. 23. 4.

CHAP. IV.

This chapter gives a further account of the miraculous passage of Israel through Jordan. I. The provision that was made at that time to preserve the memorial of it, by twelve stones set up in Jordan. (v. 9.) and other twelve stones taken up out of Jordan, v. 1..8. II. The march of the people through Jordan's channel, the two tribes first, then all the people, and the priests that bare the ark last, v. 10..14. III. The closing of the waters again upon their coming up with the ark, v. 15..19. IV. The erecting of the monument in Gilgal, to preserve the remembrance of this work of wonder to posterity, v. 20..24.

1. AND it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over Jordan, that the LORD spake unto Joshua, saying, 2. Take you twelve men out of the people, out of every tribe a man, 3. And command ye them, saying, Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan, out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones, and ye shall carry them over with you, and leave them in the lodging-place, where ye shall lodge this night. 4. Then Joshua called the twelve men, whom he had prepared of the children of Israel, out of every tribe a man: 5. And Joshua said unto them, Pass over before the ark of the LORD your God into the midst of Jordan, and take you up every man of you a stone upon his shoulder, according unto the number of the tribes of the children of Israel: 6. That this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones? 7. Then ye shall answer them, That the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the LORD; when it passed over Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off: and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever. 8. And the children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded, and took up twelve stones out of the midst of Jordan, as the LORD spake unto Joshua, according to the number of the tribes of the children of Israel, and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, and laid them down there. 9. And Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant stood: and they are there unto this day.

We may well imagine how busy Joshua and all the men of war were, while they were passing over Jordan, when, beside their own marching into an enemy's country, and in the face of the enemy, which could not but occasion them many thoughts of heart, they had their wives, and children, and families, their cattle, and tents, and all their effects, bag and baggage, to convey by this strange and untrodden path, which we must suppose either very muddy, or very stony, troublesome to the weak, and frightful to the timorous, the descent to the bottom of the river, and the ascent out of it steep, so that every man must needs have his head full of care, and his hands full of business, and Joshua more than any of them. And yet, in the midst of all his hurry, care must be taken to perpetuate the memorial of this wondrous work of God, and this care might not be adjourned to a time of greater leisure. Note, How much soever we have to do of business for ourselves, and our families, we must not neglect or omit what we have to do for the glory of God and the serving of his honour, for that is our best business. Now,

I. God gave orders for the preparing of this memorial. Had Joshua done it without divine direction, it might have looked like a design to perpetuate his own name and honour, nor would it have commanded so sacred and venerable a regard from posterity, as now, when God himself appointed it. Note, God's works of wonder ought to be kept in everlasting remembrance, and means devised for the preserving of the memorial of them. Some of the Israelites, that passed over Jordan, perhaps were so stupid, and so little affected with this great favour of God to them, that they felt no concern to have it remembered; while others, it may be, were so much affected with it, and had such deep impressions made upon them by it, that they thought there needed no memorial of it to be erected, the heart and tongue of every Israelite in every age would be a living lasting monument of it. But God, knowing their frame, and how apt they had been soon to forget his works, ordered an expedient for the keeping of this in remembrance to all generations, that those who could not, or would not, read the record of it in the sacred history, might come to the knowledge of it by the monument set up in remembrance of it, which the common tradition of the country would be an explication of; it would likewise serve to corroborate the proof of the matter of fact, and would remain a standing evidence of it to those who, in after ages, might question the truth of it.

A monument is to be erected, and, 1. Joshua, as chief captain, must give directions about it, v. 1. When all the people were ciron passed over Jordan, not even the feeble, that were the hindmost of them, left behind, so that God had done his work completely, and every Israelite got safe into Canaan, then God spake unto Joshua to provide materials for this monument. It is the pious conjecture of the learned Bishop Patrick, that Joshua was gone into some place of retirement, to return thanks immediately for this wonderful mercy, and then God met him, and spake thus to him. Or, perhaps, it was by Eleazar, the priest, that God gave these and other instructions to Joshua, for though he is not mentioned here, yet when Joshua was ordained by the imposition of hands to this great trust, God appointed that Eleazar should ask counsel for him after the judgment of Urim, and at his word, Joshua, and all the children of Israel must go out and come in, Numb. 27. 21. 2. One man out of each tribe, and he a chosen man, must be employed to prepare materials for this monument, that each tribe might have the story told them by one of themselves, and each tribe might contribute something to the glory of God thereby, v. 2, 4. Out of every tribe a man. Not the Levites only, but every Israelite must, in his place, help to make known to the sons of men God's mighty acts, Ps. 145. 12. The two tribes, though seated already in their possession, yet, sharing in the mercy, must lend a hand to the memorial of it. 3. The stones, that must be set up for this memorial, are ordered to be taken out of the midst of the channel, (where, probably, there lay abundance of great stones,) and, as near as might be, from the very place where the priests stood with the ark, v. 3, 5. This intended monument deserved to have been made of stones curiously cut with the finest and most exquisite art, but these stones out of the bottom of the river were more natural and more apt indications of the miracle; let posterity know, by this, that Jordan was driven back, for these very stones were then fetched out of it. In the institution of signs, God always chose that which was most proper and significant, rather than that which is pompous or curious; for God hath chosen the foolish things of the world. These twelve men, after they got over Jordan, must be sent back to the place where the ark stood, being permitted to come near it, (which others might not,) for this service; pass over before the ark, v. 5. that is, "into the presence of the ark, which now stands in the midst of Jordan, and thence fetch these stones." 4. The use of these stones is here appointed for a sign, v. 6. a memorial, v. 7. They would give occasion to the children to ask their parents, in time to come, How came these stones thither? Probably the land about was not stony; but the parents would inform them, as they themselves had been informed, that in this place Jordan was divided by the almighty power of God, to give Israel passage into Canaan, as Joshua enlarges on this head, v. 22, &c.

II. According to these orders the thing was done.

1. Twelve stones were taken up out of the midst of Jordan, and carried, in the sight of the people, to the place where they had their head-quarters that night, v. 8. It is probable that the stones they took were as big as they could well carry, and as near as might be of a size and shape. But whether they went away with them immediately to the place, or whether they staid to attend the ark, and kept pace with the solemn procession of that, to grace its triumphant entry into Canaan, is not certain. By these stones, which they were ordered to take up, God did, as it were, give them livery and seisin of this good land, it is all their own, let them enter and take possession; therefore what these twelve did, the children of Israel are said to do, v. 8. because they were the representatives of their respective tribes. In allusion to this, we may observe, that when the Lord Jesus, our Joshua, having overcome the sharpness of death, and dried up that Jordan, had opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers, he appointed his twelve apostles, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, by the memorial of the gospel, to transmit the knowledge of this to remote places and future ages.

2. Other twelve stones (probably, much larger than the other, for we read not that they were each of them one man's load) were set up in the midst of Jordan, v. 9. piled up so high in a heap or pillar, as that the top of it might be seen above water, when the river was low, or seen in the water, when it was clear, or, at least, the noise or commotion of the water passing over it would be observable, and the bargemen would avoid it, as they do a rock; some way or other, it is likely, it was discernible, so as to notify the very place where the ark stood, and to serve for a duplicate to the other monument, which was to be set up on dry land in Gilgal, for the confirming of its testimony, and the preserving of its tradition. The sign being doubled, no doubt, the thing was certain.

10. For the priests which bare the ark stood in the midst of Jordan, until every thing was finished that the LORD commanded Joshua to speak unto the people, according to all that Moses commanded Joshua: and the people hastened and passed over.

11. And it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over, that the ark of the LORD passed over, and the priests, in the presence of the people.

12. And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh, passed over armed before the children of Israel, as Moses spake unto them: 13. About forty thousand prepared for war passed over before the LORD unto battle, to the plains of Jericho.

14. On that day the LORD magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel; and they feared him, as they feared Moses, all the days of his life. 15. And the LORD spake unto Joshua, saying, 16. Command the priests that bear the ark of the testimony, that they come up out of Jordan. 17. Joshua therefore commanded the priests, saying, Come ye up out of Jordan. 18. And it came to pass, when the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD were come up out of the midst of Jordan, and the soles of the priests' feet were lifted up unto the dry land, that the waters of Jordan returned unto their place, and flowed over all his banks, as they did before. 19. And the people came up out of Jordan on the tenth day of the first month, and encamped in Gilgal, in the east border of Jericho.

The inspired historian seems to be so well pleased with his subject here, that he is loath to quit it, and is therefore very particular in his narrative, especially in observing how closely Joshua pursued the orders God gave him, and that he did nothing without divine direction, finishing all that the Lord had commanded him, (c. 10.) which is also said to be what Moses commanded. We read not of any particular commands that Moses gave Joshua about this matter, the thing was altogether new to him. It must therefore be understood of the general instructions Moses had given him to follow the divine conduct, to deliver that to the people which he had received of the Lord, and to take all occasions to remind them of their duty to God, as the best return for his favours to them: This which Moses, who was now dead and gone, had said to him, he had in mind at this time, and did accordingly. It is well for us to have the good instructions, that have been given us, ready to us, when we have occasion for them.

1. All the people hastened and passed over, v. 10. Some understand it of the twelve men that carried the stones, but it seems rather to be meant of the body of the people; for though an account was given of their passing over, v. 1. yet here it is repeated for the sake of this circumstance, which was to be added, that they passed over in haste, either because Joshua, by their officers, ordered them to make haste, for it was to be but one day's work, and they must not leave a hoof behind; or, perhaps, it was their own inclination that hastened them. (1.) Some hastened, because they were not able to trust God, they were afraid the waters should return upon them, being conscious of guilt, and diffident of the divine power and goodness. (2.) Others, because they were not willing to tempt God to continue the miracle longer than needs must, nor would they put the patience of the priests that bare the ark too much to the stretch by unnecessary delay. (3.) Others, because they were eager to be in Canaan, and would thus shew how much they longed after that pleasant land. (4.) Those that considered least, yet hastened because others did. He that believeth, maketh haste, not to anticipate God's counsels, but to attend them. Isa. 28. 16.

2. The two tribes and a half led the van, v. 12, 13. So they had promised, when they had their lot given them on that side Jordan, Numb. 32. 27. And Joshua had lately reminded them of their promise, ch. 1. 12, &c. It was fit that they who had the first settlement should be the first in the encounter of difficulties, the rather, because they had not the incumbrance of families with them, as the other tribes had, and they were all chosen men, and fit for service, ready armed. It was a good providence that they had so strong a body to lead them on, and would be an encouragement to the rest. And the two tribes had no reason to complain: "The post of danger is the post of honour."

3. When all the people were got clear to the other side, the priests with the ark came up out of Jordan. This, one would think, should have been done of course, their own reason would tell them that now there was no more occasion for them, and yet they did not stir a step till Joshua ordered them to move, and Joshua did not order them out of Jordan till God directed him to do so, v. 15. 17. So observant were they of Joshua, and he of God, which was their praise, as it was their happiness, to be under such good direction. How low a condition soever God may at any time bring his priests or people to, let them patiently wait, till by his providence he shall call them up out of it, as the priests here were called to come up out of Jordan, and let them not be weary of waiting, while they have the tokens of God's presence with them, even the ark of the covenant, in the depth of their adversity.

4. As soon as ever the priests and the ark were come up out of Jordan, the waters of the river, which had stood on a heap, gradually flowed down, according to their nature and usual course, and soon filled the channel again, v. 18. This makes it yet more evident, that the stop which had now been given to the river was not from any secret natural cause; but purely from the power of God's presence, and for the sake of his Israel, for when Israel's turn was served, and the token of his presence was removed, immediately the water went forward again; so that, if it be asked, What ailed thee, O Jordan, that thou wast driven back? it must be answered, It was purely in obedience to the God of Israel, and in kindness to the Israel of God: there is therefore none like unto the God of Jeshurun; happy also art thou, O Israel! who is like unto thee, O people? Some observe here, by way of allusion, that when the ark, and the priests that bare it, are removed from any place, the flood-gates are drawn up, the defence is departed, and an inundation of judgments is to be expected shortly. Those that are unchurched, will soon be undone. The glory is departed, if the ark be taken.

5. Notice is taken of the honour put upon Joshua by all this, v. 14. On that day the Lord magnified Joshua, both by the fellowship he admitted him to with himself, speaking to him upon all occasions, and being ready to be consulted by him; and by the authority he confirmed him in, over both priests and people. Those that honour God, he will honour, and when he will magnify a man, as he had said he would magnify Joshua, (ch. 3. 7.) he will do it effectually. Yet it was not for Joshua's sake only that he was thus magnified, but to put him in a capacity of doing so much the more service to Israel, for hereupon they feared him as they feared Moses. See here what is the best and surest way to command the respects of inferiors, and to gain their reverence and observance, not by blustering, and threatenings, and carrying it with a high hand, but by holiness and love, and all possible indications of a constant regard to their welfare, and to God's will and honour. Those are feared in the best manner, and to the best purpose, who make it to appear that God is with them, and that they set him before them. Those that are sanctified are truly magnified, and are worthy of double honour. Favourites of Heaven should be looked on with awe.

6. An account is kept of the time of this great event, v. 19. it was on the tenth day of the first month, just forty years since they came out of Egypt, wanting five days. God had said in his wrath, that they should wander forty years in the wilderness, but to make up that forty we must take in the first year, which was then past, and had been a year of triumph in their deliverance out of Egypt, and this last, which had been a year of triumph likewise on the other side Jordan, so that all the forty were not years of sorrow; and at last he brought them into Canaan five days before the forty years were ended, to shew how little pleasure God takes in punishing, how swift he is to shew mercy, and that, for the elects' sake, the days of trouble are shortened, Matth. 24. 22. God ordered it so that they should enter Canaan four days before the annual solemnity of the passover, and on the very day when the preparation for it was to begin, Exod. 12. 3. because he would have their entrance into Canaan graced and sanctified with that religious feast, and would have them then to be reminded of their deliverance out of Egypt, that, comparing them together, God might be glorified as the Alpha and Omega of their bliss.

20. And those twelve stones, which they took out of Jordan, did Joshua pitch in Gilgal. 21. And he spake unto the children of Israel, saying, When your children shall ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean these stones? 22. Then ye shall let your children know, saying, Israel came over this Jordan on dry land. 23. For the LORD your God dried up the waters of Jordan from before you, until ye were passed over, as the LORD your God did to the Red sea, which he dried up from before us, until we were gone over: 24. That all the people of the earth might know the hand of the LORD, that it is mighty: that ye might fear the LORD your God for ever.

The twelve stones which were laid down in Gilgal, v. 8. are here set up either one upon another, yet so as that they might be distinctly counted, or one by another in rows; for, after they were fixed, they are not called a heap of stones, but these stones.

I. It is here taken for granted, that posterity would inquire into the meaning of them, supposing them intended for a memorial. Your children shall ask their fathers, (for whom else should they ask?) What mean these stones? Note, Those that will be wise when they are old, must be inquisitive when they are young. Our Lord Jesus, though he had in himself the fulness of knowledge, has, by his example, taught children and young people to hear and ask questions, Luke, 2. 46. Perhaps, when John was baptizing in Jordan at Bethabara, (the house of passage where the people passed over,) he pointed at these very stones, while saying, Matth. 3. 9. God is able of these stones (which were at first set up by the twelve tribes) to raise up children unto Abraham. The stones being the memorial of the miracles, the children's question gave occasion for the improvement of it; but our Saviour says, Luke, 19. 40. If the children should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out; for one way or other the Lord will be glorified in his works of wonder.

II. The parents are here directed what answer to give to this inquiry, v. 22. Ye shall let your children know that which you have yourselves learned from the written word and from your fathers." Note, It is the duty of parents to acquaint their children betimes with the word and works of God, that they may be trained up in the way they should go.

1. They must let their children know that Jordan was driven back before Israel, who went through it upon dry land, and, that this was the very place where they passed over. They saw how deep and strong a stream Jordan now was, but the divine power put a stop to it, even then when it overflowed all its banks—"and this for you, that live so long after." Note, God's mercies to our ancestors were mercies to us: and we should take all occasions to revive the remembrance of the great things God did for our fathers in the days of old. The place thus marked would be a memorandum to them; Israel came over this Jordan. A local memory would be of use to them, and the sight of the place remind them of that which was done there; and not only the inhabitants of that country, but strangers and travellers, would look upon these stones and receive instruction. Many, upon the sight of the stones, would go to their biblies, and there read the history of this wondrous work; and some, perhaps, upon reading the history, though living at a distance, would have the curiosity to go and see the stones.

2. They must take that occasion to tell their children of the drying up of the Red sea forty years before, as the Lord your God did to the Red sea. Note, (1.) It greatly magnifies later mercies to compare them with former mercies, for, by making the comparison, it appears that God is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. (2.) Later mercies should bring to remembrance former mercies, and revive our thankfulness for them.

3. They must put them in the way of making a good use of these works of wonder, the knowledge whereof was thus carefully transmitted to them, v. 24. (1.) The power of God was hereby magnified. All the world was, or might be, convinced that the hand of the Lord is mighty, that nothing is too hard for God do; nor can any power, no, not that of nature itself, obstruct what God will effect. The deliverances of God's people instructions to all people, and fair warnings not to contend Omnipotence. (2.) The people of God were engaged encouraged to persevere in his service; "That ye might fear the Lord your God, and consequently do your duty to him, and this for ever;" or all days, (Margin.) "Every day, all the days of your lives, and your seed throughout your generations." The remembrance of this wonderful work should effectually restrain them from the worship of other gods, and constrain them to abide and abound in the service of their own God. Note, In all the instructions and informations parents give their children, they should have chiefly in their eye to teach and engage them to fear God for ever. Serious godliness is the best learning.

CHAP. V.

Israel is now got over Jordan, and the waters which had opened before them, to favour their march forward, are closed again behind them, to forbid their retreat backward; they have now got footing in Canaan, and must apply themselves to the conquest of it; in order to which, this chapter tells us, I. How their enemies were dispirited, v. 1. II. What was done at their first landing to assist and encourage them. 1. The covenant of circumcision was renewed, v. 2. 9. 2. The feast of the passover was celebrated, v. 10. 3. Their camp was victualled with the corn of the land, whereupon the manna ceased, v. 11, 12. 4. The Captain of the Lord's host himself appeared to Joshua, to animate and direct him, v. 13. 15.

1. AND it came to pass, when all the kings of the Amorites, which were on the side of Jordan westward, and all the kings of the Canaanites, which were by the sea, heard that the LORD had dried up the waters of Jordan from before the children of Israel, until we were passed over, that their heart melted, neither was there spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel. 2. At that time the LORD said unto Joshua, Make thee sharp knives, and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time. 3. And Joshua made him sharp knives, and circumcised the children of Israel at the bill of the foreskins. 4. And this is the cause why Joshua did circumcise: All the people that came out of Egypt, that were males, even all the men of war, died in the wilderness by the way, after they came out of Egypt. 5. Now all the people that came out were circumcised: but all the people that were born in the wilderness by the way as they came forth out of Egypt, them they had not circumcised. 6. For the children of Israel walked forty years in the wilderness, till all the people that were men of war, which came out of Egypt, were consumed, because they obeyed not the voice of the LORD: unto whom the LORD swore that he would not shew them the land, which the LORD swore unto their fathers that he would give us, a land that floweth with milk and honey. 7. And their children, whom he raised up in their stead, them Joshua circumcised: for they were uncircumcised, because they had not cir-circumcised them by the way. 8. And it came to pass, when they had done circumcising all the people, that they abode in their places in the camp, till they were whole. 9. And the LORD said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day.

A vast show, no doubt, the numerous camp of Israel made in the plains of Jericho, where now they had pitched their tents; Who can count the dust of Jacob? That which had long been the church in the wilderness, is now come up from the wilderness, leaning upon her Beloved, and looks forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners: how terrible she was in the eyes of her enemies, we are here told, v. 1. how fair and clear she was made in the eyes of her friends, by the rolling away of the reproach of Egypt, we are told in the following verses.

I. Here is the fright which the Canaanites were put into by their miraculous passing over Jordan, v. 1. The news of it was soon dispersed all the country over, not only as a prodigy in itself, but as an alarm to all the kings and kingdoms of Canaan. Now, as when Babylon was taken, One post runs to meet another, and one messenger to meet another, to carry the amazing tidings to every corner of their land, Jer. 51. 31. And here we are told what impressions the tidings made upon the kings of this land, their heart melted like wax before the fire, neither was there spirit in them any more. This intimates, that though the heart of the people generally had fainted before, as Rahab owned, eh. 2. 9. yet the kings had till now kept up their spirits pretty well, had promised themselves, that, being in possession, their country populous, and their cities fortified, they should be able to make their part good against the invaders; but when they heard, not only that they were come over Jordan, and that that defence of their country was broken through, but that they were come over by a miracle, the God of nature manifestly fighting for them, their hearts failed them too, they gave up the cause for gone, and were now at their wits' end. And, 1. They had reason enough to be afraid; Israel itself was a formidable body, and much more so when God was its Head, a God of almighty power. What can make head against them, if Jordan be driven back before them? 2. God impressed these fears upon them, and dispirited them, as he had promised, Exod. 23. 27. I will send my fear before thee. God can make the wicked to fear where no fear is, Ps. 53. 5. much more where there is such cause for fear as was here. He that made the soul, can, when he pleases, make his sword thus to approach to it, and kill it with his terrors.

II. The opportunity which this gave to the Israelites to circumcise those among them that were uncircumcised, At that time, (v. 2.) when the country about them was in that great consternation, God ordered Joshua to circumcise the children of Israel, for at that time it might be done with safety even in an enemy's country; their hearts being melted, their hands were tied, that they could not take this advantage against them, as Simeon and Levi did against the Shechemites, to come upon them when they were sore. Joshua could not be sure of this, and therefore, if he had ordered this general circumcision just at this time of his own head, he might justly have been censured as imprudent, for, how good soever the thing was in itself, in the eye of reason, it was not seasonable at this time, and might have been of dangerous consequence; but when God commanded him to do it, he must not consult with flesh and blood: he that bid them do it, no doubt, would protect them and bear them out in it. Now observe,

1. The occasion there was for this general circumcision. (1.) All that came out of Egypt were circumcised, v. 5. While they had peace in Egypt, doubtless, they circumcised their children the eighth day, according to the law. But after they began to be oppressed, especially when the edict was made for the destruction of their male infants, the administration of this ordinance was interrupted; many of them were uncircumcised, of whom there was a general circumcision, either during the time of the three days' darkness, as Dr. Lightfoot conjectures, or a year after, just before their eating a second passover at mount Sinai, and in order to that solemnity, Numb. 9. 2. as many think. And it is with reference to that general circumcision, that this here is called a second; v. 2. But the learned Masius thinks it refers to the general circumcision of Abraham's family, when that ordinance was first instituted, Gen. 17. 23. That first confirmed the promise of the land of Canaan, this second was a thankful celebration of the performance of that promise. But, (2.) All that were born in the wilderness, namely, after their walking in the wilderness, became by the divine sentence a judgment upon them for their disobedience, as is intimated by that repetition of the sentence, v. 6; all that were born since that fatal day, on which God swore in his wrath that none of that generation should enter into his rest, were uncircumcised.

But what shall we say to this? Had not God enjoined it to Abraham, under a very severe penalty, that every man-child of his seed should be circumcised on the eighth day? Gen. 17. 9. 14. Was it not the seal of the everlasting covenant? Was not so great a stress laid upon it then when they were coming out of Egypt, that when, immediately after the first passover, the law concerning that feast was made perpetual, this was one clause of it, that no uncircumcised person should eat of it, but should be deemed as a stranger? And yet, under the government of Moses himself, to have all their children that were born for thirty-eight years together left uncircumcised, is unaccountable. So great an omission could not be general, but by divine direction.

Now, [1.] Some think circumcision was omitted because it was needless: it was appointed to be a mark of distinction between the Israelites and other nations, and therefore, in the wilderness, where they were so perfectly separated from all, and mingled with none, there was no occasion for it. [2.] Others think that they did not look upon the precept of circumcision as obligatory till they came to settle in Canaan, for in the covenant made with them at mount Sinai nothing was said about circumcision, neither was it of Moses but of the fathers, John. 7. 22. and with particular reference to the grant of the land of Canaan, Gen. 17. 8. [3.] Others think that God favourably dispensed with the omission of this ordinance, in consideration of the unsettledness of their state, and their frequent removes while they were in the wilderness. It was requisite that children, after they were circumcised, should rest for some time while they were sore, and stirring them might be dangerous to them; God therefore would have mercy, and not sacrifice. This reason is generally acquiesced in, but to me it is not satisfactory, for sometimes they stayed a year in a place, Numb. 9. 22. if not much longer; and, in their removes, the little children, though sore, might be wrapt so warm, and carried so easy, as to receive no damage, and might certainly be much better accommodated than the mothers in travail or while lying-in. Therefore, [4.] To me it seems to have been a continued token of God's displeasure against them for their unbelief and murmuring. Circumcision was originally a seal of the promise of the land of Canaan, as we observed before. It was in the believing hope of that good land, that the patriarchs circumcised their children: but when God had sworn in his wrath, concerning the men of war which came out of Egypt, that they should be consumed in the wilderness, and never enter Canaan, nor come within sight of it, (as that sentence is here repeated, v. 6. reference being made to it,) as a further ratification of that sentence, and to be a constant memorandum of it to them, all that fell under that sentence, and were to fall by it, were forbidden to circumcise their children; by which they were plainly told, that, whatever others might, they should never have the benefit of that promise which circumcision was the seal of. And this was such a significant indication of God's wrath, as the breaking of the tables of the covenant was, when Israel had broken the covenant by making the golden calf. It is true, there is no express mention of this judicial prohibition in the account of that sentence; but an intimation of it, Numb. 14. 33. Your children shall bear your iniquities. It is probable, the children of Caleb and Joshua were circumcised, for they were excepted out of that sentence, and of Caleb it is particularly said, To him will I give the land, and to his children, Dent. 1. 36. which was the very promise that circumcision was the seal of: and Joshua is here bid to circumcise the people, not his own family. Whatever the reason was, it seems that this great ordinance was omitted in Israel for almost forty years together, which is a plain indication that it was not of absolute necessity, nor was to be of perpetual obligation, but should in the fullness of time be abolished, as now it was for so long a time suspended.

2. The orders given to Joshua for this general circumcision, v. 2. Circumcise again the children of Israel, not the same persons, but the body of the people. Why was this ordered to be done now? Answ. (1.) Because now the promise, which circumcision was instituted to be the seal of, was performed. The seed of Israel was brought safe into the land of Canaan, "Let them therefore hereby own the truth of that promise which their fathers had disbelieved, and could not find in their hearts to trust to." (2.) Because now the threatening, which the suspending of circumcision for thirty-eight years was the ratification of, was fully executed by the expiring of the forty years. That warfare is accomplished, that iniquity is pardoned, (Isa. 40. 2.) and therefore now the seal of the covenant is revived again. But why was it not done sooner—why not while they were resting some months in the plains of Moab—why not during the thirty days of their mourning for Moses—why was it not deferred longer, till they had made some progress in the conquest of Canaan, and had gained a settlement there, at least till they had entrenched themselves, and fortified their camp—why must it be done the very next day after they were come over Jordan? Answ. Because divine wisdom saw that to be the fittest time, just when the forty years were ended, and they had entered Canaan; and the reasons which human wisdom would have offered against it were easily overruled. [1.] God would hereby shew that the camp of Israel was not governed by the ordinary rules and measures of war, but by immediate direction from God, who, by thus exposing them, in the most dangerous moments, magnified his own power in protecting them, even then. And this great instance of security, in disabling themselves for action just then when they were entering upon action, proclaimed such confidence in the divine care for their safety as would increase their enemies' fears: much more when their scouts informed them not only of the thing itself that was done, but of the meaning of it; that it was a seal of the grant of this land to Israel. [2.] God would hereby animate his people Israel against the difficulties they were now to encounter, by confirming his covenant with them, which gave them unquestionable assurance of victory and success, and the full possession of the land of promise. [3.] God would hereby teach them, and us with them, in all great undertakings to begin with God, to make sure of his favour, by offering ourselves to him a living sacrifice, (for that was signified by the blood of circumcision,) and then we may expect to prosper in all we do. [4.] The reviving of circumcision, after it had been so long disused, was designed to revive the observation of other institutions, the omission of which had been connived at in the wilderness. This command to circumcise them was to remind them of that which Moses had told them, Dent. 12. 8. that when they were come over Jordan they must not do as they had done in the wilderness, but must come under a stricter discipline. It was said concerning many of the laws God had given them, that they must observe them in the land to which they were going, Dent. 6. 1.—12. 1. [5.] This second circumcision, as it is here called, was typical of the spiritual circumcision with which the Israel of God, when they enter into the gospel-rest, are circumcised; it is the learned Bishop Pierson's observation, That this circumcision being performed under the conduct of Joshua, Moses's successor, it points to Jesus as the true Circumciser, the Author of another circumcision than that of the flesh, commanded by the law, even the circumcision of the heart, Rom. 2. 29. called the circumcision of Christ, Col. 2. 11.

3. The people's obedience to these orders. Joshua circumcised the children of Israel, v. 3. not himself with his own hands, but he commanded that it should be done, and took care that it was done: it might soon be dispatched, for it was not necessary that it should be done by a priest or Levite, but any one might be employed to do it. All those that were under twenty years old when the people were numbered at mount Sinai, and, not being numbered with them, fell not by the fatal sentence, were circumcised, and by them all the rest might be circumcised in a little time. The people had promised to hearken to Joshua, as they had hearkened to Moses, ch. 1. 17. and here they gave an instance of their dutifulness, submitting to this painful institution, and not calling him for the sake of it a bloody governor, as Zipporah, because of the circumcision, called Moses a bloody husband.

Lastly, The names given to the place where this was done, to perpetuate the memory of it. (1.) It was called the hill of the foreskins, v. 3. Probably, the foreskins that were cut off were laid on a heap, and covered with earth, so that they made a little hillock. (2.) It was called Gilgal, from a word which signifies to take away, from that which God said to Joshua, v. 2. This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt. God is jealous for the honour of his people, his own honour being so much interested in it; and whatever reproach they may lie under for a time, first or last it will certainly be rolled away, and every tongue that riseth up against them he will condemn. [1.] Their circumcision rolled away the reproach of Egypt. They were hereby owned to be the freeborn children of God, having the seal of the covenant in their flesh, and so the reproach of their bondage in Egypt was removed. They were tainted with the idolatry of Egypt, and that was their reproach; but now, that they were circumcised, it was to be hoped they would be so entirely devoted to God, that the reproach of their affection to Egypt would be rolled away. [2.] Their coming safe to Canaan rolled away the reproach of Egypt, for it silenced that spiteful suggestion of the Egyptians, that for mischief they were brought out, the wilderness had shut them in, Exod. 14. 3. Their wandering so long in the wilderness confirmed the reproach, but now that they had entered Canaan in triumph, that reproach was done away. When God glorifies himself in perfecting the salvation of his people, he not only silences the reproach of their enemies but rolls it upon themselves.

10. And the children of Israel encamped in Gilgal, and kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the month at even in the plains of Jericho.

11. And they did eat of the old corn of the land on the morrow after the passover, unleavened cakes, and parched corn in the self-same day. 12. And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more: but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.

We may well imagine that the people of Canaan were astonished, and that, when they observed the motions of the enemy, they could not but think them very strange. When soldiers take the field, they are apt to think themselves excused from religious exercises, (they have not time or thought to attend them,) yet Joshua opens the campaign with one act of devotion after another. What was afterwards said to another Joshua, might truly be said to this, Hear now, O Joshua, thou, and thy fellows that sit before thee, are men wondered at, Zech. 3. 8. and yet indeed he took the right method. That is likely to end well, that begins with God.

Here is,

1. A solemn passover kept, at the time appointed by the law.

the fourteenth day of the first month, and in the same place where they were circumcised, v. 10. While they were wandering in the wilderness, they were denied the benefit and comfort of this ordinance, as a further token of God's displeasure; but now, in answer to the prayer of Moses upon the passing of that sentence, Ps. 90. 15. God comforted them again, after the time that he had afflicted them, and therefore now that joyful ordinance is revived again. Now that they had entered into Canaan, it was very reasonable to remember those wondrous works of divine power and goodness, by which they were brought out of Egypt. The finishing of mercies should bring to mind the beginning of them; and, when it is perfect day, we must not forget how welcome the morning light was, when we had long waited for it. The solemn passover followed immediately after the solemn circumcision; thus when they that received the word were baptized, immediately we find them breaking of bread, Acts, 2. 41, 42. They kept this passover in the plains of Jericho, as it were in defiance of the Canaanites that were round about them, and enraged against them, and yet could not give them any disturbance. Thus God gave them an early instance of the performance of that promise, that when they went up to keep the feasts, their land should be taken under the special protection of the Divine Providence, Exod. 34. 24. Neither shall any man desire thy land. He now prepared a table before them in the presence of their enemies," Ps. 23. 5.

II. Provision made for their camp of the corn of the land, and the ceasing of the manna thereupon, v. 11, 12. Manna was a wonderful mercy to them when they needed it; but it was the mark of a wilderness state, it was the food of children, and therefore, though it was angels' food, and not to be complained of as light bread, yet it would be more acceptable to them to eat of the corn of the land, and that they are now furnished with; the country people being retired for safety into Jericho, left their barns and fields, and all that was in them, which served for the subsistence of this great army. And the supply came very seasonable, for, 1. After the passover, they were to keep the feast of unleavened bread, which they could not do according to the appointment, when they had nothing but manna to live upon; perhaps this was one reason why it was intermitted in the wilderness. But now they found old corn enough in the barns of the Canaanites to supply them plentifully for that occasion; thus the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, and little did they, who laid it up, think whose all these things should be, which they had provided. 2. On the morrow after the passover-sabbath, they were to wave the sheaf of first-fruits before the Lord, Lev. 23. 10, 11. And this they were particularly ordered to do, when they were come into the land which God would give them; and they were furnished for this with the fruit of the land that year, v. 12. which was then growing, and beginning to be ripe. Thus they were well-provided for, both with old and new corn, as good householders, Matth. 13. 52. And, as soon as ever the fruits of this good land came to their hands, they had an opportunity of honouring God with them, and employing them in his service according to his appointment. And thus, behold all things are clean and comfortable to them. Calvin is of opinion, that they had kept the passover every year in its season during their wandering in the wilderness, though it is not mentioned, and that God dispensed with their being uncircumcised, as he did, notwithstanding that, admit them to offer other sacrifices. But some gather, from Amos, 5. 25. that, after the sentence passed upon them, there were no sacrifices offered till they came to Canaan, and consequently no passover kept. And it is observable, that, after that sentence, Numb. 14. the law which follows, ch. 15. concerning sacrifices, begins, v. 2. When ye shall be come into the land of your habitations, you shall do so and so.

Notice is taken of the ceasing of the manna as soon as ever they had eaten the old corn of the land; (1.) To shew that it did not come by chance or common providence, as snow or hail does, but by the special designation of divine wisdom and goodness; for as it came just when they needed it, so it continued as long as they had occasion for it, and no longer. (2.) To teach us not to expect extraordinary supplies, when they may be had in an ordinary way.

If God had dealt with Israel according to their deserts, the manna had ceased then when they called it light bread; but, as long as they needed it, God continued it, though they despised it; and now that they needed not, God withdrew it, though perhaps some of them desired it. He is a wise Father, who knows the necessities of his children, and accommodates his gifts to them, not to their humours. The word and ordinances of God are spiritual manna, with which God nourishes his people in this wilderness, and though often forfeited, yet they are continued while we are here; but, when we come to the heavenly Canaan, this manna will cease, for we no longer have need of it.

13. And it came to pass, when Joshua was by Jericho, that he lifted up his eyes and looked, and, behold, there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand: and Joshua went unto him, and said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries? 14. And he said, Nay; but as captain of the host of the LORD am I now come. And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and did worship, and said unto him, What saith my lord unto his servant. 15. And the captain of the LORD's host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot: for the place whereon thou standest is holy. And Joshua did so.

We have hitherto found God often speak to Joshua, but we read not till now of any appearance of God's glory to him; now that his difficulties increased, his encouragements were increased in proportion. Observe,

I. The time when he was favoured with this vision; it was immediately after he had performed the great solemnities of circumcision, and the passover; then God made himself known to him. Note, We may then expect the discoveries of the divine grace, when we are found in the way of our duty, and are diligent and sincere in our attendance on holy ordinances.

II. The place where he had this vision; it was by Jericho, in Jericho, so the word is, in it by faith and hope, though as yet he had not begun to lay siege to it; in it in thought and expectation, or, in the fields of Jericho, hard by the city; there, it should seem, he was all alone, fearless of danger, because sure of the divine protection. There he was (some think) meditating and praying, and to those who are so employed, God often graciously manifests himself. Or, perhaps, there he was to take a view of the city, to observe its fortifications, and contrive how to attack it, and perhaps he was at a loss within himself how to make his approaches, when God came and directed him. Note, God will help those that help themselves; Vigilantibus non dormientibus succurrit lex—The law succours those who watch, not those who sleep. Joshua was in his post, as a general, when God came and made himself known to him as Generalissimo.

III. The appearance itself; Joshua, as is usual with those that are full of thought and care, was looking downward, his eyes fixed on the ground, when of a sudden he was surprised with the appearance of a man who stood before him at some little distance, which obliged him to lift up his eyes, and gave a diversion to his musings, v. 13. he appeared to him as a man, but a considerable man, and one fit to be taken notice of. Now, 1. We have reason to think that this man was the Son of God, the Eternal Word, who, before he assumed the human nature for a perpetuity, frequently appeared in a human shape. So Bishop Patrick thinks, consonant to the judgment of the fathers. Joshua gave him divine honours, and he received them, which a created angel would not have done, and he is called Jehovah, ch. 6. 2. 2. He here appeared as a soldier, with his sword drawn in his hand. To Abraham, in his tent, he appeared as a traveller: to Joshua, in the field, as a man of war: Christ will be to his people what their faith expects and desires. Christ had his sword drawn, which served, (1.) To justify the war Joshua was engaging in, and to shew him that it was of God, who gave him commission to kill and slay. If the sovereign draw the sword, that proclaims war, and authorises the subject to do so too. The sword is then well-drawn when Christ draws it, and gives the banner to them that fear him, to be displayed because of the truth, Ps. 60. 4. (2.) To encourage him to carry it on with vigour; for Christ's sword drawn in his hand denotes how ready he is for the defence and salvation of his people, who through him shall do valiantly. His sword turns every way.

IV. The bold question with which Joshua accosted him; he did not send a servant, but stepped up to him himself, and asked, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries? Which intimates his readiness to entertain him if he were for them, and to fight him if he were against them. This speaks, 1. His great courage and resolution. He was not ruffled by the suddenness of the appearance, nor daunted with the majesty and bravery which, no doubt, appeared in the countenance of the person he saw; but, with a presence of mind that became so great a general, put this fair question to him. God had bid Joshua be courageous, and by this it appears that he was so; for what God by his word requires of his people, he does by his grace work in them. 2. His great concern for the people and their cause; so heartily has he embarked in the interests of Israel, that none shall stand by him with the face of a man, but he will know whether he be a friend or a foe. It should seem, he suspected him for an enemy, a Goliath that was to come to destroy the armies of the living God, and to give him a challenge. Thus apt are we to look upon that as against us, which is most for us. The question plainly implies, that the cause between the Israelites and Canaanites, between Christ and Beelzebub, will not admit of a neutrality. He that is not with us, is against us.

V. The account he gave of himself, v. 14. "Nay, not for your adversaries, you may be sure, but as Captain of the host of the Lord I am now come, not only for you as a friend, but over you, as commander in chief." Here were now, as of old, Gen. 32. 2. Mahanaim, two hosts, a host of Israelites ready to engage the Canaanites, and a host of angels to protect them therein, and he, as Captain of both, conducts the host of Israel, and commands the host of angels to their assistance. Perhaps, in allusion to this, Christ is called the Captain of our salvation, Heb. 2. 10. and a Leader and commander to the people, Isa. 55. 4. They cannot but be victorious that have such a Captain. He now came as Captain to review the troops, to animate them, and to give the necessary orders for the besieging of Jericho.

VI. The great respect Joshua paid him when he understood who he was; it is probable that he perceived, not only by what he said, but by some other sensible indications, that he was a divine person, and not a man.

1. Joshua paid homage to him. He fell on his face to the earth, and did worship. Joshua was himself general of the forces of Israel, and yet he was far from looking with jealousy upon this stranger, who produced a commission as Captain of the Lord's host above him; he did not offer to dispute his claims, but cheerfully submitted to him as his commander. It well becomes the greatest men to be humble and reverent in their addresses to God.

2. He begged to receive commands and directions from him, What saith my Lord unto his servant? His former question was not more bold and soldier-like, than this was pious and saint-like: nor was it any disparagement to the greatness of Joshua's spirit, thus to humble himself when he had to do with God: even crowned heads cannot bow too low before the throne of the Lord Jesus, who is King of kings, Ps. 2. 10, 11.—72. 10, 11. Rev. 19. 16. Observe, (1.) The relation he owes between himself and Christ: that Christ was his Lord, and himself his servant, and under his command, Christ his Captain, and himself a soldier under him, to do as he is bidden, Matth. 8. 9. Note, The foundation of all acceptable obedience is laid in a sincere dedication of ourselves, as servants to Jesus Christ as our Lord, Ps. 16. 2. (2.) The inquiry he makes pursuant to this relation, What saith my Lord? Which implies an earnest desire to know the will of Christ, and a cheerful readiness and resolution to do it. Joshua owns himself an inferior officer, and stands to receive orders; this temper of mind shews him fit for the post he was in, for those know best how to command, that know how to obey.

VII. The further expressions of reverence which this divine Captain required from Joshua, v. 15. Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, in token of reverence and respect, which with us are signified by uncovering the head; and as an acknowledgment of a divine presence, which, while it continued there, did in a manner sanctify the place and dignify it. We often say of a person, whom we have a great affection for, that we love the very ground he goes upon; thus Joshua must shew his reverence for this divine person, he must not tread the ground he stood on with his shoes on, Eccl. 5. 1. Outward expressions of inward reverence, and a religious awe of God, well become us, and are required of us, whenever we approach to him in solemn ordinances. Bishop Patrick well observes here, that the very same orders that God gave to Moses at the bush, when he was sending him to bring Israel out of Egypt, Exod. 3. 5. he here gives to Joshua, for the confirming of his faith in the promise he had lately given him, that as he had been with Moses, so he would be with him, ch. 1. 5. Had Moses such a presence of God with him, as, when it became sensible, sanctified the ground? So had Joshua.

And (lastly) Hereby he prepares him to receive the instructions he was about to give him, concerning the siege of Jericho, which this Captain of the Lord's host was now come to give Israel possession of.

CHAP. VI.

Joshua opened the campaign with the siege of Jericho, a city which could not trust so much to the courage of its people, as to act offensively, and to send out its forces to oppose Israel's landing and encamping, but trusted so much to the strength of its walls, as to stand upon its defence, and not to surrender, or desire conditions of peace. Now here we have the story of the taking of it. I. The directions and assurances which the Captain of the Lord's host gave concerning it, v. 1. 5. II. The trial of the people's patient obedience in walking round the city six days, v. 6. 14. III. The wonderful delivery of it into their hands, the seventh day, with a solemn charge to them to use it as a devoted thing, v. 15. 21. and v. 24. IV. The preservation of Rahab and her relations, v. 22, 23, 25. V. A curse pronounced upon the man that should dare to rebuild this city, v. 26, 27. An abstract of this story we find among the trophies of faith, Heb. 11. 30. By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days.

1. NOW Jericho was straitly shut up because of the children of Israel: none went out, and none came in. 2. And the LORD said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valour. 3. And ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round about the city once. Thus shalt thou do six days. 4. And seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of ram's horns: and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets. 5. And it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the ram's horn, and when ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout; and the wall of the city shall fall down flat, and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him.

We have here a contest between God and the men of Jericho, and their different resolutions, upon which it is easy to say whose word shall prevail.

I. Jericho resolves Israel shall not be its master, v. 1. It was straitly shut up, because of the children of Israel it did shut up, and it was shut up. So it is in the margin, it did shut up itself, being strongly fortified both by art and nature, and it was shut up by the obstinacy and resolution of the inhabitants, who agreed never to surrender, or so much as sound a parley; none went out as deserters, or to treat of peace, nor were any admitted in to offer peace. Thus were they infatuated, and their hearts hardened to their own destruction—the miserable case and character of all those that strengthen themselves against the Almighty, Job, 15. 25.

II. God resolves Israel shall be its master, and that quickly. The Captain of the Lord's host, here called Jehovah, taking notice how strongly Jericho was fortified, and now strictly guarded, and knowing Joshua's thoughts and cares about reducing it, and perhaps his fears of a disgrace there, and of stumbling at the threshold, gave him here all the assurance he could desire of success, v. 2. See, I have given into thine hand Jericho. Not, "I will do it, but, I have done it; it is all thine own, as sure as if it were already in thy possession." It was designed that this city, being the first-fruits of Canaan, should be entirely devoted to God, and that neither Joshua nor Israel should ever be one mite the richer for it, and yet it is here said to be given into their hand, for we must reckon that most our own, which we have an opportunity of honouring God with, and employing in his service.

Now, 1. The Captain of the Lord's host gives directions how the city should be besieged. No trenches are to be opened, no batteries erected, or battering rams drawn up, nor any military preparations made; but the ark of God must be carried by the priests round the city, once a day, for six days together, and seven times the seventh day, attended by the men of war in silence, the priests all the while blowing with trumpets of rams' horns, v. 3, 4. This was all they were to do.

2. He assures them, that, on the seventh day, before night, they should, without fail, be masters of the town; upon a signal given, they must all shout, and immediately the wall should fall down, which would not only expose the inhabitants, but so dispirit them, that they would not be able to make any resistance, v. 5. God appointed this way, (1.) To magnify his own power, that he might be exalted in his own strength, Ps. 21. 13. not in the strength of instruments. God would hereby yet further make bare his own almighty arm for the encouragement of Israel, and the terror and confusion of the Canaanites. (2.) To put an honour upon his ark, the instituted token of his presence, and to give a reason for the laws, by which the people were obliged to look upon it with the most profound veneration and respect. When, long after this, the ark was brought into the camp without orders from God, it was looked upon as a profanation of it, and the people paid dear for their presumption, 1 Sam. 4. 3, &c. But now, that it was done by the divine appointment, it was an honour to the ark of God, and a great encouragement to the faith of Israel. (3.) It was likewise to put honour upon the priests, who were appointed, upon this occasion, to carry the ark and sound the trumpets. Ordinarily, the priests were excused from war; that that privilege, with other honours and powers that the law had given them, might not be grudged them; in this service they are principally employed, and so the people are made sensible what blessings they were to the public, and how well worthy of all the advantages conferred upon them. (4.) It was to try the faith, obedience, and patience, of the people, to try whether they would observe a precept which, to human policy, seemed foolish to obey, and believe a promise which, in human probability, seemed impossible to be performed. They were also proved, whether they could patiently bear the reproaches of their enemies, and patiently wait for the salvation of the Lord. Thus, by faith, not by force, the walls of Jericho fell down. (5.) It was to encourage the hope of Israel, with reference to the remaining difficulties that were before them. That suggestion of the evil spies, that Canaan could never be conquered, because the cities were walled up to heaven, (Dent. 1. 28.) would by this be for ever silenced. The strongest and highest walls cannot hold out against Omnipotence; they needed not to fight, and therefore needed not to fear, because God fought for them.

6. And Joshua the son of Nun called the priests, and said unto them, Take up the ark of the covenant, and let seven priests bear seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the LORD. 7. And he said unto the people, Pass on, and compass the city, and let him that is armed pass on before the ark of the LORD. 8. And it came to pass, when Joshua had spoken unto the people, that the seven priests bearing the seven trumpets of rams' horns passed on before the LORD, and blew with the trumpets: and the ark of the covenant of the LORD followed them. 9. And the armed men went before the priests that blew with the trumpets, and the rereward came after the ark, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets. 10. And Joshua had commanded the people, saying, Ye shall not shout, nor make any noise with your voice, neither shall any word proceed out of your mouth, until the day I bid you shout; then shall ye shout. 11. So the ark of the LORD compassed the city, going about it once: and they came into the camp, and lodged in the camp. 12. And Joshua rose early in the morning, and the priests took up the ark of the LORD. 13. And seven priests bearing seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the LORD went on continually, and blew with the trumpets: and the armed men went before them; but the rereward came after the ark of the LORD, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets. 14. And the second day they compassed the city once, and returned into the camp: so they did six days. 15. And it came to pass on the seventh day, that they rose early about the dawning of the day, and compassed the city after the same manner seven times: only on that day they compassed the city seven times. 16. And it came to pass at the seventh time, when the priests blew with the trumpets, Joshua said unto the people, Shout; for the LORD hath given you the city.

We have here an account of the cavalcade which Israel made about Jericho, the orders Joshua gave concerning it, as he had received them from the Lord, and their punctual observance of these orders. We do not find that he gave the people the express assurances God had given him, that he would deliver the city into their hands; he tried whether they would obey orders, with a general confidence that it would end well, and we find them very observant both of God and Joshua.

1. Wherever the ark went the people attended it, v. 9. The armed men went before it to clear the way, not thinking it any disparagement to them, though they were men of war, to be pioneers to the ark of God. If any obstacle should be found in crossing all the roads that led to the city, (which they must do in walking round it,) they would remove it; if any opposition should be made by the enemy, they would encounter it, that the priests' march with the ark might be easy and safe. It is an honour to the greatest of men to do any good office to the ark, and to serve the interests of religion in their country. The reward, either another body of armed men, or Dan's squadron, which marched last through the wilderness, or, as some think, the multitude of the people who were not armed or disciplined for war, (as many of them as would,) followed the ark, to testify their respects to it, to grace the solemnity, and to be witnesses of what was done. Every faithful zealous Israelite would be willing to undergo the same fatigues, and run the same hazard, with the priests that bare the ark.

II. Seven priests went immediately before the ark, having trumpets in their hands, with which they were continually sounding, v. 4, 5, 9, 13. The priests were God's ministers, and thus, in his name, 1. They proclaimed war with the Canaanites, and so struck a terror upon them: for by terrors upon their spirits they were to be conquered and subdued. Thus God's ministers, by the solemn declarations of his wrath against all ungodliness, and unrighteousness of men, must blow the trumpet in Zion, and sound an alarm in the holy mountain, that the sinners in Zion may be afraid. They are God's heralds to denounce war against all those that go on still in their trespasses, but say, "We shall have peace, though we go on." 2. They proclaimed God's gracious presence with Israel, and so put life and courage into them. It was appointed, that, when they went to war, the priests should encourage them with the assurance of God's presence with them, Deut. 20. 2. . 4. And particularly their blowing with trumpets was to be a sign to the people, that they should be remembered before the Lord their God in the day of battle, Numb. 10. 9. It encouraged Abijah, 2 Chron. 13. 12. Thus God's ministers, by sounding the jubilee trumpet of the everlasting gospel, which proclaims liberty and victory, must encourage the good soldiers of Jesus Christ in their spiritual warfare.

III. The trumpets they used were not those silver trumpets which were appointed to be made for their ordinary service, but trumpets of rams' horns, bored hollow for the purpose, as some think; these trumpets were of the basest matter, duller sound, and least show, that the excellency of the power might be of God. Thus, by the foolishness of preaching, fitly compared to the sounding of these rams' horns, the devil's kingdom is thrown down, and the weapons of our warfare, though they are not carnal, nor seem to a carnal eye likely to bring any thing to pass, are yet mighty through God to the pulling down of strong-holds, 2 Cor. 10. 4, 5. The word here is trumpets of Jubel, that is, such trumpets as they used to blow withal in the year of jubilee; many interpreters understand it so, as signifying the complete liberty to which Israel was now brought, and the bringing of the land of Canaan into the hands of its just and rightful owners.

IV. All the people were commanded to be silent, not to speak a word, nor make any noise, v. 10. that they might the more carefully attend to the sound of the sacred trumpets, which they were now to look upon as the voice of God among them; and it does not become us to speak when God is speaking. It likewise intimates their reverent expectation of the event, Zecl. 2. 13. Be silent, O all flesh before the Lord. Exod. 14. 14. God shall fight, and ye shall hold your peace.

V. They were to do this once a day for six days together, and seven times the seventh day, v. 14, 15. God could have caused the walls of Jericho to fall upon the first surrounding of them, but they must go round them thirteen times before they fall, that they might be kept waiting patiently for the Lord. Though they were lately come into Canaan, and their time was very precious, (for they had a great deal of work before them,) yet they must linger so many days about Jericho, seeming to do nothing, nor to make any progress in their business. As promised deliverances must be expected in God's way, so they must be expected in his time. He that believes, does not make haste, not more haste than God would have him make. Go yet seven times before any thing hopeful appears, 1 Kings, 18. 43.

VI. One of these days must needs be a sabbath-day, and the Jews say that it was the last, but that is not certain; however, if He that appointed them to rest on the other sabbath-days, appointed them to walk on this, that was sufficient to justify them in it; he never intended to bind himself by his own laws, but that, when he pleased, he might dispense with them. The impotent man went upon this principle when he argued, John, 5. 11. He that made me whole, (and therefore has a divine power,) he said unto me, Take up thy bed. And in this case here, it was an honour to the sabbath-day, by which our time is divided into weeks, that just seven days were to be spent in this work, and seven priests were employed to sound seven trumpets; that number being, on this occasion, as well as many others, made remarkable, in remembrance of the six days' work of creation, and the seventh day's rest from it. And, besides, the law of the sabbath forbids our own work, which is servile and secular, but this, which they did, was a religious act. It is certainly no breach of the sabbath-rest to do the sabbath-work, for the sake of which the rest was instituted; and what is the sabbath-work but to attend the ark in all its motions?

VII. They continued to do this, during the time appointed, and seven times the seventh day, though they saw not any effect of it, believing that at the end the vision would speak, and not lie, Hab. 2. 3. If we persevere in the way of duty, we shall lose nothing by it in the long run. It is probable they walked at such a distance from the walls as to be out of the reach of the enemies' arrows, and out of the hearing of their scoffs. We may suppose the oddness of the thing did at first amuse the besieged, but by the seventh day they were grown secure, feeling no harm from that, which perhaps they looked upon as an enchantment. Probably, they bantered the besiegers, as they, Neh. 4. 2. "What do these feeble Jews? Is this the people they thought so formidable? Are these their methods of attack?" Thus they cried Peace and Safety, that the destruction might be the more terrible when it came. Wicked men (says Bishop Hall) think God in jest when he is preparing for their judgment; but they will be convinced of their mistake when it is too late.

VIII. At last they were to give a shout, and did so, and immediately the walls fell, v. 16. This was a shout for mastery, a triumphant shout, the shout of a king is among them, Numb. 23. 21. This was a shout of faith; they believed that the walls of Jericho would fall, and by that faith they were thrown down. It was a shout of prayer, an echo to the sound of the trumpets which proclaimed the promise that God would remember them; with one accord, as one man, they cry to Heaven for help, and help comes in. Some allude to this to shew that we must never expect a complete victory over our own corruptions till the very evening of our last day, and then we shall shout in triumph over them, when we came to the number and measure of our perfections, as Bishop Hall expresses it. A good heart (says he) groans under the sense of his infirmities, fain would be rid of them, and strives and prays, but, when all is done, until the end of the seventh day it cannot be; then judgment shall be brought forth unto victory. And, at the end of time, when our Lord shall descend from heaven with a shout, and the sound of a trumpet, Satan's kingdom shall be completely ruined, and not till then, when all opposing rule, principality, and power, shall be effectually and eternally put down.

17. And the city shall be accursed, even it, and all that are therein, to the Lord: only Rahab the harlot shall live, she and all that are with her in the house, because she hid the messengers that we sent. 18. And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing, lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing, and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it. 19. But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the LORD: they shall come into the treasury of the LORD. 20. So the people shouted when the priests blew with the trumpets: and it came to pass, when the people heard the sound of the trumpet, and the people shouted with a great shout, that the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city. 21. And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword. 22. But Joshua had said unto the two men that had spied out the country, Go into the harlot's house, and bring out thence the woman, and all that she hath, as ye sware unto her. 23. And the young men that were spies went in, and brought out Rahab, and her father, and her mother, and her brethren, and all that she had; and they brought out all her kindred, and left them without the camp of Israel. 24. And they burnt the city with fire, and all that was therein: only the silver, and the gold, and the vessels of brass and of iron, they put into the treasury of the house of the LORD. 25. And Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, and her father's household, and all that she had; and she dwelleth in Israel even unto this day; because she hid the messengers, which Joshua sent to spy out Jericho. 26. And Joshua adjured them at that time, saying, Cursed be the man before the LORD, that riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho: he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it. 27. So the LORD was with Joshua; and his fame was noised throughout all the country.

The people had religiously observed the orders given them concerning the besieging of Jericho, and now, at length, Joshua had told them, v. 16. "The Lord hath given you the city, enter, and take possession." Accordingly, in these verses we have,

I. The rules they were to observe in taking possession; God gives it them, and therefore may direct it to what uses and intents, and clog it with what provisos and limitations, he thinks fit. It is given to them to be devoted to God, as the first, and perhaps the worst, of all the cities of Canaan.

1. The city must be burnt, and all the lives in it sacrificed, without mercy, to the justice of God. All this they knew was included in those words, v. 17. The city shall be a cherem, a devoted thing, it and all therein, to the Lord; no life in it might be ransomed upon any terms, they must all be surely put to death, Lev. 27. 29. So He appoints, from whom, as creatures, they had received their lives, and to whom, as sinners, they had forfeited them; and who may dispute his sentence? Is God unrighteous, who thus taketh vengeance? God forbid we should entertain such a thought! There was more of God seen in the taking of Jericho, than of any other of the cities of Canaan, and therefore that must be more than any other devoted to him. And the severe usage of this city would strike a terror upon all the rest, and melt their hearts yet more before Israel. Only, when this severity is ordered, Rahab and her family are excepted; she shall live, and all that are with her. She had distinguished herself from her neighbours by the kindness she shewed to Israel, and therefore shall be distinguished from them by the speedy return of that kindness.

2. All the treasure of it, the money and plate, and valuable goods, must be consecrated to the service of the tabernacle, and brought into the stock of dedicated things: the Jews say, because the city was taken on the sabbath-day. Thus, God would be honoured by the beautifying and enriching of his tabernacle; thus, preparation was made for the extraordinary expences of his service: and thus the Israelites were taught not to set their hearts upon worldly wealth, nor to aim at heaping up abundance of it for themselves. God had promised them a land flowing with milk and honey, not a land abounding with silver and gold, for he would have them live comfortably in it, that they might serve him cheerfully, but not covet either to trade with distant countries, or to hoard for after times. He would likewise have them reckon themselves enriched in the enriching of the tabernacle; and to think that which was laid up in God's house as truly their honour and wealth as if it had been laid up in their own.

A particular caution is given them to take heed of meddling with the forbidden spoil; for what was devoted to God, if they offered to appropriate it to their own use, would prove accursed to them; therefore, v. 18. "In any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing; you will find yourselves inclined to reach towards it, but check yourselves, frighten yourselves from having any thing to do with it." He speaks as if he foresaw the sin of Achan, which we have an account of in the next chapter, when he gives that reason for the caution, lest ye make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it, as it proved that Achan did.

II. The entrance that was opened to them into the city by the sudden fall of the walls, or at least that part of the wall over against which they then were when they gave the shout, v. 20. The wall fell down flat, and, probably, killed abundance of people; the guards that stood sentinel upon it, or others that crowded upon it, to look at the Israelites that were walking round. We read of thousands killed by the fall of a wall, 1 Kings, 20. 30. That which they trusted to for defence proved their destruction. The sudden fall of the wall, no doubt, put the inhabitants into such a consternation, that they had no strength nor spirit to make any resistance, but they became an easy prey to the sword of Israel, and saw to how little purpose it was to shut their gates against a people that had the Lord on the head of them, Mic. 2. 13. Note, The God of heaven easily can, and certainly will, break down all the opposing power of his and his church's enemies. Gates of brass and bars of iron are, before him, but as straw and rotten wood, Isa. 45. 1, 2. Who will bring me into the strong city? Will not thou, O God? Ps. 60. 9, 10. Thus shall Satan's kingdom fall, nor shall any prosper, that harden themselves against God.

III. The execution of the orders given concerning this devoted city. All that breathed were put to the sword; not only the men that were found in arms, but the women and children, and old people. Though they cried for quarter, and begged ever so earnestly for their lives, there was no room for compassion, pity must be forgotten, they utterly destroyed all, v. 21. If they had not had a divine warrant, under the seal of miracles, for this execution, it could not have been justified, nor can it justify the like now, when we are sure no such warrant can be produced. But, being appointed by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth to do it, who is not unrighteous in taking vengeance, they are to be applauded in doing it, as the faithful ministers of his justice. Work for God was then bloody work; and cursed was he that did it deceitfully, keeping back his sword from blood, Jer. 48. 10. But the spirit of the gospel is very different, for Christ came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them, Luke, 9. 56. Christ's victories were of another nature. The cattle were put to death with the owners, as additional sacrifices to the divine justice. The cattle of the Israelites, when slain at the altar, were accepted as sacrifices for them, but the cattle of those Canaanites were required to be slain as sacrifices with them, for their iniquity was not to be purged with sacrifice and offering: both were for the glory of God. 2. The city was burnt with fire, and all that was in it, v. 24. The Israelites, perhaps, when they had taken Jericho, a large and well-built city, hoped they should have that for their head-quarters; but God will have them yet to dwell in tents, and therefore fires this nest, lest they should nestle in it. 3. All the silver and gold, and all those vessels which were capable of being purified by fire, were brought into the treasury of the house of the Lord; not that he needed it, but he would be honoured by it, as the Lord of hosts, of their hosts in particular, the God that gave the victory, and therefore might demand the spoil; either the whole, as here, or, as sometimes, a tenth, Heb. 7. 4.

IV. The preservation of Rahab the harlot, or inn-keeper, who perished not with them that believed not, Heb. 11. 31. The public faith was engaged for her safety, by the two spies, who acted therein as public persons; and therefore, though the hurry they were in at the taking of the town, no doubt, was very great, yet Joshua took effectual care for her preservation. The same persons that she had secured, were employed to secure her, r. 22, 23. They were best able to do it, who knew her and her house, and they were fittest to do it, that it might appear it was for the sake of her kindness to them, that she was thus distinguished, and had her life given her for a prey. All her kindred were saved with her; like Noah, she believed to the saving of her house; and thus faith in Christ brings salvation to the house, Acts, 16. 31. Some ask, how her house, which is said to have been upon the wall, ch. 2. 15. escaped falling with the wall; we are sure it did escape, for she and her relations were safe in it: either though it joined so near to the wall as to be said to be upon it, yet it was so far off as not to fall either with the wall or under it; or, rather, that part of the wall on which her house stood fell not. Now, being preserved alive, 1. She was left for some time without the camp to be purified from the Gentile superstition, which she was to renounce, and to be prepared for her admission as a proselyte. 2. She was in due time incorporated with the church of Israel, and she and her posterity dwelt in Israel, and her family was remarkable long after. We find her the wife of Salmon, prince of Judah, mother of Boaz, and named among the ancestors of our Saviour, Matth. 1. 5. Having received Israelites in the name of Israelites, she had an Israelite's reward. Bishop Pierson observes, that Joshua's saving Rahab the harlot, and admitting her into Israel, was a figure of Christ's receiving into his kingdom, and entertaining there, the publicans and the harlots, Matth. 21. 31. Or it may be applied to the conversion of the Gentiles.

V. Jericho is condemned to a perpetual desolation, and a curse pronounced upon the man that at any time hereafter should offer to rebuild it, v. 26. Joshua adjured them, that is, the elders and people of Israel, not only by their own consent, obliging themselves and their posterity never to rebuild this city, but by the divine appointment; God himself having forbidden it, under the severe penalty here annexed. 1. God would hereby shew the weight of a divine curse; where it rests there is no contending with it, nor getting from under it; it brings ruin without remedy or repair. 2. He would have it to remain in its ruins, a standing monument of his wrath against the Canaanites, when the measure of their iniquity was full; and of his mercy to his people, when the time was come for their settlement in Canaan. The desolations of their enemies were witnesses of his favour to them, and would upbraid them with their ingratitude to that God who had done so much for them. The situation of the city was very pleasant, and, probably, its nearness to Jordan was an advantage to it, which would tempt men to build upon the same spot; but they are here told it is at their peril if they do it. Men build for their posterity; but he that builds Jericho shall have no posterity to enjoy what he builds; his eldest son shall die when he begins the work, and if he take not warning by that stroke he desists, but will go on presumptuously, the finishing of his work shall be attended with the funeral of his youngest son, and we must suppose all the rest cut off between. This curse, not being a causeless, did come upon that man who long after rebuilt

Jericho, 1 Kings, 16. 34, but we are not to think it made the place ever the worse when it was built, or brought any hurt to them that inhabited it. We find Jericho afterward graced with the presence not only of those two great prophets Elijah and Elisha, but of our blessed Saviour himself, Luke, 18. 35. 19. 1. Matth. 20. 29. Note, It is a dangerous thing to attempt the building up of that which God will have to be destroyed. See Mal. 1. 4.

Lastly, All this magnified Joshua, and raised his reputation, v. 27. it made him not only acceptable to Israel, but formidable to the Canaanites, because it appeared that God was with him of a truth: the Word of the Lord was with him, so the Chaldee, even Christ himself, the same that was with Moses. Nothing can more raise a man's reputation, nor make him appear more truly great, than to have the evidences of God's presence with him.

CHAP. VII.

More than once we have found the affairs of Israel, then when they were in the happiest posture, and gave the most hopeful prospects, perplexed and embarrassed by sin, and a stop thereby put to the most promising proceedings. The golden calf, the murmuring at Kadesh, and the iniquity of Peor, had broken their measures, and given them great disturbance; and in this chapter we have such another instance of the interruption given to the progress of their arms by sin. But, it being only the sin of one person, or family, and soon expiated, the consequences were not so mischievous as of those other sins; however, it served to let them know that they were still upon their good behaviour. We have here, I. The sin of Achan in meddling with the accursed thing, r. 1. II. The defeat of Israel, before Ai, thereupon, v. 2. .5. III. Joshua's humiliation and prayer on occasion of that sad disaster, v. 6. .9. IV. The directions God gave him for the putting away of the guilt, which had provoked God thus to contend with them, v. 10. .15. V. The discovery, trial, conviction, condemnation, and execution, of the criminal, by which the anger of God was turned away, v. 16. .26. And by this story it appears that, as the law, so Canaan itself, made nothing perfect, the perfection, both of holiness and peace, to God's Israel, is to be expected in the heavenly Canaan only.

1. BUT the children of Israel committed a trespass in the accursed thing: for Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, took of the accursed thing: and the anger of the LORD was kindled against the children of Israel. 2. And Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai, which is beside Beth-aven, on the east side of Beth-el, and spake unto them, saying, Go up and view the country. And the men went up and viewed Ai. 3. And they returned to Joshua; and said unto him, Let not all the people go up; but let about two or three thousand men go up and smite Ai; and make not all the people to labour thither; for they are but few. 4. So there went up thither of the people about three thousand men: and they fled before the men of Ai. 5. And the men of Ai smote of them about thirty and six men; for they chased them from before the gate even unto Shebarim, and smote them in the going down: wherefore the hearts of the people melted, and became as water.

The story of this chapter begins with a but. The Lord was with Joshua, and his fame was noised through all that country; so the foregoing chapter ends, and it left no room to doubt but that he would go on as he had begun, conquering and to conquer. He did right, and observed his orders in every thing. But the children of Israel committed a trespass, and so set God against them; and then even Joshua's name and fame, his wisdom and courage, could do them no service. If we lose our God, we lose our friends, who cannot help us, unless God be for us. Now here is,

I. Achan sinning; v. 1. Here is only a general mention made of the sin, we shall afterward have a more particular account of it from his own mouth. The sin is here said to be taking of the accursed thing, in disobedience to the command, and in defiance of the threatening, ch. 6. 18. In the sacking of Jericho, orders were given, that they should neither spare any lives, nor take any treasure to themselves; we read not of the breach of the former prohibition, (there were none to whom they shewed any mercy,) but of the latter, compassion was put off, and yielded to the law, but covetousness was indulged. The love of the world is that root of bitterness which, of all others, is most hardly rooted up. Yet the history of Achan is a plain intimation that he, of all the thousands of Israel, was the only delinquent in this matter. Had there been more in like manner guilty, no doubt, we should have heard of it; and it is strange there were no more. The temptation was strong, it was easy to suggest what a pity it was that so many things of value should be burnt: To what purpose is this waste? In plundering cities, every man reckons himself entitled to what he can lay his hands on. It was easy to promise themselves secrecy and impunity; yet, by the grace of God, such impressions were made upon the minds of the Israelites by the ordinances of God, circumcision and the passover, which they had lately been partakers of, and by the providences of God which had been concerning them, that they stood in awe of the divine precept and judgment, and generously denied themselves, in obedience to their God. And yet, though it was a single person that sinned, the children of Israel are said to commit the trespass, because one of their body did it, and he was not as yet separated from them, nor disowned by them. They did it, that is, by what Achan did, guilt was derived upon the whole society of which he was a member. This should be a warning to us to take heed of sin ourselves, lest by it may be defiled or disquieted, Heb. 12. 15. and to take heed of having fellowship with sinners, and of being in with them, lest we share in their guilt. Many a careful tradesman has been broken by a careless partner. And it concerns us to watch over one another for the preventing of sin, because others' sins may redound to our damage.

II. The camp of Israel suffering for the same. The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel; he saw the offence, though they did not, and takes a course to make them see it; for, one way or other, sooner or later, secret sins will be brought to light; and if men inquire not after them, God will, and with his inquiries will awaken their's. Many a community is under guilt and wrath, and is not aware of it, till the fire breaks out: here it broke out quickly.

1. Joshua sends a detachment to seize upon the next city that was in their way, and that was Ai. Only three thousand men were sent, advice being brought him by his spies that the place was inconsiderable, and needed no greater force for the reduction of it, v. 2, 3. Now, perhaps, it was a culpable assurance, or security rather, that they sent so small a party on the expedition; it might also be an indulgence of the people in the love of ease, for they will not have all the people to labour thither; perhaps the people were the less forward to go upon this expedition, because they were denied the plunder of Jericho; and these spies were willing they should be gratified. Whereas, when that town was to be taken, though God by his own power would throw down the walls, yet they must all labour thither, and labour there too, in walking round it. It did not bode well at all, that God's Israel began to think much of their labour, and contrived how to spare their pains. It is required that we work out our salvation, though it is God that works in us. It has likewise often proved of bad consequence to make too light of an enemy. They are but few, (say the spies,) but, as few as they were, they were too many for them. It will awaken our care and diligence in our Christian warfare, to consider that we wrestle with principalities and powers.

2. The party he sent, in their first attack upon the town, were repulsed with some loss, v. 4, 5. They fled before the men of Ai, finding themselves unaccountably dispirited, and their enemies to sally out upon them with more vigour and resolution than they expected. In their retreat they had about thirty-six men cut off; no great loss indeed out of such a number, but a dreadful surprise to those who had no reason to expect any other, in any attack, than clear, cheap, and certain victory. And now, as it proves, it is well there were but three thousand that fell under this disgrace. Had the body of the army been there, they had been no more able to keep their ground, now they were under guilt and wrath, than this small party, and to them the defeat would have been much more grievous and dishonourable. However, it was bad enough as it was, and served, (1.) To humble God's Israel, and to teach them always to rejoice with trembling. Let not him that girdeth on the harness, boast as he that putteth it off. (2.) To harden the Canaanites, and to make them the more secure, notwithstanding the terrors they had been struck with, that their ruin, when it came, might be the more dreadful. (3.) To be an evidence of God's displeasure against Israel, and a call to them to purge out the old leaven. And this was principally intended in their defeat.

3. The retreat of this party, in disorder, put the whole camp of Israel into a fright; the hearts of the people melted, not so much for the loss as for the disappointment. Joshua had assured them that the living God would without fail drive out the Canaanites from before them, ch. 3. 10. How can this event be reconciled to that promise? To every thinking man among them it appeared an indication of God's displeasure, and an omen of something worse; and therefore no marvel it put them into such a consternation; if God turn to be their enemy, and fight against them, what will become of them? True Israelites tremble when God is angry.

6. And Joshua rent his clothes, and fell to the earth upon his face before the ark of the LORD until the even-tide, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust upon their heads. 7. And Joshua said, Alas, O Lord God, wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan! 8. O LORD, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their backs before their enemies! 9. For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round, and cut off our name from the earth: and what wilt thou do unto thy great name?

We have here an account of the deep concern Joshua was in, upon this sad occasion. He, as a public person, interested himself more than any other in this public loss; and is therein an example to princes and great men, and teaches them to lay much to heart the calamities that befall their people: he is also a type of Christ, to whom the blood of his subjects is precious, Ps. 72. 14.

Observe,

1. How he grieved; he rent his clothes, v. 6. in token of great sorrow for this public disaster, and especially a dread of God's displeasure, which was certainly the cause of it. Had it been but the common chance of war, (as we are too apt to express it,) it had not become a general to droop thus under it: but, when God was angry, it was his duty to honour and feel thus. One of the bravest soldiers that ever was, owned that his flesh trembled for fear of God, Ps. 119. 120. As one humbling himself under the mighty hand of God, he fell to the earth upon his face, not thinking it any disparagement to him to lie thus low before the great God, to whom he directed this token of reverence, by keeping his eye toward the ark of the Lord. The elders of Israel, being interested in the cause, and influenced by his example, prostrated themselves with him, and, in token of deep humiliation, put dust upon their heads, not only as mourners, but as penitents; not doubting but it was for some sin or other that God did thus contend with them, (though they knew not what it was,) they humbled themselves before God, and thus deprecating the progress of his wrath. This they continued until even-tide, to shew that it was not the result of a sudden feeling, but proceeded from a deep conviction of their misery and danger, if God were any way provoked to depart from them. Joshua did not fall foul upon his spies for their misinformation concerning the strength of the enemy, nor upon the soldiers for their cowardice, though perhaps both were blame-worthy, but his eye is up to God; for, is there any evil in the camp, and he has not done it? His eye is upon God as displeased, and that troubles him.

II. How he prayed, or pleaded rather, humbly expostulating the case with God; not sullen, as David, when the Lord had made a breach upon Uzzah, but much affected; his spirit seemed to be somewhat ruffled and discomposed, yet not so as to be put out of frame for prayer; but, by giving vent to his trouble in an humble address to God, he keeps his temper, and it ends well.

1. Now he wishes they had all taken up with the lot of the two tribes on the other side Jordan, v. 7. He thinks it had been better to have stayed there, and been cut short, than come hither to be cut off. This savours too much of discontent and distrust of God, and cannot be justified, though the surprise and disappointment to one deeply concerned for the public interest may, in part, excuse it. Those words, Wherefore hast thou brought us over Jordan to destroy us? are too like what the murmurers often said, Exod. 14. 11, 12.—16. 3.—17. 3. Numb. 14. 2, 3. but he that searches the heart, knew they came from another spirit, and therefore was not extreme to mark what he said amiss. Had Joshua considered that this disorder, which their affairs were put into, no doubt, proceeded from something amiss, which yet might easily be redressed, and all set to rights again, (as often in his predecessor's time,) he would not have spoken of it as a thing taken for granted, that they were delivered into the hands of the Amorites to be destroyed. God knows what he does, though we do not; but this we may be sure of, he never did, nor ever will, do us any wrong.

2. He speaks as one quite at a loss concerning the meaning of this event, v. 8. "What shall I say, what construction can I put upon it, when Israel, thy own people, for whom thou hast lately done such great things, and to whom thou hast promised the full possession of this land, when they turn their backs before their enemies," (their necks, so the word is,) "when they not only flee before them, but fall before them, and become a prey to them? What shall we think of the divine power, Is the Lord's arm shortened? Of the divine promise, Is his word yea and nay? Of what God has done for us, Shall that be all undone again, and prove in vain?" Note, The methods of Providence are often intricate and perplexing, and such as the wisest and best of men know not what to say to; but they shall know hereafter, John, 13. 7.

3. He pleads the danger Israel was now in of being ruined; he gives up all for gone. "The Canaanites shall environ us round, concluding, that, now our defence being departed, and the scales turned in their favour, we shall be in their eyes as contemptible as ever we were formidable, and they shall cut off our name from the earth, v. 9. Thus even good men, when things go against them a little, are too apt to fear the worst, and make harder conclusions than there is reason for. But this comes in here as a plea; "Lord, let not Israel's name, which has been so dear to thee, and so great in the world, be cut off."

"He pleads the reproach that would be cast on God, and that, if Israel were ruined, his glory would suffer by it. They will cut off our name, says he, yet, as if he had corrected himself for insisting upon that, it is no great matter (thinks he) what comes of her little name, (the cutting off of that will be a small loss,) but what wilt thou do for thy great name? This he looks upon and laments as the great aggravation to the calamity, he feared it would reflect on God, his wisdom and power, his goodness and faithfulness; what would the Egyptians say? Note, Nothing is more grievous to a gracious soul than dishonour done to God's name. This also he insists upon as a plea for the preventing of his fears, and a return of God's favour; it is the only word, in all his address, that has any encouragement in it, and he concludes with it, leaving it to this issue, Father, glorify thy name. The name of God is a great name, above every name; and, whatever happens, we ought to believe that he will, and pray that he would, work for his own name, that that may not be polluted. This should be our concern more than any thing else, on this we must fix our eye, as the end of all our desires, and from this we must fetch our encouragement, as the foundation of all our hopes: we cannot urge a better plea than this, Lord, what wilt thou do for thy great name? Let God in all be glorified, and then welcome his whole will.

10. And the LORD said unto Joshua, Get thee up; wherefore liest thou thus upon thy face?

11. Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed my covenant which I commanded them: for they have even taken of the accursed thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff.

12. Therefore the children of Israel could not stand before their enemies, but turned their backs before their enemies, because they were accursed: neither will I be with you any more, except ye destroy the accursed from among you. 13. Up, sanctify the people, and say, Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow: for thus saith the LORD God of Israel, There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel: thou canst not stand before thine enemies, until ye take away the accursed thing from among you. In the morning therefore ye shall be brought according to your tribes: and it shall be, that the tribe which the LORD taketh shall come according to the families thereof; and the family which the LORD shall take shall come by households; and the household which the LORD shall take shall come man by man. 15. And it shall be, that he that is taken with the accursed thing shall be burnt with fire, he and all that he hath: because he hath transgressed the covenant of the LORD, and because he hath wrought folly in Israel.

We have here God's answer to Joshua's address, which, we may suppose, came from the oracle over the ark, before which Joshua had prostrated himself, v. 6. Those that desire to know the will of God, must attend with their desires upon the lively oracles, and wait at wisdom's gates for wisdom's dictates, Prov. 8. 34. And let those that find themselves under the tokens of God's displeasure never complain of him, but complain to him, and they shall receive an answer of peace. The answer came immediately, while he was yet speaking, Isa. 65. 24. as that to Daniel, ch. 9. 20, &c.

I. God encourages Joshua against his present despondencies, and the black and melancholy apprehensions he had of the present posture of Israel's affairs, v. 10. "Get thee up, suffer not thy spirits to droop and sink thus, wherefore liest thou thus upon thy face?" No doubt, Joshua did well to humble himself before God, and mourn as he did, under the tokens of his displeasure; but now God tells him, it was enough, he would not have him continue any longer in that melancholy posture, for God delights not in the grief of penitents, when they afflict their souls, further than as it qualifies them for pardon and peace; the days even of that mourning must be ended. Arise, shake thyself from the dust, Isa. 52. 2. Joshua continued his mourning till even-tide, v. 6. so late, that they could do nothing that night toward the discovery of the criminal, but were forced to put it off till next morning. Daniel (ch. 9. 21.) and Ezra (ch. 9. 5, 6.) continued their mourning only till the time of the evening sacrifice; that revived them both, but Joshua went past that time, and therefore is thus roused; "Get thee up, do not lie all night there." Yet we find that Moses fell down before the Lord forty days and forty nights, to make intercession for Israel, Deut. 9. 18. Joshua must get up, because he has other work to do than to lie there; the accursed thing must be discovered and cast out, and the sooner the better; Joshua is the man that must do it, and therefore it is time for him to lay aside his mourning weeds, and put on his judge's robes, and clothe himself with zeal as a cloke; weeping must not hinder sowing, nor one duty of religion justify another. Every thing is beautiful in its season. Shechaniah perhaps had an eye to this in what he said to Ezra upon a like occasion. See Ezra, 10. 2. . 4.

II. He informs him of the true and only cause of this disaster, and shews him wherefore he contended with them, v. 11. Israel hath sinned. "Think not that God's mind is changed, his arm shortened, or his promise about to fail; no, it is sin, it is sin, that great mischief maker, that has stopped the current of divine favours, and has made this breach upon you." The sinner is not named, though the sin is described, but it is spoken of as the act of Israel in general, till they have fastened it upon the particular person, and their godly sorrow have so wrought a clearing of themselves, as their's did, 2 Cor. 7. 11. Observe how the sin is here made to appear exceeding sinful. 1. They have transgressed my covenant, an express precept with a penalty annexed to it. It was agreed, that God should have all the spoil of Jericho, and they should have the spoil of the rest of the cities of Canaan, but, in robbing God of his part, they transgressed this covenant. 2. They have even taken of the devoted thing, in contempt of the curse which was so solemnly denounced against him that should dare to break in upon God's property, as if that curse had nothing in it formidable. 3. They have also stolen; they did it clandestinely, as if they could conceal it from the divine omniscience, and they were ready to say, The Lord shall not see, or will not miss so small a matter out of so great a spoil. Thus thou thoughtest I was altogether such a one as thyself. 4. They have dissembled also. Probably, when the action was over, Joshua called all the tribes, and asked them, whether they had faithfully disposed of the spoil, according to the divine command, and charged them, if they knew of any transgression, they should discover it; but Achan joined with the rest in a general protestation of innocency, and kept his countenance, like the adulterous woman that eats and wipes her mouth, and says, I have done no wickedness. Nay, 5. They have put the accursed thing among their own goods, as if they had as good a title to that as to any thing they have; never expecting to be called to an account, nor designing to make restitution. All this Joshua, though a wise and vigilant ruler, knew nothing of, till God told him, who knows all the secret wickedness that is in the world, which men know nothing of. God could at this time have told him who the person was that had done this thing, but does not, (1.) To exercise the zeal of Joshua and Israel, in searching out the criminal. (2.) To give the sinner himself space to repent and make confession. Joshua, no doubt, proclaimed it immediately throughout the camp, that there was such a transgression committed, upon which, if Achan had surrendered himself, and penitently owned his guilt, and prevented the scrutiny, who knows but he might have had the benefit of that law which accepted of a trespass-offering, with restitution, from those that had sinned through ignorance in the holy things of the law? Lev. 5. 15, 16. But Achan, never discovering himself till the lot discovered him, evidenced the hardness of his heart, and therefore he found no mercy.

III. He awakens him to inquire further into it, by telling him, 1. That this was the only ground for the controversy God had with them, this, and nothing else; so that, when this accursed thing was put away, he needed not fear, all would be well, the stream of their successes, when this one obstruction was removed, would run as strong as ever. 2. That, if this accursed thing were not destroyed, they could not expect the return of God's gracious presence; in plain terms, neither will I be with you any more as I have been, except ye destroy the accursed, that is, the accursed person, who is made so by the accursed thing. That which is accursed will be destroyed; and they whom God has intrusted to bear the sword, bear it in vain, if they make it not a terror to that wickedness which brings these judgments of God on a land. By personal repentance and reformation, we destroy the accursed thing in our own hearts, and unless we do that, we must never expect the favour of the blessed God. Let all men know that it is nothing but sin that separates between them and God, and, if that be not sincerely repented of and forsaken, it will separate eternally.

IV. He directs him in what method to make this inquiry and prosecution. 1. He must sanctify the people, now over-night, that is, as it is explained, he must command them to sanctify themselves, v. 13. And what can either magistrates or ministers do more toward sanctification? They must put themselves into a suitable frame to appear before God, and submit to the divine scrutiny; must examine themselves, now that God was coming to examine them; must prepare to meet their God. They were called to sanctify themselves, when they were to receive the divine law, Exod. 19. and now also, when they were to come under the divine judgment; for in both God is to be attended with the utmost reverence. There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, and therefore sanctify yourselves, that is, "Let all that are innocent be able to clear themselves, and be the more careful to cleanse themselves: the sins of others may be improved by us, as furtherances of our sanctification, as the scandal of the incestuous Corinthian occasioned a blessed reformation in that church, 2 Cor. 7. 11. 2. He must bring them all under the scrutiny of the lot, v. 14. the tribe which the guilty person was of should first be discovered by lot, then the family, then the household, and last of all the person. The conviction came upon him thus gradually, that he might have some space given him to come in and surrender himself; for God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance. Observe, The Lord is said to take the tribe, and family, and household, on which the lot fell; because the disposal of the lot is of the Lord, and, however casual it seems, is under the direction of infinite wisdom and justice; and to shew, that when the sin of sinners finds them out, God is to be acknowledged in it; it is he that seizes them, and the arrests are in his name. God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants, Gen. 44. 16. It is also intimated with what a certain and unerring judgment the righteous God does and will distinguish between the innocent and the guilty, so that though for a time they seem involved in the same condemnation, as the whole tribe did, when it was first taken by the lot, yet He, who has his fan in his hand, will effectually provide for the taking out of the precious from the vile; so that though the righteous be of the same tribe, and family, and household, with the wicked, yet they shall never be treated as the wicked, Gen. 18. 25. 3. When the criminal was found out, he must be put to death without mercy, (Heb. 10. 28.) and with all the expressions of a holy detestation, v. 15. He, and all that he has, must be burnt with fire, that there might be no remainders of the accursed thing among them; and the reason given for this severe sentence, is, because the criminal has, (1.) Given a great affront to God, he has transgressed the covenant of the Lord, who is jealous particularly for the honour of the holy covenant. (2.) He has done a great injury to the church of God, he has wrought folly in Israel, has shamed that nation which is looked upon by all its neighbours to be a wise and an understanding people; has infected that nation which is sanctified to God, and troubled that nation of which He is the Protector. These being crimes so heinous in their nature, and of such pernicious consequence and example, the execution, which otherwise would have come under the imputation of cruelty, is to be applauded as a piece of necessary justice. It was SACRILEGE, it was invading God's rights, alienating his property, and converting to a private use that which was devoted to his glory, and appropriated to the service of his sanctuary—this was the crime to be thus severely punished, for warning to all people in all ages to take heed how they rob God.

16. So Joshua rose up early in the morning, and brought Israel by their tribes; and the tribe of Judah was taken: 17. And he brought the family of Judah; and he took the family of the Zarahites: and he brought the family of the Zarahites man by man; and Zabdi was taken: 18. And he brought his household man by man; and Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was taken. 19. And Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the LORD God of Israel, and make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me. 20. And Achan answered Joshua, and said, Indeed I have sinned against the LORD God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done: 21. When I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them, and took them; and, behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it. 22. So Joshua sent messengers, and they ran unto the tent; and, behold, it was hid in his tent, and the silver under it. 23. And they took them out of the midst of the tent, and brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel, and laid them out before the LORD. 24. And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his sons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had: and they brought them unto the valley of Achor. 25. And Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? the LORD shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones. 26. And they raised over him a great heap of stones unto this day. So the LORD turned from the fierceness of his anger. Wherefore the name of that place was called, The valley of Achor, unto this day.

We have in these verses,

1. The discovery of Achan by the lot, which proved a perfect lot, though it proceeded gradually. Though we may suppose that Joshua slept the better, and with more ease and satisfaction, when he knew the worst of the disease of that body, which, under God, he was the head of, and which was put into a certain method of cure, yet he rose up early in the morning, v. 16. so much was his heart upon it, to put away the accursed thing. We have found Joshua upon other occasions an early riser; here, it shews his zeal and vehement desire to see Israel restored to the divine favour. In the scrutiny observe, 1. That the guilty tribe was that of Judah, which was, and was to be, of all the tribes, the most honourable and illustrious; this was an allay to their dignity, and might serve as a check to their pride: many there were, who were its glories, but here was one that was its reproach. Let not the best families think it strange, if there be those found in them, and descending from them, that prove their grief and shame. Judah was to have the first and largest lot in Canaan, the more inexcusable is one of that tribe, if, not content to wait for his own share, he break in upon God's property. The Jews' tradition is, that, when the tribe of Judah was taken, the valiant men of that tribe drew their swords, and professed they would not sheathe them again till they saw the criminal punished, and themselves cleared, who knew their own innocency. 2. That the guilty person was at length fastened upon, and the language of the lot was, Thou art the man, v. 18. It was strange that Achan, being conscious to himself of guilt, when he saw the lot come nearer and nearer to him, had not either the wit to make an escape, or the grace to make a confession; but his heart was hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, and it proved to be to his own destruction. We may well imagine how his countenance changed, and what horror and confusion seized him, when he was singled out as the delinquent, when the eyes of all Israel were fastened upon him, and every one was ready to say, Have we found thee, O our enemy? See here, (1.) The folly of those that promise themselves secrecy in sin: the righteous God has many ways of bringing to light the hidden works of darkness, and so bringing to shame and ruin those that continue their fellowship with those unfruitful works. A bird of the air, when God pleases, shall carry the voice, Eccl. 10. 20. See Ps. 94. 7, &c. (2.) How much it is our concern, when God is contending with us, to find out what the cause of action is, what the particular sin is, that, like Achan, troubles our camp. We must thus examine ourselves and carefully review the records of conscience, that we may find out the accursed thing, and pray earnestly, with holy Job, Lord, shew me wherefore thou contendest with me. Discover the traitor, and he shall be no longer harboured.

II. His arraignment and examination, v. 19. Joshua sits judge, and though abundantly satisfied of his guilt by the determination of the lot, yet urges him to make a penitent confession, that his soul might be saved by it in the other world, though he could not give him any encouragement to hope that he should save his life by it. Observe, 1. How he accosts him with the greatest mildness and tenderness that could be, like a true disciple of Moses. He might justly have called him "thief" and "rebel," "Raca," and "thou fool," but he calls him "son;" he might have adjured him to confess, as the high priest did our blessed Saviour, or threatened him with the torture to extort a confession, but for love's sake he rather beseeches him, I pray thee make confession. This is an example to all, not to insult over those that are in misery, though they have brought themselves into it by their own wickedness, but to treat even offenders with the spirit of meekness, not knowing what we ourselves should have been and done, if God had put us into the hand of our own counsels. It is likewise an example to magistrates, in executing justice, to govern their own passions with a strict and prudent hand, and never suffer themselves to be transported by them into any indecencies of behaviour or language, no not toward those that have given the greatest provocations. The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God. Let them remember the judgment is God's, who is Lord of his anger. This is the likeliest method of bringing offenders to repentance. 2. What he wishes him to do; to confess the fact, to confess it to God, the party offended by the crime; Joshua was to him in God's stead, so that, in confessing to him, he confessed to God. Hereby he would satisfy Joshua and the congregation concerning that which was laid to his charge; his confession would also be an evidence of his repentance, and a warning to others to take heed of sinning after the similitude of his transgression: but that which Joshua aims at herein, is, that God might be honoured by it, as the Lord, the God of infinite knowledge and power, from whom no secrets are hid; and as the God of Israel, who, as he does particularly resent affronts given to his Israel, so he does the affronts given him by Israel. Note, In confessing sin, as we take shame to ourselves, so we give glory to God, as a righteous God, owning him justly displeased with us, and as a good God, who will not improve our confessions as evidences against us, but is faithful and just to forgive, when we are brought to own that he would be faithful and just if he should punish. By sin we have injured God in his honour, Christ by his death has made satisfaction for the injury; but it is required, that we by repentance shew our good-will to his honour, and, as far as in us lies, give glory to him. Bishop Patrick quotes the Samaritan chronicle, making Joshua to say here to Achan, Lift up thine eyes to the King of heaven and earth, and acknowledge that nothing can be hid from him who knoweth the greatest secrets.

III. His confession, which now, at last, when he saw it was to no purpose to conceal his crime, was free and ingenuous enough, v. 20, 21. Here is,

1. A penitent acknowledgment of the fault. "Indeed I have sinned, what I am charged with is too true to be denied, and too bad to be excused. I own it, I lament it; the Lord is righteous in bringing it to light, for indeed I have sinned." This is the language of a penitent that is sick of his sin, and whose conscience is loaded with it. "I have nothing to accuse any one else of, but a great deal to say against myself; it is with me that the accursed thing is found, I am the man who have perverted that which was right, and it profited me not." And that wherewith he aggravates the sin, is, that it was committed against the Lord God of Israel. He was himself an Israelite, a sharer with the rest of that exalted nation in their privileges, so that, in offending the God of Israel, he offended his own God, which laid him under the guilt of the basest treachery and ingratitude imaginable.

2. A particular narrative of the fact, Thus and thus have I done. God had told Joshua in general, that a part of the devoted things was alienated, but leaves it to him to draw from Achan an account of the particulars; for, one way or other, God will make sinners' own tongues to fall upon themselves, (Ps. 64. 3.) if ever he bring them to repentance, they will be their own accusers, and their awakened consciences will be instead of a thousand witnesses. Note, It becomes penitents, in the confession of their sin to God, to be very particular; not only, "I have sinned;" but, "In this and that instance I have sinned;" reflecting with regret upon all the steps that led to the sin, and all the circumstances that aggravated it, and made it exceeding sinful; thus and thus have I done. He confesses, (1.) To the things taken. In plundering a house in Jericho he found a goodly Babylonish garment; the word signifies a robe, such as princes wore when they appeared in state, probably, it belonged to the king of Jericho; it was far-fetched, if fetched, as we translate it, from Babylon. A garment of divers colours, so some render it; whatever it was, in his eyes it made a glorious show; "A thousand pities" (thinks Achan) "that it should be burnt, then it will do nobody any good, if I take it for myself, it will serve me many a year for my best garment." Under these pretences, he makes bold with this first, and thinks it no harm to save it from the fire; but, his hand being thus in, he proceeds to take a bag of money, two hundred shekels, that is, one hundred ounces of silver, and a wedge of gold which weighed fifty shekels, that is, twenty-five ounces. He could not plead that, in taking these, he saved them from the fire, (for the silver and gold were to be laid up in the treasury;) but they that make a slight excuse to serve in daring to commit one sin, will have their hearts so hardened by that, that they will venture upon the next without such an excuse; for the way of sin is down-hill. See what a poor prize it was for which Achan ran this desperate hazard, and what an unspeakable loser he was by the bargain. See Matth. 16. 26. (2.) He confesses the manner of taking them. [1.] The sin began in the eye. He saw these fine things, as Eve saw the forbidden fruit, and was strangely charmed with the sight. See what comes of suffering the heart to walk after the eyes, and what need we have to make this covenant with our eyes, that if they wander, they shall be sure to weep for it. Look not thou upon the wine that is red, upon the woman that is fair; close the right eye that thus offends thee, to prevent the necessity of plucking it out, and casting it from thee, Matth. 5. 28, 29. [2.] It proceeded out of the heart. He owns, I coveted them. Thus lust conceived and brought forth this sin. They that would be kept from sinful actions, must mortify and check in themselves sinful desires, particularly, the desire of worldly wealth, which we more particularly call covetousness. Oh what a world of evil is the love of money the root of? Had Achan looked upon these things with an eye of faith, he would have seen them accursed things, and would have dreaded them, but looking upon them with an eye of sense only, he saw them goodly things, and coveted them. It was not the looking, but the lusting, that ruined him. [3.] When he had committed it, he was very industrious to conceal it. Having taken of the forbidden treasures, fearing lest any search should be made for prohibited goods, he hid them in the earth, as one that resolved to keep what he had gotten, and never to make restitution. Thus does Achan confess the whole matter, that God might be justified in the sentence passed upon him. See the deceitfulness of sin; that which is pleasing in the commission, is bitter in the reflection, at the last it bites like a serpent. Particularly, see what comes of ill-gotten goods, and how they will be cheated that rob God, Job, 20. 15. He hath swallowed down riches, and he shall vomit them up again.

IV. His conviction. God had convicted him by the lot, he had convicted himself by his own confession; but, that no room might be left for the most discontented Israelite to object against the process, Joshua has him further convicted by the searching of his tent, in which the goods were found which he confessed to. Particular notice is taken of the haste which the messengers made, that were sent to search, they ran to the tent, v. 22. Not only to shew their readiness to obey Joshua's orders, but to shew how uneasy they were till the camp was cleared of the accursed thing, that they might regain the divine favour. They that feel themselves under wrath, find themselves concerned not to defer the putting away of sin. Delays are dangerous, and it is no time to trifle. When the stolen goods were brought, they were laid out before the Lord, v. 23. that all Israel might see how plain the evidence was against Achan, and might adore the strictness of God's judgments in punishing so severely the stealing of such small things, and yet the justice of his judgments in maintaining his right to devoted things, and might be afraid of ever offending in the like kind. In laying them out before the Lord, they acknowledged his title to them, and waited to receive his directions concerning them. Note, Those that think to put a cheat upon God, do but deceive themselves; what is taken from him he will recover, Hos. 2. 9. and he will be a loser by no man at last.

V. His condemnation. Joshua passes sentence upon him, v. 25. Why hast thou troubled us? There is the ground of the sentence, O, how much hast thou troubled us? So some read it. He refers to what was said when the warning was given not to meddle with the accursed thing, ch. 6. 18. lest ye make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble it. Note, Sin is a very troublesome thing, not only to a sinner himself, but to all about him. He that is greedy of gain, as Achan was, troubles his own house, Prov. 15. 27. and all the communities he belongs to. Now (says Joshua) God shall trouble thee. See why Achan was so severely dealt with, not only because he had robbed God, but because he had troubled Israel; over his head he had (as it were) this accusation written, Achan, the troubler of Israel, as Ahab, 1 Kings, 18. 18. This therefore is his doom, God shall trouble thee. Note, The righteous God will certainly recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people, 2 Thess. 1. 6. Those that are troublesome, shall be troubled. Some of the Jewish doctors, from that word, which determines the troubling of him to this day, infer, that therefore he should not be troubled in the world to come; the flesh was destroyed, that the spirit might be saved, and, if so, the dispensation was really less severe than it seemed. In the description, both of his sin and of his punishment, by the trouble that was in both, there is a plain allusion to his name Achan, or, as he is called, 1 Chron. 2. 7, Achar, which signifies trouble. He did too much answer his name.

VI. His execution. No reprieve could be obtained, a gangrened member must be cut off immediately. When he is proved to be an anathema, and the troubler of the camp, we may suppose all the people cry out against him, Away with him, away with him! Stone him, stone him! Here is,

1. The place of execution: they brought him out of the camp, in token of their putting far from them that wicked person, 1 Cor. 5. 13. When our Lord Jesus was made a curse for us, that by his trouble we might have peace, he suffered as an accursed thing without the gate, bearing our reproach, Heb. 13. 12, 13. The execution was at a distance, that the camp, which was disturbed by Achan's sin, might not be defiled by his death.

2. The persons employed in his execution; it was the act of all Israel, v. 24, 25. They were all spectators of it, that they might see and fear. Public executions are public examples. Nay, they were all consenting to his death, and as many as could were active in it, in token of the universal detestation in which they held his sacrilegious attempt, and their dread of God's displeasure against them.

3. The partakers with him in the punishment: for he perished not alone in his iniquity, ch. 22. 20. (1.) The stolen goods were destroyed with him, the garment burnt, as it should have been with the rest of the combustible things in Jericho, and the silver and gold defaced, melted, lost, and buried, in the ashes of the rest of his goods, under the heap of stones, so as never to be put to any other use. (2.) All his other goods were destroyed likewise, not only his tent, and the furniture of that, but his oxen, asses, and sheep; to shew, that goods gotten unjustly, especially if they be gotten by sacrilege, will not only turn to no account, but will blast and waste the rest of the possessions to which they are added. The eagle in the fable, that stole flesh from the altar, brought a coal of fire with it, which burnt her nest, Hab. 2. 9, 10. Zech. 5. 3, 4. They lose their own, that grasp at more than their own. (3.) His sons and daughters were put to death with him. Some indeed think that they were brought out, (v. 24.) only to be the spectators of their father's punishment, but most conclude that they died with him, and that they must be meant, v. 25. where it is said, they burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones. God had expressly provided that magistrates should not put the children to death for the father's sins; but he did not intend to bind himself by that law, and in this case he had expressly ordered, v. 15. that the criminal, and all that he had, should be burnt. Perhaps his sons and daughters were aiders and abettors in the villany, had helped to carry off the accursed things. It is very probable that they assisted in the concealment, and that he could not hide them in the midst of his tent, but they must know and keep his counsel, and so they became accessories ex post facto—after the fact; and if they were ever so little partakers in the crime, it was so heinous, that they were justly sharers in the punishment. However, God was hereby glorified, and the judgment executed was thus made the more tremendous.

4. The punishment itself that was inflicted on him; he was stoned, some think, as a sabbath-breaker, supposing that the sacrilege was committed on the sabbath-day; and then his dead body was burnt, as an accursed thing, of which there should be no remainder left. The concurrence of all the people in this execution, teaches us how much it is the interest of a nation, that all in it should contribute what they can, in their places, to the suppression of vice and profaneness, and the reformation of manners; sin is a reproach to any people, and therefore every Israelite indeed will have a stone to throw at it.

5. The pacifying of God's wrath hereby, v. 26. The Lord turned from the fierceness of his anger. The putting away of sin by true repentance and reformation, as it is the only way, so it is a sure and most effectual way, to recover the divine favour. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease.

VII. The record of his conviction and execution; care was taken to preserve the remembrance of it, for warning and instruction to posterity: 1. A heap of stones was raised on the place where Achan was executed, every one perhaps of the congregation throwing a stone at the heap, in token of his detestation of the crime. 2. A new name was given to the place; it was called, The Valley of Achor, or Trouble. This was a perpetual brand of infamy upon Achan's name, and a perpetual warning to all people not to invade God's property. By this severity against Achan, the honour of Joshua's government, now in the infancy of it, was maintained, and Israel, at their entrance upon the promised Canaan, were minded to observe, at their peril, the provisos and limitations of the grant by which they held it. The Valley of Achor is said to be given for a door of hope, because when we put away the accursed thing, then there begins to be hope in Israel, Hos. 2. 15. Ezra, 10. 2.

CHAP. VIII.

The embarrassment which Achan's sin gave to the affairs of Israel being over we have them here in a very good posture again, the affairs both of war and religion. Here is, I. The glorious progress of their arms in the taking of Ai, before which they had lately suffered disgrace. 1. God encourages Joshua to attack it, with the assurance of success, and directs him what method to take, v. 1, 2. 2. Joshua gives orders accordingly to the men of war, v. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8. 3. The stratagem is managed as it was projected, and succeeds as it was desired, v. 9, 10, 11, 12. 4. Joshua becomes master of this city, puts all to the sword, burns it, hangs the king, but gives the plunder to the soldiers, v. 23, 24, 25. II. The great solemnity of writing and reading the law before a general assembly of all Israel, drawn up for that purpose upon the two mountains of Gerizim and Ebal, according to an order which Moses had received from the Lord, and delivered to them, v. 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35. Thus did they take their work before them, and make the business of their religion to keep pace with their secular business.

I. AND the LORD said unto Joshua, Fear not, neither be thou dismayed: take all the people of war with thee, and arise, go up to Ai: see, I have given into thy hand the king of Ai, and his people, and his city, and his land: 2. And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves: lay thee an ambush for the city behind it.

Israel were very happy in having such a commander as Joshua, but Joshua was more happy in having such a Director as God himself; when any difficulty occurred, he need not to call a council of war, who had God so nigh unto him, not only to answer, but even to prevent, his inquiries. It should seem, Joshua was now at a stand, had scarcely recovered the discomposure he was put into by the trouble Achan gave them, and could not think, without fear and trembling, of pushing forward, lest there should be in the camp another Achan; then God spake to him, either by vision, as before, ch. 5. as a man of war with his sword drawn, or by the breastplate of judgment. Note, When we have faithfully put away sin, that accursed thing, which separates between us and God, then, and not till then, we may expect to hear from God to our comfort; and God's directing us how to go on in our Christian work and warfare, is a good evidence of his being reconciled to us. Observe here, of Achan, and the consequence of it, had been a very great discouragement to Joshua, and made his heart almost ready to fail. Corruptions within the church weaken the hands, and damp the spirits, of her guides and helpers, more than oppositions from without; treacherous Israelites are to be dreaded more than malicious Canaanites. But God bids Joshua not to be dismayed; the same power that keeps Israel from being ruined by their enemies, shall keep them from ruining themselves. To animate him, 1. He assures him of success against Ai, tells him it is all his own; but he must take it as God's gift, I have given it into thy hands, which secured him both title and possession, and obliged him to give God the glory of both, Ps. 44. 3. 2. He allows the people to take the spoil to themselves. Here the spoil was not consecrated to God as that of Jericho, and therefore there was no danger of the people's committing such a trespass as they had committed there. Observe, How Achan, who caught at forbidden spoil, lost that, and life, and all; but the rest of the people, who had conscientiously refrained from the accursed thing, were quickly recompensed for their obedience with the spoil of Ai; the way to have the comfort of what God allows us, is, to forbear what he forbids us. No man shall lose by his self-denial; let God have his dues first, and then all will be clean to us and sure, 1 Kings, 17. 13. God did not bring them to these goodly cities, and houses filled with all good things, to tantalize them with the sight of that which they might not touch; but, having received the first-fruits from Jericho, the spoil of Ai, and of all the cities which from henceforward came into their hands, they might take for a prey to themselves.

1. The encouragement God gives to Joshua to proceed; Fear not, neither be thou dismayed, v. 1. This intimates that the sin

11. The direction he gives him in attacking Ai. It must not be such a work of time as the taking of Jericho was, that would have prolonged the war too much; they that had patiently waited seven days for Jericho, shall have Ai given them in one day. Nor was it, as that, to be taken by miracle, and purely by the act of God, but now their own conduct and courage must be exercised; having seen God work for them, they must now bestir themselves. God directs him, 1. To take all the people, that they might all be spectators of the action, and sharers in the spoil. Hereby God gave him a tacit rebuke for sending so small a detachment against Ai, in the former attempt upon it, ch. 7. 4. 2. To lay an ambush behind the city; this was a method which Joshua would not have thought of at this time, if God had not directed him to it; and though now we are not to expect direction, as here, by visions, voices, or oracles, yet, whenever those who are intrusted with public councils take prudent measures for the public good, it must be acknowledged that God puts it into their hearts; he that teaches the husbandman discretion, no doubt, teaches the statesman and general.

3. So Joshua arose, and all the people of war, to go up against Ai: and Joshua chose out thirty thousand mighty men of valour, and sent them away by night. 4. And he commanded them, saying, Behold, ye shall lie in wait against the city, even behind the city: go not very far from the city, but be ye all ready: 5. And I, and all the people that are with me, will approach unto the city: and it shall come to pass, when they come out against us, as at the first, that we will flee before them, 6 (For they will come out after us) till we have drawn them from the city; for they will say, They flee before us, as at the first: therefore we will flee before them. 7. Then ye shall rise up from the ambush, and seize upon the city: for the LORD your God will deliver it into your hand. 8. And it shall be, when ye have taken the city, that ye shall set the city on fire:

according to the commandment of the LORD shall ye do. See, I have commanded you. 9. Joshua therefore sent them forth: and they went to lie in ambush, and abode between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of Ai: but Joshua lodged that night among the people. 10. And Joshua rose up early in the morning, and numbered the people, and went up, he and the elders of Israel, before the people to Ai. 11. And all the people, even the people of war that were with him, went up, and drew nigh, and came before the city, and pitched on the north side of Ai: now there was a valley between them and Ai. 12. And he took about five thousand men, and set them to lie in ambush between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of the city. 13. And when they had set the people, even all the host that was on the north of the city, and their liers in wait on the west of the city, Joshua went that night into the midst of the valley. 14. And it came to pass, when the king of Ai saw it, that they hasted and rose up early, and the men of the city went out against Israel to battle, he and all his people, at a time appointed, before the plain; but he wist not that there were liers in ambush against him behind the city. 15. And Joshua and all Israel made as if they were beaten before them, and fled by the way of the wilderness. 16. And all the people that were in Ai were called together to pursue after them: and they pursued after Joshua, and were drawn away from the city. 17. And there was not a man left in Ai or Beth-el, that went not out after Israel: and they left the city open, and pursued after Israel. 18. And the LORD said unto Joshua, Stretch out the spear that is in thy hand toward Ai; for I will give it into thine hand. And Joshua stretched out the spear that he had in his hand toward the city. 19. And the ambush arose quickly out of their place, and they ran as soon as he had stretched out his hand: and they entered into the city, and took it, and hasted and set the city on fire. 20. And when the men of Ai looked behind them, they saw, and, behold, the smoke of the city ascended up to heaven, and they had no power to flee this way or that way: and the people that fled to the wilderness turned back upon the pursuers. 21. And when Joshua and all Israel saw that the ambush had taken the city, and that the smoke of the city ascended, then they turned again, and slew the men of Ai. 22. And the other issued out of the city against them; so they were in the midst of Israel, some on this side, and some on that side: and they smote them, so that they let none of them remain or escape

We have here an account of the taking of Ai by stratagem. The stratagem here used, we are sure, was lawful and good; God himself appointed it, and we have no reason to think, but that the like is lawful and good in other wars. Here was no league broken, no oath or promise violated, nor any thing like it; it was not by the pretence of a parley, or treaty of peace, that the advantage was gained, no, these are sacred things, and not to be jested with, nor used to serve a turn; truth, when once it is plighted, becomes a debt even to the enemy. But, in this stratagem, here was no untruth told; nothing was concealed but their own counsels, which no enemy ever pretended a right to be intrusted with; nothing was dissembled, nothing counterfeited but a retreat, which was no natural or necessary indication at all of their inability to maintain their onset, or of any design not to renew it; the enemy ought to have been upon their guard, and to have kept within the defence of their own walls; common prudence, had they been governed by it, would have directed them not to venture on the pursuit of an army which they saw was so far superior to them in numbers, and leave their city unguarded; but (Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur—If the people will be deceived, let them.) If the Canaanites will be so easily imposed upon, and, in pursuit of God's Israel, will break through all the laws of policy and good management, the Israelites are not at all to be blamed for taking advantage of their fury and thoughtlessness; nor is it any way inconsistent with the character God is pleased to give of them, that they are children that will not lie.

Now, in the account here given of this matter,

I. There is some difficulty in adjusting the numbers that were employed to effect it. Mention is made, v. 3. of thirty thousand, that were chosen and sent away by night, to whom the charge was given to surprise the city as soon as ever they perceived it was evacuated, v. 4, 7, 8. And yet afterward, v. 12. it is said, Joshua took five thousand men, and set them to lie in ambush behind the city, and, that ambush entered the city, and set it on fire, v. 19. Now, 1. Some think there were two parties sent out to lie in ambush, thirty thousand first, and afterward five thousand to guard the roads, and to intercept those of the city that might think to save themselves by flight, or to strengthen those that were first sent out; and that Joshua made his open attack upon the city, with all the thousands of Israel. So the learned Bishop Patrick, insisting upon God's command, v. 1. to take all the people of war with him. But, 2. Others think that all the people were taken only to encamp before the city, and that out of them Joshua chose out thirty thousand men to be employed in the action, out of which he sent five thousand to lie in ambush, which were as many as could be supposed to march incognito—without being discovered; (more would have been seen, and thus the design would have been broken;) and that then with the other twenty-five thousand he made the open attack, as Masius thinks, or with the thirty thousand, which, as Calvin thinks, he kept entire for that purpose, having, beside them, sent out five thousand for an ambuscade. And those five thousand (they think) must be meant by them, v. 3. which he sent away by night, with orders to lie in wait behind the city, though the particular number is not specified till v. 12. If we may admit such a seeming disturbance in the order of the narrative, (of which, perhaps, similar instances might be cited from the other scripture histories,) it seems most probable, that there was but one ambushment, which consisted only of five thousand, enough for such a purpose.

II. Yet the principal parts of the story are plain enough, that, a detachment being secretly marched behind the city, on the other side to that on which the main body of the army lay, (the situation of the country, it is probable, favouring their concealment,) Joshua, and the forces with him, faced the city; the garrison made a vigorous sally out upon them, whereupon they withdrew, gave ground, and retreated in some seeming disorder toward the wilderness; which being perceived by the men of Ai, they drew out all the force they had to pursue them. This gave a fair opportunity for them that lay in ambush to make themselves masters of the city, whereof when they had given notice, by a smoke, to Joshua, he, with all his force, returned upon the pursuers, who now, when it was too late, were aware of the snare they were drawn into, for, their retreat being intercepted, they were every man of them cut off. The like artifice we find used, Judg. 20. 29, &c.

Now, in this story, we may observe,

1. What a brave commander Joshua was. See, (1.) His conduct and prudence. God gave him the hint, v. 2. that he should lay in ambush behind the city, but left him to himself to order the particulars, which he did admirably well. Doubtless, Wisdom strengthens the wise more than ten mighty men, Ecl. 7. 19. (2.) His care and industry, v. 10. He rose up early in the morning, that he might lose no time, and to shew how intent his mind was upon his business. Those that would maintain their spiritual conflicts must not love their ease. (3.) His courage and resolution; though an army of Israelites had been repulsed before Ai, yet he resolves to lead them on in person the second time, v. 5. Being himself also an elder, he took the elders of Israel with him to make this attack upon the city, v. 10. as if he was going rather to sit in judgment upon them as criminals, than to fight them as enemies. (4.) His caution and consideration, v. 13. He went that night into the midst of the valley, to make the necessary dispositions for an attack, and to see that every thing was in good order. It is the pious conjecture of the learned Bishop Patrick, that he went into the valley alone, to pray to God for a blessing upon his enterprise, and he did not seek in vain. (5.) His constancy and perseverance; when he had stretched out his spear toward the city, v. 18. (a spear almost as fatal and formidable to the enemies of Israel as the rod of Moses was,) he never drew back his hand till the work was done. His hands in fighting, like Moses's in interceding, were steady to the going down of the sun. Those that have stretched out their hands against their spiritual enemies, must never draw them back. Lastly, What Joshua did in the stratagem is applicable to our Lord Jesus, of whom he was a type. Joshua conquered by yielding, as if he had himself been conquered; so our Lord Jesus, when he bowed his head and gave up the ghost, seemed as if death had triumphed over him, and as if he and all his interests had been routed and ruined; but in his resurrection he rallied again, and gave the powers of darkness a total defeat; he broke the serpent's head, by suffering him to bruise his heel. A glorious stratagem!

2. What an obedient people Israel was; what Joshua commanded them to do according to the commandment of the Lord, v. 8. they did it without murmuring or disputing. They that were sent to lie in ambush between Beth-el and Ai, (two cities confederate against them,) were in a post of danger; and, had they been discovered, might all have been cut off, and yet they ventured it; and, when the body of the army retreated and fled, it was both disgraceful and perilous, and yet, in obedience to Joshua, they did it.

3. What an infatuated enemy the king of Ai was, (1.) That he did not by his scouts discover those that lay in ambush behind the city, v. 14. Some observe it as a remarkable instance of the power of God, in making men blind to their own interest, and the things that belong to their peace, that he wist not that there were liers in wait against him. They are most in danger, who are least aware that they are so. (2.) That, when Israel seemed to fly, he drew out all his forces to pursue them, and left none to guard his city, and to secure his retreat, v. 17. Thus the church's enemies often run themselves into destruction by their own fury, and the violence of their rage against the Israel of God. Pharaoh plunged himself into the Red sea by the eagerness with which he pursued Israel. (3.) That, from the killing of thirty-six men out of three thousand, when Israel made the former attack upon his city, he should infer the total routing of so great an army as now he had to deal with, v. 6. They flee before us as, at the first. See how the prosperity of fools destroys them, and hardens them to their ruin. God had made use of the men of Ai as a scourge to chastise his people for meddling with the accursed thing, and this had puffed them up with a conceit, that they must have the honour of delivering their country from these formidable invaders; but they were soon made to see their mistake, and that, when the Israelites had reconciled themselves to their God, they could have no power against them. God had made use of them only for the rebuking of Israel, with a purpose, when the correction was over, to throw the rod itself into the fire; howbeit, they meant not so, but it was in their heart to destroy and cut off, Isa. 10. 5. 7.

4. What a complete victory Israel obtained over them by the favour and blessing of God. Each did his part, the divided forces of Israel, by signals agreed on, understood one another, and every thing succeeded according to the project; so that the men of Ai, then when they were most confident of victory, found themselves surrounded, so that they had neither spirit to resist, nor room to fly, but were under a fatal necessity of yielding their lives to the destroyers. And now it is hard to say, whether the shouts of the men of Israel, or the shrieks of the men of Ai, were the louder, but easy to imagine what terror and confusion they were filled with, when their highest assurances sunk so suddenly into the heaviest despair. Note, The triumphing of the wicked is short, Job, 20. 5. They are exalted for a little while, that their fall and ruin may be the sorer, Job, 24. 24. See how easily, how quickly, the scale turns against them that have not God on their side.

23. And the king of Ai they took alive, and brought him to Joshua. 24. And it came to pass, when Israel had made an end of slaying all the inhabitants of Ai in the field, in the wilderness wherein they chased them, and when they were all fallen on the edge of the sword, until they were consumed, that all the Israelites returned unto Ai, and smote it with the edge of the sword. 25. And so it was, that all that fell that day, both of men and women, were twelve thousand, even all the men of Ai. 26. For Joshua drew not his hand back, wherewith he stretched out the spear, until he had utterly destroyed all the inhabitants of Ai. 27. Only the cattle and the spoil of that city Israel took for a prey unto themselves, according unto the word of the LORD which he commanded Joshua. 28. And Joshua burnt Ai, and made it an heap for ever, even a desolation unto this day. 29. And the king of Ai he hanged on a tree until eventide: and as soon as the sun was down, Joshua commanded that they should take his carcase down from the tree, and cast it at the entering of the gate of the city, and raise thereon a great heap of stones, that remaineth unto this day.

We have here an account of the improvement which the Israelites made of their victory over Ai.

1. They put all to the sword, not only in the field, but in the city, man, woman, and child, none of them remained, v. 24. God, the righteous Judge, had passed this sentence upon them for their wickedness, so that the Israelites were only the ministers of his justice, and the executioners of his doom. Once in this story, and but once, mention is made of the men of Beth-el, as confederates with the men of Ai, v. 17. Though they had a king of their own, and were not subjects to the king of Ai, (for the king of Beth-el is reckoned among the thirty-one kings that Joshua destroyed, ch. 12. 16.) yet Ai being a stronger place, they threw themselves into that, for their own safety, and the strengthening of their neighbours' hands, and so (we may presume) were all cut off with them; thus, that by which they hoped to prevent their own ruin hastened it. The whole number of the slain, it seems, was but twelve thousand, an inconsiderable body to make head against all the thousands of Israel; but whom God will destroy, he infatuates. Here it is said, v. 26. that Joshua drew not his hand back wherewith he stretched out the spear, v. 18. till the slaughter was completed. Some think the spear he stretched out, was not to slay the enemies, but to animate and encourage his own soldiers, some flag or ensign being hung out at the end of the spear; and, they observe it as an instance of his self-denial, that though the fire of courage, wherewith his breast was filled, would have pushed him forward, sword in hand, into the hottest of the action, yet, in obedience to God, he kept the inferior post of a standard-bearer, and did not quit it till the work was done. By the spear stretched out, he directed the people to expect their help from God, and to him to give the praise.

2. They plundered the city, and took all the spoil to themselves, v. 27. Thus the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just; the spoil they brought out of Egypt, by borrowing of their neighbours, was much of it expended upon the tabernacle they had reared in the wilderness, for which they are now reimbursed with interest. The spoil here taken, it is probable, was all brought together, and distributed by Joshua in due proportions, as that of the Midianites was, Numb. 31. 26, &c. It was not seized with irregularity or violence, for God is the God of order and equity, and not of confusion.

3. They laid the city in ashes, and left it to remain so, v. 28. Israel must yet dwell in tents, and therefore this city, as well as Jericho, must be burnt. And though there was no curse entailed upon him that should rebuild it, yet, it seems, it was not rebuilt, unless it be the same with Aija, which we read of, long after, Neh. 11. 31. Some think it was not rebuilt, because Israel had received a defeat before it, the remembrance of which should be buried in the ruins of the city.

4. The king of Ai was taken prisoner and cut off, not by the sword of war, as a soldier, but by the sword of justice, as a malefactor. Joshua ordered him to be hanged, and his dead body thrown at the gate of his own city, under a heap of stones, v. 23, 29. Some particular reason, no doubt, there was for this severity against the king of Ai; it is likely he had been notoriously wicked and vile, and a blasphemer of the God of Israel, perhaps, upon occasion of the repulse he had given to the forces of Israel in their first onset. Some observe, that his dead body was thrown at the gate where he had been wont to sit in judgment, that so much the greater contempt might thereby be poured upon the dignity he had been proud of, and he might be punished for the unrighteous decrees he had made in the very place where he had made them. Thus the Lord is known by the judgments which he executes.

30. Then Joshua built an altar unto the LORD God of Israel in mount Ebal, 31. As Moses the servant of the LORD commanded the children of Israel, as it is written in the book of the law of Moses, an altar of whole stones, over which no man hath lift up any iron: and they offered thereon burnt-offerings unto the LORD, and sacrificed peace-offerings. 32. And he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel. 33. And all Israel, and their elders, and officers, and their judges, stood on this side the ark and on that side before the priests the Levites, which bare the ark of the covenant of the LORD, as well the stranger, as he that was born among them; half of them over against mount Gerizim, and half of them over against mount Ebal; as Moses the servant of the LORD had commanded before, that they should bless the people of Israel. 34. And afterward he read all the words of the law, the blessings and cursings, according to all that is written in the book of the law. 35. There was not a word of all that Moses commanded, which Joshua read not before all the congregation of Israel, with the women, and the little ones, and the strangers that were conversant among them.

This religious solemnity, which we have here an account of, comes in somewhat surprisingly in the midst of the history of the wars of Canaan. After the taking of Jericho and Ai, we should have expected, that the next news should have been of their taking possession of the country, the pushing on of their victories in other cities, and the carrying of the war into the bowels of the nation, now that they had made themselves masters of these frontier towns. But here a scene opens of quite another nature; the camp of Israel is drawn out into the field, not to engage the enemy, but to offer sacrifice, to hear the law read, and to say Amen to the blessings and the curses. Some think this was not done till after some of the following victories were obtained, which we read of, ch. 10. and 11. But it should seem, by the maps, that Shechem (near to which these two mountains, Gerizim and Ebal, were) was not so far off from Ai, but that, when they had taken that, they might penetrate into that country, as far as those two mountains, and therefore I would not willingly admit a transposition of the story; and the rather, because, as it comes in here, it is a remarkable instance, 1. Of the zeal of Israel for the service of God, and for his honour. Though never was war more honourable, more pleasant, or more gainful, nor ever was war more sure of victory, nor more necessary to a settlement, (for they had neither houses nor lands of their own, till they had won them by the sword, no, not Joshua himself,) yet all the business of the war shall stand still, while they make a long march to the place appointed, and there attend this solemnity. God appointed them to do this when they were got over Jordan, and they did it as soon as possibly they could, though they might have had a colourable pretence to have put it off. Note, We must not think to defer our covenanting with God till we are settled in the world, nor must any business put us by from minding and pursuing the one thing needful. The way to prosper, is, to begin with God, Matth. 6. 33. 2. It is an instance of the care of God concerning his faithful servants and worshippers. Though they were in an enemy's country, as yet unconquered, yet, in the service of God they were safe, as Jacob, when, in this very country, he was going to Beth-el to pay his vows, the terror of God was upon the cities round about, Gen. 35. 5. Note, When we are in the way of duty, God takes us under his special protection.

Twice Moses had given express orders for this solemnity; once, Deut. 11. 29, 30. where he seems to have pointed to the very place where it was to be performed; and again, Deut. 27. 2, &c. It was a federal transaction; the covenant was now renewed between God and Israel, upon their taking possession of the land of promise, that they might be encouraged in the conquest of it, and might know upon what terms they held it, and come under fresh obligations to obedience. In token of the covenant,

1. They built an altar, and offered sacrifice to God, v. 30, 31. in token of their dedication of themselves to God, as living sacrifices to his honour, in and by a mediator, who is the altar that sanctifies this gift. This altar was erected on mount Ebal, the mount on which the curse was put, Deut. 11. 29. to signify that there, where by the law we had reason to expect a curse, by Christ's sacrifice of himself for us, and his mediation, we have peace with God; he has redeemed us from the curse of the law, by being made a curse for us, Gal. 3. 13. Even there where it was said, by the curse, Ye are not my people; there it is said, through Christ the Altar, Ye are the children of the living God, Hos. 1. 10. The curses pronounced on mount Ebal would immediately have been executed, if atonement had not been made by sacrifice.

By the sacrifices offered on this altar they did likewise give God the glory of the victories they had already obtained, as Exod. 17. 15. Now, that they had had the comfort of them in the spoils of Ai, it was fit that God should have the praise of them; and they also implored his favour for their future success; for supplications, as well as thanksgivings, were intended in their peace-offerings. The way to prosper, in all that we put our hand to, is, to take God along with us, and in all our ways to acknowledge him by prayer, praise, and dependence.

The altar they built was of rough unhewn stone, according to the law, Exod. 20. 25. for that which is most plain and natural, and least artful and affected in the worship of God, he is best pleased with. Man's device can add no beauty to God's institutions.

II. They received the law from God; and this they must do, that would find favour from him, and expect to have their offerings accepted; for, if we turn away our ear from hearing the law, our prayers will be an abomination. When God took Israel into covenant, he gave them his law, and they, in token of their consent to the covenant, subjected themselves to the law. Now, here,

1. The law of the ten commandments was written upon stones in the presence of all Israel, as an abridgment of the whole, v. 32. This copy was not graven in the stone, as that which was reserved in the ark, that was to be done only by the finger of God; it is his prerogative to write the law in the heart, but the stones were plastered, and it was written upon the plaster, Deut. 27. 4, 8. It was written, that all might see what it was that they consented to, and that it might be a standing remaining testimony, to posterity, of God's goodness, in giving them such good laws, and a testimony against them, if they were disobedient to them. It is a great mercy to any people to have the law of God in writing, and it is fit that the written law should be exposed to common view in a known tongue, that it may be seen and read of all men.

2. The blessings and the curses, the sanctions of the law, were publicly read, and the people, (we may suppose,) according to Moses's appointment, said Amen to them, v. 33, 34. The auditory was very large; (1.) The greatest prince was not excused, the elders, officers, and judges, are not above the cognizance of the law, but will come under the blessing or the curse, according as they are, or are not, obedient to it, and therefore they must be present to consent to the covenant, and to go before the people therein. (2.) The poorest stranger was not excluded; here was a general naturalization of them; as well the stranger, as he that was born among them, was taken into covenant: this was an encouragement to proselytes, and a happy presage of the kindnesses intended for the poor Gentiles in the latter days.

The tribes were posted, as Moses directed, six toward Gerizim, and six toward Ebal. And the ark, in the midst of the valley, was between them, for it was the ark of the covenant; and in it were shut up the close rolls of that law, which were copied out, and shewn openly upon the stones. The covenant was commanded, and the command covenanted. The priests that attended the ark, or some of the Levites that attended them, after the people had all taken their places, and silence was proclaimed, pronounced distinctly the blessings and the curses, as Moses had drawn them up, to which the tribes said Amen; and yet it is here only said, that they should bless the people, for the blessing was that which was first and chiefly intended, and which God designed in giving the law. If they fell under the curse, that was their own fault. And it was really a blessing to the people, that they had this matter laid so plainly before them, Life and death, good and evil; he had not dealt so with other nations.

3. The law itself also, containing the precepts and prohibitions, was read, (v. 35.) it should seem by Joshua himself, who did not think it below him to be a reader in the congregation of the Lord. In conformity to this example, the solemn reading of the law, which was appointed once in seven years, (Deut. 31. 10, 11.) was performed by their king or chief magistrate. It is here intimated what a general publication of the law this was, (1.) Every word was read; even the minutest precepts were not omitted, nor the most copious abridged; not one iota or tittle of the law shall pass away, and therefore none was, in reading, skipped over, under pretence of want of time, or that any part was needless, or not proper to be read. It was not many weeks since Moses had preached the whole book of Deuteronomy to them, yet Joshua must now read it all over again: it is good to hear twice what God has spoken once, (Ps. 62. 11.) and to review what has been delivered to us, or to have it repeated, that we may not let it slip. (2.) Every Israelite was present, even the women and the little ones, that all might know and do their duty. Note, Masters of families should bring their wives and children with them to the solemn assemblies for religious worship. All that are capable of learning, must come to be taught out of the law. The strangers also attended with them; for wherever we are, though but as strangers, we should improve every opportunity of acquainting ourselves with God and his holy will.

CHAP. IX.

Here is in this chapter, I. The impolitic confederacy of the kings of Canaan against Israel, v. 1, 2. II. The politic confederacy of the inhabitants of Gibeon with Israel. 1. How it was subtly proposed and petitioned for by the Gibeonites, pretending to come from a far country, v. 3—13. 2. How it was unwarily consented to by Joshua and the Israelites, to the disgust of the congregation when the fraud was discovered, v. 11—18. 3. How the matter was adjusted to the satisfaction of all sides, by giving these Gibeonites their lives, because they had covenanted with them, yet depriving them of their liberties, because the covenant was not fairly obtained, v. 19—27.

1. AND it came to pass, when all the kings which were on this side Jordan, in the hills, and in the valleys, and in all the coasts of the great sea over against Lebanon, the Hittite, and the Amorite, the Canaanite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite, heard thereof; 2. That they gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua and with Israel, with one accord.

Hitherto the Canaanites had acted defensively, the Israelites were the aggressors upon Jericho and Ai; but here the kings of Canaan are in consultation to attack Israel, and concert matters for a vigorous effort of their united forces, to check the progress of their victorious arms. Now, 1. It was strange they did not do this sooner. They had notice long since of their approach; Israel's design upon Canaan was no secret; one would have expected that a prudent concern for their common safety should have put them upon taking some measures to oppose their coming over Jordan, and maintain that pass against them, or to have given them a warm reception as soon as they were over. It was strange they did not attempt to raise the siege of Jericho, or at least fall in with the men of Ai, when they had given them a defeat. But they were, either through presumption or despair, wonderfully infatuated, and at their wit's end; many know not the things that belong to their peace till they are hid from their eyes. 2. It was more strange that they did it now. Now that the conquest of Jericho had given such a pregnant proof of God's power, and that of Ai of Israel's policy, one would have thought the end of their consultation should have been, not to fight with Israel, but to make peace with them, and to gain the best terms they could for themselves. This had been their wisdom, (Luke 14. 32.) but their minds were blinded, and their hearts hardened to their destruction.

Observe, (1.) What induced them now at last to enter upon this consultation. When they heard thereof, (v. 1.) not only of the conquest of Jericho and Ai, but of the convention of the states of mount Ebal, which we have an account of immediately before, when they heard that Joshua, as if he thought himself already complete master of the country, had had all his people together, and had read the laws to them, by which they must be governed, and taken their promises to submit to those laws, then they perceived the Israelites were in good earnest, and thought it was high time for them to bestir themselves. The pious devotion of God's people sometimes provokes and exasperates their enemies more than any thing else. (2.) How unanimous they were in their resolves. Though they were many kings of different nations, Hittites, Amorites, Perizzites, &c. doubtless of different interests, and that had often been at variance one with another, yet they determined, ne mine contradicente—unanimously, to unite against Israel. O that Israel would learn this of Canaanites, to sacrifice private interests to the public welfare, and to lay aside all animosities among themselves, that they may cordially unite against the common enemies of God's kingdom among men!

3. And when the inhabitants of Gibeon heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho and to Ai, 4. They did work wilyly, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors, and took old sacks upon their asses, and wine-bottles, old and rent, and bound up; 5. And old shoes and clouted upon their feet, and old garments upon them; and all the bread of their provision was dry and mouldy. 6. And they went to Joshua unto the camp at Gilgal, and said unto him, and to the men of Israel, We be come from a far country: now therefore make ye a league with us. 7. And the men of Israel said unto the Hivites, Peradventure ye dwell among us; and how shall we make a league with you? 8. And they said unto Joshua, We are thy servants. And Joshua said unto them, Who are ye? and from whence come ye? 9. And they said unto him, From a very far country thy servants are come, because of the name of the LORD thy God: for we have heard the fame of him, and all that he did in Egypt, 10. And all that he did to the two kings of the Amorites, that were beyond Jordan, to Sihon king of Heshbon, and to Og king of Bashan, which was at Ashtaroth. 11. Wherefore our elders and all the inhabitants of our country, spake to us, saying, Take victuals with you for the journey, and go to meet them, and say unto them, We are your servants: therefore now make ye a league with us. 12. This our bread we took for our provision out of our houses on the day we came forth to go unto you; but now, behold, it is dry, and it is mouldy: 13. And these bottles of wine which we filled, were new; and, behold, they be rent; and these our garments and our shoes are become old, by reason of the very long journey. 14. And the men took of their victuals, and asked not counsel at the mouth of the LORD.

Here,

1. The Gibeonites desire to make peace with Israel, being alarmed by the tidings they heard of the destruction of Jericho, v. 3.

Other people heard those tidings, and were irritated thereby to make war upon Israel; but the Gibeonites heard them, and were induced to make peace with them. Thus the discovery of the glory and the grace of God in the gospel, is to some a savour of life unto life; but to others a savour of death unto death, 2 Cor. 2. 16. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. I do not remember that we read any where of a king of Gibeon. Had their government been at this time in a single person, perhaps his heart would have been too high to yield to Israel, and he would have joined with the rest of the kings against Israel. But these four united cities, mentioned v. 17. seem to have been governed by elders or senators, v. 11. who consulted the common safety more than their own personal dignity. The inhabitants of Gibeon did well for themselves. We have,

11. The method they took to compass it. They knew that all the inhabitants of the land of Canaan were to be cut off, perhaps they had some spies in the congregation at Ebal, when the law was read, who observed and brought them notice of the command given to Israel, Dent. 7. 1. 3. that they should show no mercy to the Canaanites, give them no quarter in battle, which made them afraid of fighting them, and that they should make no covenant with them, which made them despair of gaining any advantage by treating with them: and therefore there was no way of saving their lives from the sword of Israel, unless they could, by disguising themselves, make Joshua believe that they came from some very far country, which the Israelites were not commanded to make war upon, nor forbidden to make peace with, but were particularly appointed to offer peace to, Dent. 20. 10, 15. Unless they could be admitted under this notion, they saw there was but one way with them, they must submit to the fate of Jericho and Ai. Though the neighbouring princes knew that all the men thereof were mighty, (ch. 10. 2.) and they knew it themselves, yet they durst not contend with Israel, who had an Almighty God on their side. This therefore is the only game they have to play, and they play it very artfully and successfully; never was any such thing more craftily managed.

1. They come under the character of ambassadors from a foreign state, which they thought would please the princes of Israel, and make them proud of the honour of being courted by distant countries: we find Hezekiah fond of those that came to him from a far country, Isa. 39. 3. they had not used to be thus courted.

2. They pretended to have undergone the fatigues of a very long journey, and produced what passed for an ocular demonstration of it. It should seem it was then usual for those that undertook long journeys, to take with them, as we do now, for long voyages, all manner of provision in kind, the country not being furnished as our's is now with houses of entertainment, for the convenience of which, when we have occasion to make use of them, we have reason to be very thankful. Now, they here pretended that their provision, when they brought it from home, was fresh and new, but now it appeared to be old and dry, whereas it might well be presumed they had not loitered, but made the best of their way; so that from hence it must be inferred that they came, as they said they did, from a very far country, their sacks or portmanteaus were old, the wine all drank, and the bottles, in which it had been, broken, their shoes and clothes were worse than those of the Israelites in forty years, their bread mouldy, v. 4. 5. and again, v. 12, 13. Thus God's Israel have often been deceived and imposed upon with a show of antiquity. But (as Bishop Hall expresses it) errors are never the older for being patched, and so seeming old; but they that will be caught with this Gibeonitish stratagem, prove they have not consulted with God. And thus there are those who make themselves poor with the badges of want and distress, and yet have great riches, Prov. 13. 7. or at least have no need of relief, by which fraud charity is misplaced, and denied to those that are real objects of it.

3. When they were suspected, and more strictly examined from whence they came, they industriously declined telling the name of their country, till the agreement was settled; (1.) The men of Israel suspected a fraud, v. 7. "Peradventure ye dwell among us, and then we may not, we must not, make any league with you;" this might have discouraged the Gibeonites from urging the matter any further, concluding, that, if the peace were made, the Israelites would not think themselves obliged to keep it, having thus solemnly protested against it, in case they dwell among them; but, knowing that there was no hope at all if they stood it out, they bravely ventured a submission; "Who knows but the people of Israel may save us alive, though thus inveigled into a promise? and, if we tell them at last, we shall but die." (2.) Joshua put the questions to them, Who are ye? and from whence come ye? He finds himself concerned to stand upon his guard against secret fraud, as well as against open force; we, in our spiritual warfare, must stand against the wiles of the devil, remembering he is a subtle serpent as well as a roaring lion. In all leagues of relation and friendship, we must first try and then trust, lest we repent, at leisure, agreements made in haste. (3.) They would not tell whence they came; but still repeat the same thing, We are come from a very far country, v. 9. They will have it thought, that it is a country Israel knows nothing of, nor ever heard of, and therefore would be never the wiser, if they should tell him the name of it.

4. They profess a respect for the God of Israel, the more to ingratiate themselves with Joshua, and we charitably believe they were sincere in this profession, "We are come because of the name of the Lord thy God, v. 9. because of what we have heard of that name, which has convinced us that it is above every name, and because we have a desire toward that name, and the remembrance of it, and would gladly come under its protection."

5. They fetch their inducements from what had been done some time before in Moses's reign, the tidings whereof might easily be supposed ere this to have reached distant regions, the plagues of Egypt and the destruction of Sihon and Og, v. 9, 10. but prudently say nothing of the destruction of Jericho and Ai, (though that was the true inducement, v. 3.) because they will have it supposed that they came from home long before those conquests were made. We need not be long to seek for reasons why we should submit to the God of Israel; we may be furnished either with new or old, which we will.

6. They make a good submission, We are your servants, and humbly sue for a general agreement, make a league with us, v. 11. They insist not upon terms, but will be glad of peace upon any terms; nor will the case admit of delays, lest the fraud be discovered; fain would they have the bargain struck up immediately; if Joshua will but make a league with them, they have all they come for, and they hope their ragged clothes and clouted shoes will be no exception against them; God and Israel reject none for their poverty.

Now, (1.) Their falsehood cannot be justified, nor ought it to be drawn into a precedent. We must not do evil, that good may come. Had they owned their country, but renounced the idolatries of it, resigning the possession of it to Israel, and themselves to the God of Israel, we have reason to think Joshua would have been directed by the oracle of God to spare their lives, and they needed not to have made these pretensions. It is observable, when they had once said, We are come from a far country, v. 6. they found themselves necessitated to say it again, v. 9. and to say what was utterly false concerning their bread, their bottles, their clothes, v. 12, 13. for one lie is an inlet to another, and that to a third, and so on. The way of that sin is down-hill.

But, (2.) Their faith and prudence are to be greatly commended; our Lord commended even the unjust steward, because he had done wisely and well for himself, Luke, 16. 8. In submitting to Israel, they submitted to the God of Israel, which implied a renunciation of the god they had served, a resiguation to the laws of the true religion. They had heard enough to convince them of the infinite power of the God of Israel, and from thence might infer his other perfections of wisdom and goodness; and how can we do better for ourselves, than surrender at discretion to Infinite Wisdom, and cast ourselves upon the mercy of a God of infinite goodness? The submission of these Gibeonites was the more laudable, because it was, [1.] Singular; their neighbours took another course, and expected they should join with them. [2.] Speedy; they did not stay till Israel had besieged their cities, then it had been too late to capitulate; but, when they were at some distance, they desired conditions of peace. The way to avoid a judgment is to meet it by repentance. Let us imitate these Gibeonites, and make our peace with God in the rags of humiliation, godly sorrow, and mortification, so our iniquity shall not be our ruin. Let us be servants to Jesus, our blessed Joshua, and make a league with him and the Israel of God, and we shall live.

15. And Joshua made peace with them, and made a league with them, to let them live: and the princes of the congregation swore unto them. 16. And it came to pass at the end of three days after they had made a league with them, that they heard that they were their neighbours, and that they dwelt among them. 17. And the children of Israel journeyed, and came unto their cities on the third day. Now their cities were Gibeon, and Chephirah, and Beeroth, and Kirjath-jearim. 18. And the children of Israel smote them not, because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them by the LORD God of Israel. And all the congregation murmured against the princes. 19. But all the princes said unto all the congregation, We have sworn unto them by the LORD God of Israel: now therefore we may not touch them. 20. This we will do to them; we will even let them live, lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath which we swore unto them. 21. And the princes said unto them, Let them live: but let them be hewers of wood and drawers of water unto all the congregation; as the princes had promised them.

Here is,

I. The treaty soon concluded with the Gibeonites, v. 14, 15. The thing was not done with much formality, but in short. 1. They agreed to let them live, and more the Gibeonites did not ask. In a common war this had been but a small matter to be granted; but in the wars of Canaan, which were to make a general destruction, it was a great favour to a Canaanite to have his life given him for a prey, Jer. 45. 5. 2. This agreement was made, not by Joshua only, but by the princes of the congregation, in conjunction with him. Though Joshua had an extraordinary call to the government, and extraordinary qualifications for it, yet he would not act in an affair of this nature, without the counsel and concurrence of the princes, who were neither kept in the dark nor kept under foot, but were treated by him as sharers in the government. 3. It was ratified by an oath, they swore unto them, not by any of the gods of Canaan, but by the God of Israel only, v. 19. They that mean honestly, do not startle at assurances, but satisfy those with whom they treat, and glorify God, by calling him to witness to the sincerity of their intentions. 4. Nothing appears to have been culpable in all this, but that it was done rashly; they took of their victuals, by which they satisfied themselves that it was indeed old and dry, but did not consider that that was no proof of their bringing it fresh from home; so that, making use of their senses only, but not their reason, they received the men (as the margin reads it) because of their victuals, perceiving perhaps, upon the view and taste of their bread, not only that now it was old, but that it had been fine and very good at first, whence they inferred that they were persons of some quality, and therefore the friendship of their country was not to be despised. But they asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord. They had the Urim and Thummim with them, which they might have advised with in this difficult case, and that would have told them no lie, would have led them into no error; but they relied so much on their own politics, that they thought it needless to bring the matter to the oracle. Joshua himself was not altogether without blame herein. Note, We then make more haste than good speed in any business, when we stay not to take God along with us, and by the word and prayer to consult him. Many a time we see cause to reflect upon it, with regret, that such and such an affair miscarried, because we asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord; would we acknowledge him in all our ways, we should find them more safe, easy and successful.

II. The fraud soon discovered by which this league was procured. A lying tongue is but for a moment, and truth will be the daughter of time. Within three days they found, to their great surprise, that the cities which these ambassadors had treated for were very near them, but one night's foot-march from the camp at Gilgal, ch. 10. 9. Either their own scouts, or the parties that sallied out to acquaint themselves with the country, or perhaps some deserters that came over to them from the enemy, informed them of the truth in this matter. They that suffer themselves to be deceived, by the wiles of Satan, will soon be undeceived to their confusion, and will find that near, even at the door, which they imagined was very far off.

III. The disgust of the congregation at this. They did indeed submit to the restraints which this league laid upon them, and smote not the cities of the Gibeonites, neither slew the persons, nor seized the prey; but it vexed them to have their hands thus tied, and they murmured against the princes, (v. 18.) it is to be feared, more from a jealousy for their own profit, than from a zeal for the fulfilling of God's command, though some of them perhaps had a regard to that. Many are forward to arraign and censure the actions of princes, while they are ignorant of the springs of those actions, and are incompetent judges of the reasons of state that govern them. While therefore we are satisfied in general that those who are over us aim at nothing but the public good, and sincerely seek the welfare of their people, we ought to make the best of what they do, and not exercise ourselves in things above us.

IV. The prudent endeavour of the princes to pacify the discontented congregation, and to accommodate the matter; herein all the princes concurred and were unanimous, which doubtless disposed the people to acquiesce.

1. They resolved to spare the lives of the Gibeonites, for so they had expressly sworn to do, v. 15. to let them live.

(1.) The oath was lawful, else it had not bound them, any more than Herod's oath bound him to cut off John Baptist's head; it is true, God had appointed them to destroy all the Canaanites, but that law must be construed in favorem vitæ—with some tender allowance, to mean those only that stood it out, and would not surrender their country to them, and not to bind them so far to put off the sense of honour and humanity, as to slay those who had never lifted up a hand against them, nor ever would, but, before they were reduced to any extremity, or ever attempted any act of hostility, with one consent humbled themselves; the kings of Israel were certainly more merciful kings than to do so, 1 Kings, 20. 31. and the God of Israel a more merciful God than to order it so; Satis est prostrasse leonem—It is enough to have laid the lion prostrate. And, besides, the reason of the law is the law; the mischief designed to be prevented by that law, was the infecting of the Israelites with their idolatry; Deut. 7. 4. But if the Gibeonites renounce their idolatry, and become friends and servants to the house of God, the danger is effectually prevented, the reason of the law ceases, and consequently the obligation of it, especially to a thing of this nature. The conversion of sinners shall prevent their ruin.

(2.) The oath being lawful, both the princes, and the people for whom they transacted, were bound by it, bound in conscience, bound in honour, to the God of Israel, by whom they had sworn, and whose names would have been blasphemed by the Canaanites, if they had violated this oath. They speak as those that feared an oath, (Eecl. 9. 2.) when they argued thus; We will let them live, lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath which we swore, v. 20. He that ratifies a promise with an oath, imprecates the divine vengeance if he wilfully break his promise, and has reason to expect that divine justice will take him at his word. God is not mocked, and therefore oaths are not to be jested with. The princes will keep their word, [4.] Though they lost by it. A citizen of Sion swears to his own hurt, and changes not, Ps. 15. 4. Joshua and the princes, when they found it was to their prejudice that they had thus bound themselves, did not apply themselves to Eleazar for a dispensation, much less did they pretend that no faith is to be kept with heretics, with Canaanites; no, they were strangers to the modern artifices of the Roman Church, to elude the most sacred bonds, and even to sanctify perjuries. [1.] Though the people were uneasy at it, and their discontent might have ended in a mutiny, yet the princes would not violate their engagement to the Gibeonites; we must never be over-awed, either by majesty or multitude, to do a sinful thing, and to go against our consciences. [3.] Though they were drawn into this league by a wile, and might have had a very plausible pretence to declare it null and void, yet they adhered to it. They might have pleaded that though those were the men with whom they exchanged the ratifications, yet these were not the cities intended in the league; they had promised to spare certain cities, without names, that were very far off, and upon the express consideration of their being so, but these were very near, and therefore not the cities that they covenanted with. And many learned men have thought that they were so grossly imposed upon by the Gibeonites, that it would have been lawful for them to have recalled their promise; but to preserve their reputation, and to keep up in Israel a veneration for an oath, they would stand to it; but it is plain that they thought themselves indispensably obliged by it, and were apprehensive that the wrath of God would fall upon them if they broke it. And, however their adherence to it might be displeasing to the congregation, it is plain that it was acceptable to God, for when, in pursuance of this league, they undertook the protection of the Gibeonites, God gave them the most glorious victory that ever they had in all their wars, ch. 10. and long after severely avenged the wrong Saul did to the Gibeonites in violation of this league, 2 Sam. 21. 1. Let this convince us all how religiously we ought to perform our promises, and make good our bargains; and what conscience we ought to make of our words, when they are once given. If a covenant obtained by so many lies and deceits might not be broken, shall we think to evade the obligation of those that have been made with all possible honesty and fairness? If the fraud of others will not justify or excuse our falsehood, certainly the honesty of others, in dealing with us, will aggravate and condemn our dishonesty, in dealing with them.

2. Though they spared their lives, yet they seized their liberties, and sentenced them to be hewers of wood, and drawers of water, to the congregation, v. 21. By this proposal the discontented congregation was pacified; for, (1.) They who were angry that the Gibeonites lived, might be content when they saw them condemned to that which, in the general apprehension, is worse than death, perpetual servitude. (2.) They who were angry that they were not spoiled, might be content when their service of the congregation would be more to the public advantage, than their best effects could be; and, in short, the Israelites would be no losers either in honour or profit by this peace with the Gibeonites; convince them of this, and they will be satisfied.

22. And Joshua called for them, and he spake unto them, saying, Wherefore have ye beguiled us, saying, We are very far from you; when ye dwell among us? 23. Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall none of you be freed from being bondmen, and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God. 24. And they answered Joshua, and said, Because it was certainly told thy servants, how that the LORD thy God commanded his servant Moses to give you all the land, and to destroy all the inhabitants of the land from before you, therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing. 25. And now, behold, we are in thine hand: as it seemeth good and right unto thee to do unto us, do. 26. And so did he unto them, and delivered them out of the hand of the children of Israel, that they slew them not. 27. And Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the altar of the LORD, even unto this day, in the place which he should choose.

The matter is here settled between Joshua and the Gibeonites, and an explanation of the league agreed upon; we may suppose that now, not the messengers who were first sent, but the elders of Gibeon, and of the cities that were dependent upon it, were themselves present, and treated with, that the matter might be fully compromised.

I. Joshua reproves them for their fraud, v. 22. And they excuse it as well as they can, v. 24. 1. Joshua gives the reproof very mildly; Wherefore have ye beguiled us? He does not load them with any ill names, does not give them any harsh provoking language, does not call them, as they deserved to be called, base liars, but only asks them, Why have ye beguiled us? Under the greatest provocations, it is our wisdom and duty to keep our temper, and to bridle our passion; a just cause needs not anger to defend it, and a bad one is made never the better by it. 2. They make the best excuse for themselves that the thing would bear, v. 24. They found, by the word of God, that sentence of death was passed upon them, (the command was to destroy all the inhabitants of the land, without exception,) and they found, by the works of God already wrought, that there was no opposing the execution of this sentence; they considered that God's sovereignty is incontestable, his justice inflexible, his power irresistible, and therefore resolved to try what his mercy was, and found it was not in vain to cast themselves upon it. They do not go about to justify their lie, but in effect beg pardon for it, pleading it was purely to save their lives that they did it, which every man, that finds in himself the force of the law of self-preservation, will therefore make great allowances for; especially in such a case as this, where the fear was not merely of the power of man, (if that were all, one might flee from that to the divine protection,) but of the power of God himself, which they saw engaged against them.

II. Joshua condemns them to servitude, as a punishment of their fraud, v. 23. and they submit to the sentence, v. 25. and, for aught that appears, both sides are pleased.

1. Joshua pronounces them perpetual bondmen. They had purchased their lives with a lie, but that being no good consideration, he obliges them to hold their lives under the rent and reservation of their continual labours, in hewing wood and drawing water, the meanest and most toilsome employments. Thus their lie was punished; had they dealt fairly and plainly with Israel, perhaps they had had more honourable conditions granted them, but now, since they gain their lives with ragged clothes and clouted shoes, the badges of servitude, they are condemned for ever to wear such, so must their doom be. And thus the ransom of their lives is paid; dominion is acquired by the preservation of a life that lies at mercy, (Servus dicitur a servando—A servant is so called from the act of saving,) they owe their service to them to whom they owe their lives. Observe how the judgment is given again:

them. (1.) Their servitude is made a curse to them. "Now ye are cursed with the ancient curse of Canaan," from whom these Hivites descended, a servant of servants shall thou be, Gen. 9. 25. What shall be done to the false tongue but this? Cursed shall it be. (2.) Yet this curse is turned into a blessing; they must be servants, but it shall be for the house of my God. The princes would have them slaves unto all the congregation, v. 21. at least, they chose to express themselves so, for the pacifying of the people that were discontented, but Joshua mitigates the sentence, both in honour to God, and in favour to the Gibeonites: it would be too hard upon them to make them every man's drudge; if they must be hewers of wood, and drawers of water, than which there cannot be a greater disparagement, especially to them who are citizens of a royal city, and all mighty men, ch. 10. 2. yet they shall be so to the house of my God, than which there cannot be a greater preferment: David himself could have wished to be a doorkeeper there. Even servile work becomes honourable when it is done for the house of my God, and the offices thereof.

[1.] They were hereby excluded from the liberties and privileges of true-born Israelites, and a remaining mark of distinction put upon their posterity throughout all their generations. [2.] They were hereby employed in such services as required their personal attendance upon the altar of God in the place which he should choose, v. 27. which would bring them to the knowledge of the law of God, keep them tight to that holy religion to which they were proselyted, and prevent their revolt to the idolatries of their fathers. [3.] This would be a great advantage to the priests and Levites, to have so many, and those mighty men, constant attendants upon them, and engaged by office to do all the drudgery of the tabernacle. A great deal of wood must be hewed for fuel for God's house, not only to keep the fire burning continually upon the altar, but to boil the flesh of the peace-offerings, &c. And a great deal of water must be drawn for the divers washings which the law prescribed; these, and other such servile works, such as washing the vessels, carrying out ashes, sweeping the courts, &c. which otherwise the Levites must have done themselves, these Gibeonites were appointed to do. [4.] They were herein servants to the congregation too; for whatever promotes and helps forward the worship of God, is real service to the commonwealth. It is the interest of every Israelite, that the altar of God be well attended. Hereby also the congregation was excused from much of this servile work, which perhaps would otherwise have been expected from some of them. God had made a law that the Israelites should never make any of their brethren bondmen; if they had slaves, they must be of the heathen that were round about them, Lev. 25. 44. Now, in honour of this law, and of Israel that was honoured by it, God would not have the drudgery, no, not of the tabernacle itself, to be done by Israelites, but by Gibeonites, who were afterward called Nethinim, men given to the Levites, as they were to the priests, (Numb. 3. 9.) to minister to them in the service of God. [5.] This may be looked upon as typifying the admission of the Gentiles into the Gospel-Church. Now they were taken in upon their submission to be under-officers, but afterward God promises that he will take of them for priests and Levites, Isa. 66. 21.

2. They submit to this condition, v. 25. Conscious of a fault in framing a lie whereby to deceive the Israelites, and sensible also how narrowly they escaped with their lives, and what a kindness it was to have them spared, they acquiesce in the proposal, Do as it seemeth right unto thee. Better live in servitude, especially such servitude, than not live at all. Those of the very meanest and most despicable condition, are described to be hewers of wood and drawers of water, Deut. 29. 11. But, skin for skin, liberty and labour, and all that a man has, will he give for his life, and no ill bargain. Accordingly the matter was determined, (1.) Joshua delivered them out of the hands of the Israelites, that they should not be slain, v. 26. It seems there were those who would have fallen upon them with the sword, if Joshua had not interposed with his authority; but wise generals know when to lock up the sword, as well as when to draw it. (2.) He then delivered them again into the hands of the Israelites to be enslaved, v. 27. They were not to keep possession of their cities, for we find afterward that three of them fell to the lot of Benjamin, and one to that of Judah; nor were they themselves to be at their own disposal, but, as Bishop Patrick thinks, were dispersed into the cities of the priests and Levites, and came up with them in their courses to serve at the altar, out of the profits of which, it is probable, they were maintained. And thus Israel's bondmen became the Lord's freemen, for his service in the meanest office is liberty, and his work is its own wages. And this they got by their early submission. Let us, in like manner, submit to our Lord Jesus, and refer ourselves to him, saying, "We are in thy hand, do unto us as seemeth good and right unto thee"; only save our souls, and we shall not repent it:" if he appoints us to bear his cross, and draw in his yoke, and serve at his altar, that shall be afterward neither shame nor grief to us, while the meanest office in God's service will entitle us to a dwelling in the house of the Lord all the days of our life.

CHAP. X.

We have in this chapter an account of the conquest of the kings and kingdoms of the southern part of the land of Canaan, as, in the next chapter, of the reduction of the northern parts, which, together, completed the glorious successes of the wars of Canaan. In this chapter we have an account, I. Of the routing of their forces in the field. In which observe, 1. Their confederacy against the Gibeonites, v. 1. .5. 2. The Gibeonites' request to Joshua to assist them, v. 6. 3. Joshua's speedy march under divine encouragement for their relief, v. 7. .9. 4. The defeat of the armies of these confederate kings, v. 10, 11. 5. The miraculous prolonging of the day by the standing still of the sun in favour of the conquerors, v. 12. .14. II. Of the execution of the kings that escaped out of the battle, v. 15. .27. III. Of the taking of the particular cities, and the total destruction of all that were found in them, Makkedah, v. 28. Libnah, v. 29, 30. Lachish, v. 31, 32. and the king of Gezer that attempted its rescue, v. 33. Eglon, v. 34, 35. Hebron, v. 36, 37. Debir, v. 38, 39. And the bringing of all that country into the hands of Israel, v. 40. .42. And, lastly, the return of the army to their head-quarters.

1. NOW it came to pass, when Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem had heard how Joshua had taken Ai, and had utterly destroyed it; as he had done to Jericho and her king, so he had done to Ai and her king; and how the inhabitants of Gibeon had made peace with Israel, and were among them; 2. That they feared greatly, because Gibeon was a great city, as one of the royal cities, and because it was greater than Ai, and all the men thereof were mighty. 3. Wherefore Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem sent unto Hoham king of Hebron, and unto Piram king of Jarmuth, and unto Japhia king of Lachish, and unto Debir king of Eglon, saying, 4. Come up unto me, and help me, that we may smite Gibeon: for it hath made peace with Joshua and with the children of Israel. 5. Therefore the five kings of the Amorites, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, the king of Eglon, gathered themselves together, and went up, they and all their hosts, and encamped before Gibeon, and made war against it. 6. And the men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua to the camp to Gilgal, saying, Slack not thy hand from thy servants; come up to us quickly, and save us, and help us: for all the kings of the Amorites that dwell in the mountains are gathered together against us.

Joshua and the hosts of Israel had now been a good while in the land of Canaan, and no great matters were effected; they were made masters of Jericho by miracle, of Ai by stratagem, and of Gibeon by surrender, and that was all; hitherto the progress of their victories had not seemed proportionable to the magnificence of their entry and the glory of their beginnings. Those among them that were impatient of delays, it is probable, complained of Joshua's slowness, and asked why they did not immediately penetrate into the heart of the country, before the enemy could rally their forces to make head against them; why they stood trifling, while they were so confident both of their title and of their success. Thus Joshua's prudence, perhaps, was censured as slothfulness, cowardice, and want of spirit. But, 1. Canaan was not to be conquered in a day. God had said, that by little and little he would drive out the Canaanites, Exod. 23. 30. He that believeth, will not make haste, or conclude that the promise will never be performed, because it is not performed so soon as we expected. 2. Joshua waited for the Canaanites to be the aggressors; let them first make an onset upon Israel, or the allies of Israel, and then their destruction will be, or at least will appear to be, the more just and the more justifiable. Joshua had warrant sufficient to set upon them, yet he stays till they strike the first stroke, that he might provide for honest things in the sight, not only of God, but of men; and they would be the more inexcusable in their resistance, now that they had seen what favour the Gibeonites found with Israel. 3. It was for the advantage of Israel to sit still a while, that the forces of these little kings might unite in one body, and so might the easier be cut off at one blow. This God had in his eye when he put it into their hearts to combine against Israel; though they designed thereby to strengthen one another, that which he intended, was, to gather them as sheaves into the floor, to fall together under the flail, Mic. 4. 12. Thus oftentimes that seeming paradox proves wholesome counsel, Stay a while, and we shall have done the sooner.

After Israel had waited a while for an occasion to make war upon the Canaanites, a fair one offers itself.

I. Five kings combine against the Gibeonites. Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem was the first mover and ring-leader of this confederacy. He had a good name, it signifies lord of righteousness, a descendant perhaps from Melchizedek, king of righteousness; but notwithstanding the goodness of his name and family, it seems he was a bad man, and an implacable enemy to the posterity of that Abraham, whom his predecessor, Melchizedek, was such a faithful friend to. He called upon his neighbours to join against Israel, either because he was the most honourable prince, and had the precedency among these kings, (perhaps they had some dependence upon him, at least they paid a deference to him, as the most public, powerful, and active man they had among them,) or, because he was first or most apprehensive of the danger his country was in, not only by the conquest of Jericho and Ai, but the surrender of Gibeon, which, it seems, was the chief thing that alarmed him, it being one of the most considerable frontier-towns they had. Against Gibeon therefore all the force he could raise must be levelled, Come, says he, and help me, that we may smite Gibeon. This he resolves to do, either, 1. In policy, that he might retake the city, because it was a strong city, and of great consequence to his country in whose hands it was; or, 2. In passion, that he might chastise the citizens for making peace with Joshua, pretending that they had perfidiously betrayed their country and strengthened the common enemy, whereas they had really done the greatest kindness imaginable to their country, by setting them a good example, if they would have followed it. Thus Satan and his instruments make war upon those that make peace with God: marvel not if the world hate you, and treat those as deserters, who are converts to Christ.

II. The Gibeonites send notice to Joshua of the distress and danger they were in, v. 6. Now they expect benefit from the league they had made with Israel, because though it was obtained by deceit, it was afterward confirmed when the truth came out. They think Joshua obliged to help them, 1. In conscience, because they were his servants; not in compliment, as they had said in their first address, (ch. 9. 8.) We are thy servants, but in reality made servants to the congregation; and it is the duty of masters to take care of the poorest and meanest of their servants, and not to see them wronged when it is in the power of their hand to right them. They that pay allegiance, may reasonably expect protection. Thus David pleads with God, (Ps. 119. 94.) I am thine; save me; and so may we, if indeed we be his. 2. In honour; because the ground of their enemies' quarrel with them, was, the respect they had shown to Israel, and the confidence they had in a covenant with them. Joshua cannot refuse to help them, when it is for their affection to him, and to the name of his God, that they are attacked. David thinks it a good plea with God, (Ps. 69. 7.) For thy sake I have borne reproach. When our spiritual enemies set themselves in array against us, and threaten to swallow us up, let us, by faith and prayer, apply ourselves to Christ, our Joshua, for strength and succour, as St. Paul did, and we shall receive the same answer of peace, My grace is sufficient for thee, 2 Cor. 12. 3, 9.

7. So Joshua ascended from Gilgal, he, and all the people of war with him, and all the mighty men of valour. 8. And the LORD said unto Joshua, Fear them not: for I have delivered them into thine hand: there shall not a man of them stand before thee. 9. Joshua therefore came unto them suddenly, and went up from Gilgal all night. 10. And the LORD discomfited them before Israel, and slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them along the way that goeth up to Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah. 11. And it came to pass, as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, that the LORD cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died: they were more which died with hail-stones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword. 12. Then spake Joshua to the LORD in the day when the LORD delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel, and he said in the sight of Israel, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon. 13. And the sun stood still, and the moon staid, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day. 14. And there was no day like that before it or after it, that the LORD hearkened unto the voice of a man: for the LORD fought for Israel.

Here,

I. Joshua resolves to assist the Gibeonites, and God encourages him in that resolve. 1. He ascended from Gilgal, (v. 7.) that is, he designed, determined, and prepared for, this expedition to relieve Gibeon, for it is probable it was before he stirred a step that God spake to him to encourage him. It was generous and just in Joshua to help his new allies, though perhaps the king of Jerusalem, when he attacked them, little thought that Joshua would have been so ready to help them, but expected he would abandon them as Canaanites, the rather because they had obtained their league with him by fraud; therefore he speaks with assurance (v. 4.) of seeing Gibeon. But Joshua knew that his promise to let them live, obliged him, not only not to slay them himself, but not to stand by and see them slain, when it was in the power of his hand to prevent it, Prov. 24. 11, 12. He knew, that when they embraced the faith and worship of the God of Israel, they came to trust under the shadow of his wings, (Ruth, 2. 12.) and therefore, as his servants, he was bound to protect them. 2. God animated him for his undertaking, v. 8. Fear not, that is, (1.) "Doubt not of the goodness of thy cause, and the clearness of thy call; though it be to assist Gibeonites, thou art in the way of duty, and God is with thee of a truth." (2.) "Dread not the power of the enemy; though so many enemies are confederate against thee, and are resolved to make their utmost efforts for the reduction of Gibeon, and, it may be, will fight desperately in a desperate cause; yet let not that discourage thee, I have delivered them into thine hand;" and those can make neither resistance, nor escape, whom God has marked for destruction.

II. Joshua applies himself to execute this resolve, and God assists him in the execution. Here we have,

1. The great industry of Joshua, and the power of God working with that for the defeat of the enemy. In this action,

(1.) Joshua shewed his good will in the haste he made for the relief of Gibeon, v. 9. He came unto them suddenly; for the extremity was such as would not admit delay. If one of the tribes of Israel had been in danger, he could not have shewed more care or zeal for its relief than here for Gibeon, remembering in this, as in other cases, there must be one law for the stranger that was proselyted, and for him that was born in the land. Scarcely had the confederate princes got their forces together, and sat down before Gibeon, when Joshua was upon them, the surprise of which would put them into the greatest confusion. Now that the enemy were actually drawn up into a body, which had all, as it were, but one neck, dispatch was as serviceable to his cause, as before delay was, while he waited for this general rendezvous; and now, that things were ripe for execution, no man more expeditious than Joshua, who before had seemed slow. Now, it shall never be said, He left that to do to-morrow which he could do to-day. When Joshua found he could not reach Gibeon in a day, lest he should lose any real advantages against the enemy, or so much as seem to come short, or to neglect his new allies, he marched all night, resolving not to give sleep to his eyes, nor slumber to his eye-lids, till he had accomplished this enterprise. It was well the forces he took with him were mighty men of valour, not only able-bodied men, but men of spirit and resolution, and hearty in the cause, else they neither could, nor would, have borne this fatigue, but would have murmured at their leader, and would have asked, "Is this the rest we were promised in Canaan?" But they well considered that the present toil was in order to a happy settlement, and therefore were reconciled to it. Let the good soldiers of Jesus Christ learn from hence to endure hardness, in following the Lamb whithersoever he goes, and not think themselves undone, if their religion lose them now and then a night's sleep; it will be enough to rest, when we come to heaven.

But why needed Joshua to put himself and his men so much to the stretch? Had not God promised him, that, without fail, he would deliver the enemies into his hand? It is true he had; but God's promises are intended, not to slacken and supersede, but to quicken and encourage, our endeavours. He that believeth doth not make haste to anticipate providence, but doth make haste to attend it, with a diligent, not a distrustful, speed.

(2.) God shewed his great power in defeating the enemies which Joshua so vigorously attacked, v. 10, 11. Joshua had a very numerous and powerful army with him, hands enough to dispatch a dispirited enemy, so that the enemy might have been scattered by the ordinary fate of war; but God himself would appear in this great and decisive battle, and draw up the artillery of heaven against the Canaanites, to demonstrate to his people, that they got not this land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them, but God's right hand and his arm, Ps. 44. 3. The Lord discomfited them before Israel; Israel did what they could, and yet God did all. [1.] It must needs be a very great terror and confusion to the enemy, to perceive that heaven itself fought against them; for who can contest with, flee from, or fence against, the powers of heaven? They had affronted the true God, and robbed him of his honour, by worshipping the host of heaven, giving that worship to the creature which is due to the Creator only; and now the host of heaven fights against them, and even that part of the creation which they had idolized is at war with them, and even triumphs in their ruin, Jer. 8. 2. There is no way of making any creature propitious to us, no, not by sacrifice or offering, but only by making our peace with God, and keeping ourselves in his love. This had been enough to make them an easy prey to the victorious Israelites, yet this was not all. [2.] Beside the terror struck upon them, there was a great slaughter made of them by hailstones, which were so large, and came down with such a force, that more were killed by the hailstones, than by the sword of the Israelites, though, no doubt, they were busy. God himself speaks to Job of treasures, or magazines, of snow and hail, which he has reserved for the day of battle and war, Job, 38. 22, 23. and here they are made use of to destroy the Canaanites. Here was hail shot from God's great ordnance, that, against whomsoever it was directed, was sure to hit, (and never glanced upon the Israelites mixed with them,) and, whenever it hit, was sure to kill. See here how miserable they are that have God for their enemy, and how sure to perish; it is a fearful thing to fall into his hands, for there is no fleeing out of them. Some observe, that Beth-horon lay north of Gibeon, Azekah and Makkedah lay south, so that they fled each way; but, which way soever they fled, the hailstones pursued them, and met them at every turn.

2. The great faith of Joshua, and the power of God crowning that with the miraculous arrest of the sun, that the day of Israel's victories might be prolonged, and so the enemy totally defeated. The hailstones had their rise no higher than the clouds, but, to shew that Israel's help came from above the clouds, the sun itself, who by his constant motion serves the whole earth, by halting when there was occasion, served the Israelites, and did them a kindness; the sun and moon stood still in their habitation, at the light of thine arrows which gave the signal, Hab. 3. 11.

(1.) Here is the prayer of Joshua that the sun might stand still. I call it his prayer, because it is said, v. 12. he spake to the Lord; as Elijah, though we read, 1 Kings, 17. 1. only by his prophesying of the drought, yet is said, James, 5. 17. to pray for it. Observe, [1.] An instance of Joshua's unwearied activity in the service of God and Israel, that though he had marched all night, and fought all day, and, one might expect, would be inclined to repose himself, and get a little sleep, and give his army some time to rest, that, like the hireling, he would earnestly have desired the shadow, and bid the night welcome, when he had done such a good day's work, yet, instead of that, he wishes for nothing so much as the prolonging of the day. Note, Those that wait on the Lord, and work for him, shall renew their strength, shall run and not be weary, shall walk and not faint, Isa. 40. 31. [2.] An instance of his great faith in the almighty power of God, as above the power of nature, and able to controul and alter the usual course of it. No doubt, Joshua had an extraordinary impulse or impression upon his spirit, which he knew to be of divine original, prompting him to desire that this miracle might be wrought upon this occasion, else it had been presumption in him to desire or expect it, the prayer had not been granted by the divine power, if it had not been dictated by the divine grace; God wrought this faith in him, and then said, "According to thy faith, and thy prayer of faith, be it unto thee." It cannot be imagined, however, that such a thing as this should have entered into his mind, if God had not put it there; a man would have had a thousand projects in his head for the completing of the victory, before he would have thought of desiring the sun to stand still; but, even in the Old-Testament saints, the Spirit made intercession according to the will of God; what God will give, he inclines the hearts of his praying people to ask; and, for what he will do, he will be inquired of, Ezek. 36. 37.

Now, First, It looked great for Joshua to say, Sun, stand thou still. His ancestor Joseph had indeed dreamed that the sun and moon did obeisance to him; but who would have thought, that, after it had been fulfilled in the figure, it should be again fulfilled in the letter to one of his posterity? The prayer is thus expressed with authority, because it was not an ordinary prayer, such as is directed and supported only by God's common providence or promise, but the prayer of a prophet at this time divinely inspired for this purpose; and yet it intimates to us the prevalency of prayer in general, so far as it is regulated by the word of God, and may remind us of that honour put upon prayer, Isa. 45. 11. Concerning the work of my hands, command ye me. He bids the sun stand still upon Gibeon, the place of action, and the seat of the war, intimating, that what he designed in this request, was, the advantage of Israel against their enemies; it is probable that the sun was now declining, and that he did not call for the lengthening out of the day, until he observed it hastening toward its period. He does likewise, in the name of the King of kings, arrest the moon, perhaps because it was requisite, for the preserving of the harmony and good order of the spheres, that the course of the rest of the heavenly bodies should be stayed likewise, otherwise, while the sun shone, he needed not the moon; and here he mentions the valley of Ajalon, which was near to Gibeon, because there he was at that time.

Secondly, It was bold, indeed, to say so before Israel, and argues a very strong assurance of faith. If the event had not answered the demand, nothing could have been a greater slur upon him; the Israelites would have concluded he was certainly going mad, or he had never talked so extravagantly. But he knew very well God would own and answer a petition which he himself directed to be drawn up and presented, and therefore was not afraid to say before all Israel, calling them to observe this work of wonder, Sun, stand thou still, for he was confident in Him whom he had trusted. He believed the almighty power of God; else he could not have expected that the sun, going on in its strength, driving in a full career, and rejoicing as a strong man to run a race, should be stopped in an instant. He believed the sovereignty of God in the kingdom of nature; else he could not have expected that the established law, and course of nature, should be changed and interrupted, the ordinances of heaven, and the constant usage according to these ordinances, broken in upon. And he believed God's particular favour to Israel above all people under the sun; else he could not have expected, that, to favour them upon an emergency with a double day, he should (which must follow of course) amuse and terrify so great a part of the terrestrial globe with a double night at the same time; it is true, he causeth the sun to shine upon the just and the unjust, but this once the unjust shall wait for it beyond the usual time, while, in favour to righteous Israel, it stands still.

(2.) The wonderful answer to this prayer. No sooner said than done, v. 13. The sun stood still, and the moon stayed. Notwithstanding the vast distance between the earth and the sun, at the word of Joshua, the sun stopped immediately; for the same God that rules in heaven above, rules at the same time on this earth, and, when he pleases, even the heavens shall hear the earth, as here. Concerning this great miracle, it is here said, [1.] That it continued a whole day, that is, the sun continued as long again above the horizon, as otherwise it would have done. It is commonly supposed to have been about the middle of summer that this happened, when, in that country, it was about fourteen hours between sun and sun, so that this day was about twenty-eight hours long; yet, if we suppose it to have been at that time of the year when the days are at the shortest, it will be the more probable that Joshua should desire and pray for the prolonging of the day. [2.] That hereby the people had full time to avenge themselves of their enemies, and to give them a total defeat. We often read in history of battles which the night put an end to, the shadows of which favoured the retreat of the conquered; to prevent this advantage to the enemy in their flight, the day was doubled, that the hand of Israel might find out all their enemies; but the eye and hand of God can find them out without the help of the sun's light, for to him the night shineth as the day, Ps. 139. 12. Note, Sometimes God completes a great salvation in a little time, and makes but one day's work of it. Perhaps this miracle is alluded to, Zech. 14. 6, 7. where the day of God's fighting against the nations is said to be one day, and that at evening time it shall be light, as here. And, [3.] That there was never any day like it, before or since, in which God put such an honour upon faith and prayer, and Israel's cause; never did he so wonderfully comply with the request of a man, nor so wonderfully fight for his people. [4.] This is said to be written in the book of Jasher, a collection of state poems, in which the poem made upon this occasion was preserved among the rest; probably, the same with that book of the wars of the Lord, Numb. 21. 14. which afterward was continued and carried on by one Jasher. Those words, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon, sounding metrical, are supposed to be taken from the narrative of this event, as it was found in the book of Jasher. Not that the divine testimony of the book of Joshua needed confirmation from the book of Jasher, a human composition; but, to those who had that book in their hands, it would be of use to compare this history with it; which warrants the appeals the learned make to profane history for corroborating the proofs of the truth of sacred history.

But surely this stupendous miracle, of the standing still of the sun, was intended for something more than merely to give Israel so much the more time to find out and kill their enemies, which, without this, might have been done the next day. First, God would hereby magnify Joshua, ch. 3. 7. as a particular favourite, and one whom he did delight to honour; being a type of Him who has all power both in heaven and in earth, and whom the winds and the seas obey. Secondly, He would hereby notify to all the world what he was doing for his people Israel here in Canaan; the sun, the eye of the world, must be fixed for some hours upon Gibeon, and the valley of Ajalon, as if to contemplate the great works of God there for Israel, and so to engage the children of men to look that way, and to inquire of this wonder done in the land, (2 Chron. 32. 31.) Proclamation was hereby made to all the neighbouring nations, Come, behold the works of the Lord, Ps. 46. 8. and say, What nation is there so great as Israel is, who has God so nigh unto them? One would have supposed this would have brought such real ambassadors as the Gibeonites pretended to be, from a very far country, to court the friendship of Israel, because of the name of the Lord their God. Thirdly, He would hereby convince and confound those idolaters that worshipped the sun and moon, and gave divine honours to them, by demonstrating that they were subject to the command of the God of Israel, and that, as high as they were, he was above them; and thus he would fortify his people against temptations to this idolatry, which he foresaw they would be addicted to, (Deut. 4. 19.) and which, notwithstanding this, they afterward corrupted themselves with. Fourthly, This miracle signified (it is the learned Bishop Pierson's notion) that in the latter days, when the light of the world was tending towards a night of darkness, the Sun of righteousness, even our Joshua, should arise, (Mal. 4. 2.) give check to the approaching night, and be the true Light. To which, let me add, that, when Christ conquered our spiritual enemies upon the cross, the miracle wrought upon the sun was the reverse of this, it was then darkened, as if it were gone down at noon, for Christ needed not the light of the sun to carry on his victories, he then made darkness his pavilion. And, lastly, the arresting of the sun and moon in this day of battle, figured the turning of the sun into darkness, and the moon into blood, in the last great and terrible day of the Lord.

15. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp to Gilgal. 16. But these five kings fled, and hid themselves in a cave at Makkedah. 17. And it was told Joshua, saying, The five kings are found hid in a cave at Makkedah. 18. And Joshua said, Roll great stones upon the mouth of the cave, and set men by it for to keep them: 19. And stay ye not, but pursue after your enemies, and smite the hindmost of them; suffer them not to enter into their cities: for the LORD your God hath delivered them into your hand. 20. And it came to pass, when Joshua and the children of Israel had made an end of slaying them with a very great slaughter, till they were consumed, that the rest which remained of them entered into fenced cities. 21. And all the people returned to the camp to Joshua at Makkedah in peace: none moved his tongue against any of the children of Israel. 22. Then said Joshua, Open the mouth of the cave, and bring out those five kings unto me out of the cave. 23. And they did so, and brought forth those five kings unto him out of the cave, the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, and the king of Eglon. 24. And it came to pass, when they brought out those kings unto Joshua, that Joshua called for all the men of Israel, and said unto the captains of the men of war which went with him, Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings. And they came near, and put their feet upon the necks of them. 25. And Joshua said unto them, Fear not, nor be dismayed, be strong and of good courage: for thus shall the LORD do to all your enemies against whom ye fight. 26. And afterward Joshua smote them, and slew them, and hanged them on five trees: and they were hanging upon the trees until the evening. 27. And it came to pass at the time of the going down of the sun, that Joshua commanded, and they took them down off the trees, and cast them into the cave wherein they had been hid, and laid great stones in the cave's mouth, which remain until this very day.

It was a brave appearance, no doubt, which the five kings made when they took the field, for the reducing of Gibeon, and a brave army they had following them; but they were all routed, put into disorder first, and then brought to destruction, by the hailstones. And now Joshua thought, his work being done, he might go with his army into quarters of refreshment: accordingly it was resolved, perhaps in a council of war, that they should presently return to the camp at Gilgal, v. 15. till they should receive orders from God to take possession of the country they had now conquered; but he soon finds he has more work cut out for him, the victory must be pursued, that the spoils might be divided. Accordingly, he applies himself to it with renewed vigour.

I. The force that had dispersed themselves must be followed, and smitten. When tidings were brought to Joshua where the kings were, he ordered a guard to be set upon them for the present, v. 18. reserving them for another day of destruction, and to be brought forth to a day of wrath, Job, 21. 30. He directs his men to pursue the common soldiers, as much as might be, to prevent their escaping to the garrisons, which would strengthen them, and make the reduction of them the more difficult, v. 19. Like a prudent general, he does that first which is most needful, and defers his triumphs till he has completed his conquests; nor was he in such haste to insult over the captive kings, but that he would first prevent the rallying again of their scattered forces. The success of this vigorous pursuit, was, 1. That a very great slaughter was made of the enemies of God and Israel. And, 2. The field was cleared of them, so that none remained but such as got into fenced cities, where they would not long be safe themselves, nor were they capable of doing any service to the cities that sheltered them, unless they could have left their fears behind them. 3. None moved his tongue against any of the children of Israel, v. 21. This expression intimates, (1.) Their perfect safety and tranquillity: some think it should be read, from Exod. 11. 7. Against any of the children of Israel did not a dog move his tongue; no, not against any one man of them. They were not threatened by any danger at all after their victory, no, not so much as the barking of a dog. Not one single Israelite (for the original makes it so particular) was brought into any distress, either in the battle or in the pursuit. (2.) Their honour and reputation; no man had any reproach to cast upon them, or an ill word to give them. God not only tied the hands, but stopped the mouths, of their enraged enemies, and put lying lips to silence. (3.) The Chaldee paraphrase makes it an expression of their unalloyed joy for this victory, reading it, There was no hurt or loss to the children of Israel, for which any man should afflict his soul. When the army came to be reviewed after the battle, there was none slain, none wounded, none missing, not one Israelite had occasion to lament either the loss of a friend or the loss of a limb. So cheap, so easy, so glorious, was this victory.

II. The kings that had hidden themselves must now be called to an account, as rebels against the Israel of God, to whom, by the divine promise and grant, this land did of right belong, and should have been surrendered upon demand.

See here, 1. How they were secured. The cave which they fled to, and trusted in for a refuge, became their prison, in which they were clapped up, till Joshua sat in judgment on them, v. 18. It seems they all escaped both the hailstones and the sword, God so ordering it, not in kindness to them, but that they might be reserved for a more solemn and terrible execution; as, for this cause, Pharaoh survived the plagues of Egypt, and was made to stand, that God might in him shew his power, Exod. 9. 16. They all fled, and met at the same place, Providence directing them; and now they, who were lately consulting against Israel, were put upon new counsels to preserve themselves, and agreed to take shelter in the same cave. The information brought to Joshua of this is an evidence that there were those of the country, who knew the holes and fastnesses of it, that were in his interests. And the care Joshua took to keep them there when they were there, as it is an instance of his policy and presence of mind, even in the heat of action; so, in the success of their project, it shews how they not only deceive themselves, but destroy themselves, who think to hide themselves from God. Their refuge of lies will but bind them over to God's judgment.

2. How they were triumphed over. Joshua ordered them to be brought forth out of the cave, set before him at the bar, and their names called over, v. 22, 23. And when they either were bound, and cast upon the ground, unable to help themselves, or threw themselves upon the ground, humbly to beg for their lives, he called for the general officers and great men, and commanded them to trample upon these kings, and set their feet upon their necks; not in sport, and to make themselves and the company merry, but with the gravity and decorum that became the ministers of the divine justice, who were not herein to gratify any pride or passion of their own, but to give glory to the God of Israel, as higher than the highest, who treads upon princes as mortar, (Isa. 41. 25.) and is terrible to the kings of the earth, Ps. 76. 12. The thing does, indeed, look barbarous, thus to insult over men in misery, that were suddenly fallen from the highest pitch of honour into this disgrace; it was hard for crowned heads to be thus trodden upon, not by Joshua himself, (that might better have been borne,) at least not by him only, but by all the captains of the army; certainly it ought not to be drawn into a precedent.

for the case was extraordinary, and we have reason to think it was by divine direction and impulse that Joshua did this. (1.) God would hereby punish the abominable wickedness of these kings, the measure of whose iniquity was now full. And, by this public act of justice done upon these ringleaders of the Canaanites in sin, he would possess his people with the greater dread and detestation of those sins of the nations that God cast out from before them, which they would be tempted to imitate. (2.) He would hereby have the promise by Moses made good, (Deut. 33. 29.) Thou shalt tread upon their high places, that is, their great men, which should the rather be speedily fulfilled in the letter, because they are the very last words of Moses that we find upon record. (3.) He would hereby encourage the faith and hope of his people Israel, in reference to the wars that were yet before them. Therefore Joshua said, v. 25. Fear not, nor be dismayed. [1.] "Fear not these kings, or any of their's, as if there were any danger of having this affront now put upon them in after-time revenged upon yourselves; a consideration which keeps many from being insolent toward those they have at their mercy, because they know not how soon the uncertain fate of war may turn the same wheel upon themselves; but you need not fear that any should rise up ever to revenge this quarrel." [2.] "Fear not any other kings who may at any time be in confederacy against you, for you see these brought down, whom you thought formidable. Thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies; now that they begin to fall, to fall so low, that you may set your feet on their necks, you may be confident they shall not prevail, but shall surely fall before you," Esth. 6. 13. (4.) He would hereby give a type and figure of Christ's victories over the powers of darkness, and believers' victories through him. All the enemies of the Redeemer shall be made his footstool, Ps. 110. 1. (And see Ps. 18. 40.) The kings of the earth set themselves against him, Ps. 2. 2. but, sooner or later, we shall see all things put under him, Heb. 2. 8. and principalities and powers made a show of, Col. 2. 15. And in these triumphs we are more than conquerors, may tread upon the lion and adder, Ps. 91. 13. may ride on the high places of the earth, Isa. 58. 14. and may be confident that the God of peace shall tread Satan under our feet, shall do it shortly, and do it effectually, Rom. 16. 20. See Ps. 149. 8, 9.

3. How they were put to death. Perhaps, when they had undergone that terrible mortification of being trodden upon by the captains of Israel, they were ready to say, as Agag, Surely the bitterness of death is past, and that sufficient unto them was this punishment, which was inflicted by many; but their honours cannot excuse their lives, their forfeited devoted lives. Joshua smote them with the sword, and then hanged up their bodies till evening, when they were taken down, and thrown into the cave in which they had hidden themselves, v. 26, 27. That which they thought would have been their shelter, was made their prison first, and then their grave; so shall we be disappointed in that which we flee to from God, yet to good people the grave is still a hiding-place, Job, 14. 13. If these five kings had humbled themselves in time, and had begged peace, instead of waging war, they might have saved their lives; but now the decree was gone forth, and they found no place for repentance, or the reversal of the judgment, it was too late to expect it, though, perhaps, they sought it carefully with tears.

28. And that day Joshua took Makkedah, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof he utterly destroyed, them, and all the souls that were therein; he let none remain: and he did to the king of Makkedah as he did unto the king of Jericho. 29. Then Joshua passed from Makkedah, and all Israel with him, unto Libnah, and fought against Libnah: 30. And the Lord delivered it also, and the king thereof, into the hand of Israel; and he smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein; he let none remain in it; but did unto the king thereof as he did unto the king of Jericho. 31. And Joshua passed from Libnah, and all Israel with him, unto Lachish, and encamped against it, and fought against it: 32. And the Lord delivered Lachish into the hand of Israel, which took it on the second day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein, according to all that he had done to Libnah. 33. Then Horem king of Gezer came up to help Lachish; and Joshua smote him and his people, until he had left him none remaining. 34. And from Lachish Joshua passed unto Eglon, and all Israel with him; and they encamped against it, and fought against it: 35. And they took it on that day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein he utterly destroyed that day, according to all that he had done to Lachish. 36. And Joshua went up from Eglon, and all Israel with him, unto Hebron; and they fought against it: 37. And they took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof, and all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining, according to all that he had done to Eglon; but destroyed it utterly, and all the souls that were therein. 38. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Debir; and fought against it: 39. And he took it, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof; and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and utterly destroyed all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining: as he had done to Hebron, so he did to Debir, and to the king thereof; as he had done also to Libnah, and to her king. 40. So Joshua smote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings: he left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed, as the Lord God of Israel commanded. 41. And Joshua smote them from Kadesh-barnea even unto Gaza, and all the country of Goshen, even unto Gibeon. 42. And all these kings and their land did Joshua take at one time, because the Lord God of Israel fought for Israel. 43. And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp to Gilgal.

We have here Joshua's improvement of the late glorious victory he had obtained, and the advantages he had gained by it, and to do this well is a general's praise.

1. Here is a particular account of the several cities which he immediately made himself master of. 1. The cities of three of the kings whom he had conquered in the field, he went and took possession of, Lachish, v. 31, 32. Eglon, v. 34, 35. and Hebron, v. 36, 37. The other two, Jerusalem and Jarmuth, were not taken at this time; perhaps his forces were either so much fatigued with what they had done, or so well content with what they had got, that they had no mind to attack those places, and so they slipped the fairest opportunity they could ever expect of reducing them with ease, which afterward was not done without difficulty, Judg. 1. 1. 2 Sam. 5. 6. 2. Three other cities, and royal cities too, he took; Makkedah, into the neighbourhood of which the five kings were fled, which brought Joshua and his forces thither in pursuit of them, and so hastened its ruin, v. 28. Libnah, v. 29, 30. and Debir, v. 33, 39. 3. One king that brought in his forces for the relief of Lachish, that had lost its king, proved to meddle to his own hurt; it was Horam, king of Gezer, who, either in friendship to his neighbours, or for his own security, offered to stop the progress of Joshua's arms, and was cut off with all his forces, v. 33. Thus wicked men are often snared in their counsels, and, by opposing God in the way of his judgments, bring them the sooner on their own heads.

II. A general account of the country which was hereby reduced and brought into Israel's hands, v. 40. .42. The part of the land of Canaan which they first got possession of lay south of Jerusalem, and afterward fell, for the most part, to the lot of the tribe of Judah.

Observe, in this narrative, 1. The great speed Joshua made in taking these cities, which, some think, is intimated in the manner of relating it, which is quick and concise. He flew like lightning from place to place; and, though they all stood it out to the last extremity, and none of these cities opened their gates to him, yet, in a little time, he got them all into his hands, summoned them, and seized them, the same day, v. 28. or in two days, v. 32. Now that they were struck with fear by the defeat of their armies, and the death of their kings, Joshua prudently followed his blow. See what a great deal of work may be done in a little time, if we will but be busy, and improve our opportunities. 2. The great severity Joshua used toward those he conquered. He gave no quarter to man, woman, or child, put to the sword all the souls, v. 28, 30, 32, 35, &c. utterly destroyed all that breathed, v. 40. and left none remaining. Nothing could justify this military execution, but that herein they did as the Lord God of Israel commanded, v. 40. which was sufficient, not only to bear them out, and save them from the imputation of cruelty, but to sanctify what they did, and make it an acceptable piece of service to his justice. God would hereby, (1.) Manifest his hatred of the idolatries, and other abominations, which the Canaanites had been guilty of, and leave us to judge how great the provocation was which they had given him, by the greatness of the destruction which was brought upon them, when the measure of their iniquity was full. (2.) He would hereby magnify his love to his people Israel, in giving so many men for them, and people for their life, Isa. 43. 4. when the heathen are to be cast out, to make room for this vine, Ps. 80. 8. Divine Justice appears more prodigal than ever of human blood, that the Israelites might find themselves for ever obliged to spend their lives to the glory of that God who had sacrificed so many of the lives of his creatures to their interest. (3.) Hereby was typified the final and eternal destruction of all the impenitent implacable enemies of the Lord Jesus, who, having slighted the riches of his grace, must for ever feel the weight of his wrath, and shall have judgment without mercy. Nations that forget God shall be turned into hell, and no reproach at all to God's infinite goodness. 3. The great success of this expedition. The spoil of these cities was now divided among the men of war that plundered them; and the cities themselves, with the land about them, were shortly to be divided among the tribes, for the Lord fought for Israel, v. 42. They could not have gotten the victory, if God had not undertaken the battle; then we conquer when God fights for us; and if he be for us, who can be against us?

CHAP. XI.

This chapter continues and concludes the history of the conquest of Canaan; of the reduction of the southern parts, we had an account in the foregoing chapter; after which, we may suppose, Joshua allowed his forces some breathing time; now, here, we have the story of the war in the north, and the happy success of that war. 1. The confederacy of the northern crowns against Israel, v. 1. .5.

1. AND it came to pass, when Jabin king of Hazor had heard those things, that he sent to Jobab king of Madon, and to the king of Shimron, and to the king of Achshaph, 2. And to the kings that were on the north of the mountains, and of the plains south of Chinneroth, and in the valley, and in the borders of Dor on the west, 3. And to the Canaanite on the east and on the west, and to the Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountains, and to the Hivite under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh. 4. And they went out, they and all their hosts with them, much people, even as the sand that is upon the sea-shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many. 5. And when all these kings were met together, they came and pitched together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel. 6. And the Lord said unto Joshua, Be not afraid because of them: for to-morrow about this time will I deliver them up all skain before Israel: thou shalt hough their horses, and burn their chariots with fire. 7. So Joshua came, and all the people of war with him, against them by the waters of Merom suddenly; and they fell upon them. 8. And the Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel, who smote them, and chased them unto great Zidon, and unto Misrephoth-main, and unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward; and they smote them, until they left them none remaining. 9. And Joshua did unto them as the Lord bade him: he houghed their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire.

We are here entering upon the story of another campaign that Joshua made, and it was a glorious one, no less illustrious than the former in the success of it, though, in respect of miracles, it was inferior to it in glory. The wonders God then wrought for them, were to initiate and encourage them to act vigorously themselves. Thus the war carried on, by the preaching of the gospel, against Satan's kingdom, was at first forwarded by miracles; but, the war being by them sufficiently proved to be of God, the managers of it are now left to the ordinary assistance of divine grace in the use of the sword of the Spirit, and must not expect hailstones, or the standing still of the sun.

In this story, we have,

I. The Canaanites taking the field against Israel. They were the aggressors, God hardening their hearts to begin the war, that Israel might be justified, beyond exception, in destroying them. Joshua and all Israel were returned to the camp at Gilgal, and perhaps these kings knew no other than that they intended to sit down content with the conquest they had already made, and yet they prepare war against them. Note, Sinners bring ruin upon their own heads, so that God will be justified when he speaks, and they alone shall bear the blame for ever. Judah was now couched us a lion gone up from the prey; if the northern kings rouse him up, it is at their peril, Gen. 49. 9. Now,

1. Several nations joined in this confederacy, some in the mountains, and some in the plains, v. 2. Canaanites from east and west, Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, &c. v. 3. of different constitutions, and divided interests among themselves, and yet they here unite against Israel, as against a common enemy. Thus are the children of this world more unanimous, and therein wiser, than the children of light. The oneness of the church's enemies should shame the church's friends out of their discords and divisions, and engage them to be one. 2. The head of this confederacy was Jabin, king of Hazor, v. 1. as Adoni-zedek was of the former; it is said, v. 10. Hazor had been the head of all those kingdoms, which could not have revolted, without occasioning ill will; but that was forgotten and laid aside upon this occasion, by consent of parties, Luke, 23, 12. When they had all drawn up their forces together, every kingdom bringing in its quota, they were a very great army, much greater than the former, as the sand on the sea-shore in multitude, and, upon this account, much stronger and more formidable; that they had horses and chariots very many, which we do not find the southern kings had; thereby they had a great advantage against Israel, for their army consisted only of foot, and they never brought horses or chariots into the field. Josephus tells us, that the army of the Canaanites consisted of three hundred thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and twenty thousand chariots. Many there be that rise up against God's Israel; doubtless their numbers made them very confident of success, but it proved that so much the greater slaughter was made of them.

II. The encouragement God gave to Joshua to give them the meeting, even upon the ground of their own choosing, v. 6. Be not afraid because of them. Joshua was remarkable for his courage, it was his master-grace, and yet, it seems, he had need to be again and again cautioned not to be afraid. Fresh dangers and difficulties make it necessary to fetch in fresh supports and comforts from the word of God, which we have always nigh unto us, to be made use of in every time of need. Those that have God on their side, need not be disturbed at the number and power of their enemies; more are they that are with us than they that are against us; they have the hosts of the Lord that have the Lord of hosts engaged for them. For his encouragement, 1. God assures him of success, and fixes the hour; To-morrow about this time, when an engagement (it is probable) was expected and designed on both sides, I will deliver them up slain. Though they were to be slain by the sword of Israel, yet it is spoken of as God's work, that he would deliver them up. 2. He appoints him to hough their horses, hamstring them, lame them, and burn their chariots, not only that Israel might not use them hereafter, but that they might not fear them now, their God designing this contempt to be put upon them. Let Israel look upon their chariots but as rotten wood designed for the fire, and their horses of war as disabled things, scarcely good enough for the cart.

This encouragement which God here gave to Joshua, no doubt, he communicated to the people, who perhaps were under some apprehensions of danger from this vast army, notwithstanding the experiences they had had of God's power engaged for them. And the wisdom and goodness of God is to be observed, (1.) In infatuating the counsels of the enemy, that all the kings of Canaan, who were not dispersed at such a distance from each other but that they might have got altogether in a body, did not at first confederate against Israel, but were divided into the southern and northern combination, and so became the less formidable. And, (2.) In preparing his people to encounter the greater force, by breaking the less. They first engage with five kings together, and now with many more. God proportions our trials to our strength, and our strength to our trials.

III. Joshua's march against these confederate forces, v. 7. He came upon them suddenly, and surprised them in their quarters. He made this haste, 1. That he might put them into the greater confusion, by giving them an alarm, when they little thought he had been near them. 2. That he might be sure not to come short of the honour, God had fixed to give him the meeting at the enemy's camp to-morrow about this time. It is fit we should keep time with God.

IV. His success, v. 8. He obtained the honour and advantage of a complete victory; he smote them, and chased them in the several ways they took in their flight; some fled toward Zidon, which lay to the north-west, others toward Mizpeh, eastward; both the parties Joshua sent out pursued them each way. So the Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel; they would not deliver themselves into the hands of Israel, to be made proselytes and tributaries, and so offered up to God's grace, Rom. 15. 16. and therefore God delivered them into their hands, to be made sacrifices to his justice; for God will be honoured by us or upon us.

V. His obedience to the orders given him, in destroying the horses and chariots, v. 9. which was an instance, 1. Of his subjection to the divine will, as one under authority, that must do as he is bidden. 2. Of his self-denial, and crossing his own genius and inclination, in compliance with God's command. 3. Of his confidence in the power of God engaged for Israel, which enabled them to despise the chariots and horses, which others trusted in, Ps. 20. 7.—33. 17. 4. Of his care to keep up in the people the like confidence in God, by taking that from them which they would be tempted to trust too much to. This was cutting off a right hand.

10. And Joshua at that time turned back, and took Hazor, and smote the king thereof with the sword: for Hazor beforetime was the head of all those kingdoms. 11. And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them: there was not any left to breathe: and he burnt Hazor with fire. 12. And all the cities of those kings, and all the kings of them, did Joshua take, and smote them with the edge of the sword, and he utterly destroyed them, as Moses the servant of the LORD commanded. 13. But as for the cities that stood still in their strength, Israel burned none of them, save Hazor only; that did Joshua burn. 14. And all the spoil of these cities, and the cattle, the children of Israel took for a prey unto themselves; but every man they smote with the edge of the sword, until they had destroyed them, neither left they any to breathe.

We have here the same improvement made of this victory that was of that in the foregoing chapter.

1. The destruction of Hazor is particularly recorded, because in it, and by the king thereof, this daring design against Israel was laid, v. 10, 11. The king of Hazor, it seems, escaped with his life out of the battle, and thought himself safe when he was got back into his own city, and Joshua was gone in pursuit of the scattered troops another way; but it proved that that which he thought would have been for his welfare was his trap; in it he was taken as in an evil net; there he was slain, and his city, for his sake, burnt. Yet we find, that, the remains of it, being not well looked after by Israel, the Canaanites rebuilt it, and settled there under another king of the same name, Judg. 4. 2.

2. The rest of the cities of that part of the country are spoken of only in general; that Joshua got them all into his hands, but did not burn them as he did Hazor, for Israel was to dwell in great and goodly cities which they builded not, Deut. 6. 13. and in these among the rest. And here we find Israel rolling in blood and treasure. (1.) In the blood of their enemies; they smote all the souls, v. 11. neither left they any to breathe, v. 14. that there might be none to infect them with the abominations of Canaan, and none to disturb them in the possession of it. The children were cut off, lest they should afterward lay claim to any part of this land in the right of their parents. (2.) In the wealth of their enemies: the spoil, and the cattle, they took for a prey to themselves, v. 14. As they were enriched with the spoil of their oppressors when they came out of Egypt, wherewith to defray the charges of their apprenticeship in the wilderness; so they were now enriched with the spoil of their enemies, for a stock wherewith to set up in the land of Canaan. Thus is the wealth of the sinner laid up for the just.

15. As the LORD commanded Moses his servant, so did Moses command Joshua, and so did Joshua; he left nothing undone of all that the LORD commanded Moses. 16. So Joshua took all that land, the hills, and all the south country, and all the land of Goshen, and the valley, and the plain, and the mountain of Israel, and the valley of the same; 17. Even from the mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir, even unto Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon under mount Hermon: and all their kings he took, and smote them, and slew them. 18. Joshua made war a long time with all those kings. 19. There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites the inhabitants of Gibeon: all other they took in battle. 20. For it was of the LORD to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, but that he might destroy them, as the LORD commanded Moses. 21. And at that time came Joshua, and cut off the Anakims from the mountains, from Hebron, from Debir, from Anab, and from all the mountains of Judah, and from all the mountains of Israel: Joshua destroyed them utterly with their cities. 22. There was none of the Anakims left in the land of the children of Israel: only in Gaza, in Gath, and in Ashdod, there remained. 23. So Joshua took the whole land, according to all that the LORD said unto Moses; and Joshua gave it for an inheritance unto Israel according to their divisions by their tribes. And the land rested from war.

We have here the conclusion of this whole matter.

I. A short account is here given of what was done in four things,

1. The obstinacy of the Canaanites in their opposition to the Israelites. It was strange, that, though it appeared so manifestly that God fought for Israel, and in every engagement the Canaanites had the worst of it, yet they stood it out to the last; not one city made peace with Israel, but the Gibeonites only, who understood the things that belonged to their peace better than their neighbours, v. 19. It is intimated that other cities might have made as good terms for themselves, without ragged clothes and clouted shoes, if they would have humbled themselves, but they never so much as desired conditions of peace. We are told whence this unaccountable infatuation came, It was of the Lord to harden their hearts, v. 20. As Pharaoh's heart was hardened by his own pride and wilfulness first, and afterward by the righteous judgment of God, to his destruction, so were the hearts of these Canaanites. To punish them for all their other follies, God left them to this, to make those their enemies whom they might have made their friends. This was it that ruined them, they came against Israel in battle, and gave the first blow, and therefore might have no favour shewed them. Those know not what they do, who give the provocation to divine justice, or the authorised instruments of it. Are we stronger than God? Observe here, that hardness of heart is the ruin of sinners. Those that are stupid and secure, and heedless of divine warnings, are already marked for destruction. What hope is there of those concerning whom God has said, Go, make their hearts fat?

2. The constancy of the Israelites in prosecuting this war, v. 18. Joshua made war a long time; some reckon it five years, others seven, that were spent in subduing this land. So long God would train up Israel to war, and give them repeated instances of his power and goodness in every new victory that he gave them.

3. The conquest of the Anakims at last, v. 21, 22. Either this was done, as they met with them where they were dispersed, as some think, or rather, it should seem the Anakims were retired to their fastnesses, and so were hunted out, and cut off at last, after all the rest of their enemies. The mountains of Judah and Israel were the habitations of those mountains of men; but neither their height, nor the strength of their caves, nor the difficulty of the passes to them, could secure, no, not these mighty men, from the sword of Joshua. The cutting off of the sons of Anak is particularly mentioned, because these had been such a terror to the spies forty years before, and their bulk and strength had been thought an insuperable difficulty in the way of the reducing of Canaan, Numb. 13. 28, 33. Even that opposition, which seemed invincible, was got over. Never let the sons of Anak be a terror to the Israel of God, for even their day will come to fall. Giants are dwarfs to Omnipotence; yet this struggle with the Anakims was reserved for the latter end of the war, when the Israelites were become more expert in the arts of war, and had had more experience of the power and goodness of God. Note, God sometimes reserves the sharpest trials of his people, by affliction and temptation, for the latter end of their days. Therefore let not him that girds on the harness, boast as he that puts it off. Death, that tremendous son of Anak, is the last enemy that is to be encountered, but it is to be destroyed, 1 Cor. 15. 26. Thanks be to God, who will give us the victory.

4. The end and issue of this long war. The Canaanites were rooted out, not perfectly, (as we shall find after in the book of Judges,) but in a good measure; they were not able to make any head, either, (1.) So as to keep the Israelites out of possession of the land, Joshua took all that land, v. 16, 17. And we may suppose the people dispersed themselves and their families into the countries they had conquered, at least those that lay nearest to the head-quarters at Gilgal, until an orderly distribution should be made by lot, that every man might know his own. Or, (2.) So as to keep them in action, or give them any molestation, v. 23. The land rested from war. It ended not in a peace with the Canaanites, (that was forbidden,) but in a peace from them. There is a rest, a rest from war, remaining for the people of God, into which they shall enter, when their warfare is accomplished.

II. That which was now done is here compared with that which had been said to Moses. God's word and his works, if viewed and considered together, will mutually illustrate each other. It is here observed in the close,

1. That all the precepts God had given to Moses relating to the conquest of Canaan, were obeyed on the people's part, at least, while Joshua lived. See how solemnly this is remarked, v. 15. As the Lord commanded Moses his servant, by whose hand the law was given, so did Moses command Joshua, for Moses was faithful, as a lawgiver, to him that appointed him, he did his part, and then he died; but were the commands of Moses observed when he was in his grave? Yes, they were, so did Joshua, who was, in his place, as faithful as Moses in his. He left nothing undone (Heb. he removed nothing) of all that the Lord commanded Moses. They that leave their duty undone, do what they can to remove or make void the command of God, by which they are obliged to it; but Joshua, by performing the precept, confirmed it, as the expression is, Deut. 27. 26. Joshua was himself a great commander, and yet nothing was more his praise than his obedience. They that rule others at their will, must themselves be ruled by the divine will, then their power is indeed their honour, and not otherwise. The pious obedience for which Joshua is here commended, respects especially the command to destroy the Canaanites, and to break down their altars, and burn their images, Deut. 7. 2. . 5. Exod. 23. 24.—34. 13. Joshua, in his zeal for the Lord of hosts, spared neither the idols, nor the idolaters. Saul's disobedience, or rather his partial obedience, to the command of God, for the utter destruction of the Amalekites, cost him his kingdom. It should seem Joshua himself gives this account of his most careful and punctual observance of his orders in the execution of his commission, that in all respects he had done as Moses commanded him; and then it intimates that he had more pleasure and satisfaction in reflecting upon his obedience to the commands of God in all this war, and valued himself more upon that, than upon all the gains and triumphs with which he was enriched and advanced.

2. That all the promises God had given to Moses, relating to this conquest, were accomplished on his part, v. 23. Joshua took the whole land, conquered it, and took possession of it, according to all that the Lord said unto Moses. God had promised to drive out the nations before them, Exod. 33. 2.—34. 11. and to bring them down, Deut. 9. 3. And now it was done. There failed not one word of the promise. Our successes and enjoyments are then doubly sweet and comfortable to us, when we see them flowing to us from the promise; this is according to what the Lord said: as our obedience is then acceptable to God, when it has an eye to the precept. And if we make conscience of our duty, we need not question the performance of the promise.

CHAP. XII.

This chapter is a summary of Israel's conquests. I. Their conquests under Moses, on the other side Jordan, (for we now suppose ourselves in Canaan,) eastward, which we had the history of, Numb. 21. 24, &c. And here the abridgment of that history, v. 1. . 6. II. Their conquests under Joshua, on this side Jordan, westward. 1. The country they reduced, v. 7, 8. 2. The kings they subdued, thirty-one in all, v. 9. . 24. And this comes in here, not only as a conclusion of the history of the wars of Canaan, (that we might at one view see what they had got,) but as a preface to the history of the dividing of Canaan, that all that might be put together, which they were now to make a distribution of.

1. NOW these are the kings of the land which the children of Israel smote, and possessed their land on the other side Jordan toward the rising of the sun, from the river Arnon unto mount Hermon, and all the plain on the east: 2. Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt in Heshbon, and ruled from Aroer, which is upon the bank of the river Arnon, and from the middle of the river, and from half Gilead, even unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon; 3. And from the plain to the sea of Chinneroth on the east, and unto the sea of the plain, even the salt sea on the east, the way to Beth-jeshimoth; and from the south, under Asluloth-pisgah: 4. And the coast of Og king of Bashan, which was of the remnant of the giants, that dwelt at Ashtaroth and at Edrei, 5. And reigned in mount Hermon, and in Salcah, and in all Bashan, unto the border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites, and half Gilead, the border of Sihon king of Heshbon. 6. Them did Moses the servant of the Lord and the children of Israel smite: and Moses the servant of the Lord gave it for a possession unto the Reubenites, and Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh.

Joshua, or whoever else is the historian, before he comes to sum up the new conquests Israel had made, in these verses recites their former conquests in Moses's time, under whom they became masters of the great and potent kingdoms of Sihon and Og. Note, Fresh mercies must not drown the remembrance of former mercies, nor must the glory of the present instruments of good to the church be suffered to eclipse and diminish the just honour of those who have gone before them, and who were the blessings and ornaments of their day. Joshua's services and achievements are confessedly great, but let not those under Moses be overlooked and forgotten, since God was the same who wrought both, and, both put together, proclaim him the Alpha and Omega of Israel's great salvation. Here is,

1. A description of this conquered country, the measure and bounds of it in general, v. 1. From the river Arnon in the south, to mount Hermon in the north. In particular, here is a description of the kingdom of Sihon, v. 2, 3. and that of Og, v. 4, 5. Moses had described this country very particularly, Deut. 2. 36.—3. 4, &c. and this description here agrees with his. King Og is said to dwell at Ashtaroth and Edrei, v. 4. probably, because they were both his royal cities, he had palaces in both, and resided sometimes in one, and sometimes in the other; one perhaps was his summer seat, and the other his winter seat; but Israel took both from him, and made one grave to serve him that could not be content with one palace.

2. The distribution of this country; Moses assigned it to the two tribes and a half, at their request, and divided it among them, v. 6. of which we had the story at large, Numb. 32. The dividing of it, when it was conquered by Moses, is here mentioned as an example to Joshua, what he must do, now that he had conquered the country on this side Jordan. Moses, in his time, gave to one part of Israel a very rich and fruitful country, but it was on the outside of Jordan; Joshua gave to all Israel the holy land, the mountain of God's sanctuary, within Jordan: so the law conferred, upon some few of God's spiritual Israel, external temporal blessings, which were earnest of good things to come; but our Lord Jesus, the true Joshua, has provided for all the children of promise spiritual blessings, the privileges of the sanctuary, and the heavenly Canaan. The triumphs and grants of the law were glorious, but those of the gospel far exceed in glory.

7. And these are the kings of the country which Joshua and the children of Israel smote on this side Jordan on the west, from Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon even unto the mount Halak, that goeth up to Seir; which Joshua gave unto the tribes of Israel for a possession according to their divisions; 8. In the mountains, and in the valleys, and in the plains, and in the springs, and in the wilderness, and in the south country; the Hittites, the Amorites, and the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites: 9. The king of Jericho, one; the king of Ai, which is beside Beth-el, one; 10. The king of Jerusalem, one; the king of Hebron, one; 11. The king of Jarmuth, one; the king of Lachish, one; 12. The king of Eglon, one; the king of Gezer, one; 13. The king of Debir, one; the king of Geder, one; 14. The king of Hormah, one; the king of Arad, one; 15. The king of Libnah, one; the king of Adullam, one; 16. The king of Makedah, one; the king of Beth-el, one;

17. The king of Tappuah, one; the king of Hopher, one; 18. The king of Aphek, one; the king of Lasharon, one; 19. The king of Madon, one; the king of Hazor, one; 20. The king of Shimron-meron, one; the king of Achshaph, one; 21. The king of Taanach, one; the king of Megiddo, one; 22. The king of Kedesh, one; the king of Jokneam of Carmel, one; 23. The king of Dor in the coast of Dor, one; the king of the nations of Gilgal, one; 24. The king of Tirzah, one: all the kings thirty and one.

We have here a breviate of Joshua's conquests.

I. The limits of the country he conquered; it lay between Jordan on the east, and the Mediterranean sea on the west, and extended from Baal-gad near Lebanon in the north, to Halak, which lay upon the country of Edom in the south, v. 7. The boundaries are more largely described, Numb. 34. 2, &c. this only is enough to shew that God had been as good as his word, and had given them possession of all he had promised them by Moses, if they would but have kept it.

II. The various kinds of land that were found in this country, which contributed both to its pleasantness and to its fruitfulness, v. 8. There were mountains, not craggy, and rocky, and barren, which are frightful to the traveller, and useless to the inhabitants, but fruitful hills, such as put forth precious things, Deut. 33. 15. which charmed the spectator's eye, and filled the owner's hand. And valleys, not mossy and boggy, but covered with corn, Ps. 65. 13. There were plains, and springs to water them; and even in that rich land there were wildernesses too, or forests, which were not so thickly inhabited as other parts, yet had towns and houses in them, but served as foils to set off the more pleasant and fruitful countries.

III. The several nations that had been in possession of this country, Hittites, Amorites, Canaanites, &c. all of them descended from Canaan, the accursed son of Ham, Gen. 10. 15. . 18. Seven nations they are called, Deut. 7. 1. and so many are there reckoned up, but here, six only are mentioned, the Gergashites being here either lost or left out, though we find them, Gen. 10. 16. and 15. 21. Either they were incorporated with some other of these nations, or, as the tradition of the Jews is, upon the approach of Israel under Joshua, they all withdrew and went into Africa, leaving their country to be possessed by Israel, with whom they saw it was to no purpose to contend, and therefore they are not named among the nations that Joshua subdued.

IV. A list of the kings that were conquered and subdued by the sword of Israel, some in the field, others in their own cities. Thirty-one in all, and very particularly named and counted, it should seem, in the order in which they were conquered; for the catalogue begins with the kings of Jericho and Ai, then takes in the king of Jerusalem, and the princes of the south that were in confederacy with him, and then proceeds to those of the northern association. Now,

1. This shews what a very fruitful country Canaan then was, which could support so many kingdoms, and in which so many kings chose to throng together, rather than disperse themselves into other countries, which we may suppose not yet inhabited, but where, though they might find more room, they could not expect such plenty and pleasure: this was the land God spied out for Israel; and yet at this day it is one of the most barren, despicable, and unprofitable, countries in the world; such is the effect of the curse it lies under, since its possessors rejected Christ and his gospel, as was foretold by Moses, Deut. 29. 23.

2. It shews what narrow limits men's ambition was then confined to. These kings contented themselves with the government, each of them, of one city, and the towns and villages that pertained to it; and no one of them, for aught that appears, aimed to make himself master of the rest, but, when there was occasion, united for the common safety. Yet it should seem, that what was wanting in the extent of their territories, was made up in the absoluteness of their power, their subjects being all their tenants and vassals, and entirely at their command.

3. It shews how good God was to Israel, in giving them victory over all these kings, and possession of all these kingdoms, and what obligations he hereby laid upon them to observe his statutes, and to keep his laws, Ps. 105. 44, 45. There were thirty-one kingdoms, or signories, to be divided among nine tribes and a half of Israel. Of these, there fell to the lot of Judah, the kingdoms of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, Eglon, Debir, Arad, Libnath, and Adullam, eight in all, beside part of the kingdom of Jerusalem, and part of Geder. Benjamin had the kingdoms of Jericho, Ai, Jerusalem, Makkedah, Beth-el, and the nations of Gilgal, six in all. Simeon had the kingdom of Hormah, and part of Geder. Ephraim had the kingdoms of Gezer and Tirzah. Manasse (that half-tribe) had the kingdoms of Tappuah and Hopher, Taanach and Megiddo. Asher had the kingdoms of Aphek and Achshaph. Zebulun had the kingdoms of Lasharon, Shimron-meron and Jokneam. Naphtali had the kingdoms of Madon, Hazor, and Kedesh. And Issachar had that of Dor. These were some of the great and famous kings that God smote, for his mercy endureth for ever; and gave their land for an heritage, even an heritage unto Israel his servant. For his mercy endureth for ever, Ps. 136. 17, &c.

CHAP. XIII.

At this chapter begins the account of the dividing of the land of Canaan among the tribes of Israel by lot; a narrative not so entertaining and instructive as that of the conquest of it, and yet it is thought fit to be inserted in the sacred history, to illustrate the performance of the promise made to the fathers, that this land should be given to the seed of Jacob, to them, and not to any other. The preserving of this distribution would be of great use to the Jewish nation, who were obliged by the law to keep up this first distribution, and not to transfer inheritances from tribe to tribe, Numb. 36. 9. It is likewise of use to us for the explaining of other scriptures: the learned know how much light the geographical description of a country gives to the history of it. And therefore we are not to skip over these chapters of hard names, as useless and not to be regarded; where God has a mouth to speak, and a hand to write, we should find an ear to hear, and an eye to read; and God give us a heart to profit! In this chapter, I. God informs Joshua what parts of the country, that were intended in the grant to Israel, yet remained unconquered, and not got in possession, v. 1. . 6. II. He appoints him, notwithstanding, to make a distribution of what was conquered, v. 7. III. To complete this account, here is a repetition of the distribution Moses had made of the land on the other side Jordan; in general, v. 8. . 14. In particular, the lot of Reuben, v. 15. . 23. Of Gad, v. 24. . 28. Of the half-tribe of Manasse, v. 29. . 33.

1. NOW Joshua was old and stricken in years; and the LORD said unto him, Thou art old and stricken in years, and there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed. 2. This is the land that yet remaineth: all the borders of the Philistines, and all Geshuri, 3. From Silor, which is before Egypt, even unto the borders of Ekron northward, which is counted to the Canaanite: five lords of the Philistines; the Gazathites, and the Ashdothites, the Eshkalonites, the Gittites, and the Ekronites; also the Avites: 4. From the south, all the land of the Canaanites, and Mearah that is beside the Sidonians, unto Aphek, to the borders of the Amorites: 5. And the land of the Gihlites, and all Lebanon, toward the sun-rising, from Baal-gad under mount Hermon unto the entering into Hamath. 6. All the inhabitants of the hill country from Lebanon unto Misrephoth-maim, and all the Sidonians, them will I drive out from before the children of Israel: only divide thou it by lot unto the Israelites for an inheritance, as I have commanded thee.

Here,

I. God puts Joshua in mind of his old age, v. 1. 1. It is said that Joshua was old and stricken in years, and he and Caleb were at this time the only old men among the thousands of Israel; none (except them) of all those who were numbered at mount Sinai being now alive. He had been a man of war from his youth, Exod. 17. 10. but now he yielded to the infirmities of age, with which it is in vain for the stoutest man to think of contesting. It should seem Joshua had not the same strength and vigour in his old age that Moses had; all that come to old age do not find it alike good; generally, the days of old age are evil days, and such as there is no pleasure in them, nor expectation of service from them. 2. God takes notice of it to him, God said to him, Thou art old. Note, It is good for those who are old and stricken in years to be put in remembrance of their being so. Some have gray hairs here and there upon them, and perceive it not, Hos. 7. 9. They do not care to think of it, and therefore need to be told of it, that they may be quickened to do the work of life, and make preparation for death, which is coming toward them apace. But God mentions Joshua's age and growing infirmities, (1.) As a reason why he should now lay by the thoughts of pursuing the war; he cannot expect to see an end of it quickly, for there remained much land, more perhaps than he thought, to be possessed, in several parts, remote from each other: and it was not fit that at this age he should be put upon the fatigue of renewing the war, and carrying it to such distant places; no, it was enough for him that he had reduced the body of the country, let him be gathered to rest, with honour and the thanks of his people, for the good services he had done them, and let the conquering of the skirts of the country be left for those that shall come after. As he had entered into the labours of Moses, so let others enter into his, and bring forth the top-stone; the doing of which was reserved for David long after. Observe, God considers the frame of his people, and would not have them burdened with work above their strength. It cannot be expected that old people should do as they have done for God and their country. (2.) As a reason why he should speedily apply himself to the dividing of that which he had conquered. That work must be done, and done quickly; it was necessary that he should preside in the doing of it, and therefore, he being old and stricken in years, and not likely to continue long, let him make that his concluding piece of service to God and Israel. All people, but especially old people, should set themselves to do that quickly which must be done before they die, lest death prevent them, Eccl. 9. 10.

II. He gives him a particular account of the land that yet remained unconquered, which was intended for Israel, and which, in due time, they should be masters of, if they did not put a bar in their own door. Divers places are here mentioned, some in the south, as the country of the Philistines, governed by five lords, and the land that lay toward Egypt, v. 2, 3. Some westward, as that which lay toward the Sidonians, v. 4. Some eastward, as all Lebanon, v. 5. Joshua is told this, and he made the people acquainted with it, 1. That they might be the more affected with God's goodness to them in giving them this good land, and might thereby be engaged to love and serve him; for if this which they had was too little, God would moreover give them such and such things, 2 Sam. 12. 8. 2. That they might not be tempted to make any league, or contract any dangerous familiarity, with these their neighbours, so as to learn their way, but might rather be jealous of them, as people that kept them from their right, and that they had just cause of quarrel with. 3. That they might keep themselves in a posture for war, and not think of putting off the harness, as long as there remained any land to be possessed. Nor must we lay aside our spiritual armour, or be off our watch, till our victory be complete in the kingdom of glory.

III. He promises that he would make the Israelites masters of all those countries that were yet unsubdued, though Joshua was old, and not able to do it, old and not likely to live to see it done. Whatever becomes of us, and however we may be laid aside as despised broken vessels, God will do his own work, in his own time. v. 6. I will drive them out. The original is emphatical, "It is I that will do it, I that can do it, when thou art dead and gone, and will do it, if Israel be not wanting to themselves." "I will do it by my Word," so the Chaldee here, as in many other places, "by the Eternal Word, the Captain of the hosts of the Lord." This promise, that he would drive them out from before the children of Israel, plainly supposes it as the condition of the promise, that the children of Israel must themselves attempt and endeavour their extirpation, must go up against them, else they could not be said to be driven out before them; if, afterwards, Israel, through sloth or cowardice, or affection to these idolaters, sit still and let them alone, they must blame themselves, and not God, if they be not driven out. We must work out our salvation, and then God will work in us, and work with us; we must resist our spiritual enemies, and then God will tread them under our feet; we must go forth to our Christian work and warfare, and then God will go forth before us.

7. Now therefore divide this land for an inheritance unto the nine tribes, and the half tribe of Manasseh, 8. With whom the Reubenites and the Gadites have received their inheritance, which Moses gave them, beyond Jordan eastward, even as Moses the servant of the LORD gave them; 9. From Aroer, that is upon the bank of the river Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river, and all the plain of Medeba unto Dibon; 10. And all the cities of Sihon king of the Amorites, which reigned in Heshbon, unto the border of the children of Ammon; 11. And Gilead, and the border of the Geshurites and Maachathites, and all mount Hermon, and all Bashan unto Saleah; 12. All the kingdom of Og in Bashan, which reigned in Ashtaroth and in Edrei, who remained of the remnant of the giants: for these did Moses smite, and cast them out. 13. Nevertheless the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites: but the Geshurites and the Maachathites dwell among the Israelites until this day. 14. Only unto the tribe of Levi he gave none inheritance; the sacrifices of the LORD God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as he said unto them. 15. And Moses gave unto the tribe of the children of Reuben inheritance according to their families. 16. And their coast was from Aroer, that is on the bank of the river Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river, and all the plain by Medeba; 17. Heshbon, and all her cities that are in the plain; Dibon, and Bamoth-baal, and Beth-baal-meon, 18. And Jahaza, and Kedemoth, and Mephaath, 19. And Kirjathaim, and Sibmah, and Zareth-shahar in the mount of the valley, 20. And Beth-peor, and Ashdoth-pisgah, and Beth-jeshimoth, 21. And all the cities of the plain, and all the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, which reigned in Heshbon, whom Moses smote with the princes of Midian, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, which were dukes of Sihon, dwelling in the country. 22. Balaam also the son of Beor, the soothsayer, did the children of Israel slay with the sword among them that were slain by them. 23. And the border of the children of Reuben was Jordan, and the border thereof. This was the inheritance of the children of Reuben after their families, the cities and the villages thereof. 24. And Moses gave inheritance unto the tribe of Gad, even unto the children of Gad according to their families. 25. And their coast was Jazer, and all the cities of Gilead, and half the land of the children of Ammon, unto Aroer that is before Rabbah; 26. And from Heshbon unto Ramath-mizpeh, and Betonim; and from Mahanaim unto the border of Debir; 27. And in the valley, Beth-aram, and Beth-nimrah, and Succoth, and Zaphon, the rest of the kingdom of Sihon king of Heshbon, Jordan and his border, even unto the edge of the sea of Chinnereth on the other side Jordan eastward. 28. This is the inheritance of the children of Gad after their families, the cities, and their villages. 29. And Moses gave inheritance unto the half-tribe of Manasseh: and this was the possession of the half-tribe of the children of Manasseh by their families. 30. And their coast was from Mahanaim, all Bashan, all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, and all the towns of Jair, which are in Bashan, threescore cities: 31. And half Gilead, and Ashtaroth, and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan, were pertaining unto the children of Machir the son of Manasseh, even to the one half of the children of Machir by their families. 32. These are the countries which Moses did distribute for inheritance in the plains of Moab, on the other side Jordan, by Jericho, eastward. 33. But unto the tribe of Levi Moses gave not any inheritance; for the LORD God of Israel was their inheritance, as he said unto them.

Here we have,

1. Orders given to Joshua to assign to each tribe its portion of this land, including that which was yet unsubdued, which must be brought into the lot, in a believing confidence that it should be conquered when Israel was multiplied, so as to have occasion for it; (v. 7.) Now divide this land. Joshua thought all must be conquered before any must be divided: "No," said God, "there is as much conquered as will serve your turn for the present; divide that, and make your best of it, and wait for the remainder hereafter." Note, We must take the comfort of what we have, though we cannot compass all we would have. Observe,

1. The land must be divided among the several tribes, and they must not always live in common, as now they did. Which way soever a just property is acquired, it is the will of that God who has given the earth to the children of men, that there should be such a thing, and that every man should know his own, and not invade that which is another's. The world must be governed, not by force, but right, by the law of equity, not of arms.

2. That it must be divided for an inheritance, though they got it by conquest. (1.) The promise of it came to them as an inheritance from their fathers; the land of promise pertained to the children of promise, who were thus beloved for their fathers' sakes, and in performance of the covenant with them. (2.) The possession of it was to be transmitted by them, as an inheritance to their children. Frequently, what is got by force, is soon lost again; but Israel, having an incontestable title to this land by the divine grant, might see it thereby secured as an inheritance to their seed after them, and that God kept his mercy for thousands.

3. That Joshua must divide it, not by his own will; though he was a very wise, just, and good man, it must not be left to him to give what he pleased to each tribe; but he must do it by lot, which referred the matter wholly to God, and to his determination, for he it is that appoints the bounds of our habitation, and every man's judgment must proceed from him. But Joshua must preside in this affair, must manage this solemn appeal to Providence, and see that the lot was drawn fairly and without fraud, and that every tribe did acquiesce in it. The lot indeed causeth contention to cease, Prov. 18. 18. But if upon this lot any controversy should arise, Joshua by his wisdom and authority must determine it, and prevent any ill consequences of it. Joshua must have the honour of dividing the land. (1.) Because he had undergone the fatigue of conquering it; and when, through his hand, each tribe received its allotment, they would thereby be made the more sensible of their obligations to him. And what a pleasure must it needs be to a man of such a public spirit as Joshua was, to see the people that were so dear to him, eating the labour of his hands! (2.) That he might be herein a type of Christ, who has not only conquered for us the gates of hell, but has opened to us the gates of heaven, and having purchased the eternal inheritance for all believers, will in due time put them all in possession of it.

II. An account is here given of the distribution of the land on the other side Jordan, among the Reubenites, and Gadites, and half the tribe of Manasseh, which comes in, 1. As the reason why this land within Jordan must be divided only to the nine tribes and a half, because the other two and a half were already provided for. 2. As a pattern to Joshua in the work he had now to do. He had seen Moses distribute that land, which would give him some aim in distributing this, and from thence he might take his measures; only this was to be done by lot, but it should seem, Moses did that himself, according to the wisdom given unto him. 3. As an inducement to Joshua to hasten the dividing of this land, that the nine tribes and a half might not be kept any longer than was necessary out of their possession, since their brethren of the two tribes and a half were so well settled in theirs; and God their common father would not have such a difference made between his children.

(1.) Here is a general description of the country that was given to the two tribes and a half, which Moses gave them, even as Moses gave them, v. 8. The repetition implies a ratification of the grant by Joshua, Moses settled that matter, and as Moses settled it, so shall it rest; Joshua will not, under any pretence whatsoever, go about to alter it. And a reason is intimated why he would not, because Moses was the servant of the Lord, and acted in this matter by secret direction from him, and was faithful as a servant. Here we have, [1.] The fixing of the boundaries of this country, by which they were divided from the neighbouring nations, v. 9, &c. Israel must know their own, and keep to it, and may not, under pretence of their being God's peculiar people, encroach upon their neighbours, and invade their rights and properties, to which they had a good and firm title by providence, though not, as Israel, a title by promise. [2.] An exception of one part of this country from Israel's possession, though it was in their grant, namely, the Geshurites, and the Maacathites, v. 13. They had not leisure to reduce all the remote and obscure corners of the country in Moses's time, and afterward they had no mind to it, being easy with what they had. Thus those who are not straitened in God's promises, are yet straitened in their own faith, and prayers, and endeavours.

(2.) A very particular account of the inheritance of these two tribes and a half; how they were separated from each other, and what cities, with the towns, villages, and fields, commonly known and reputed to be appurtenances to them, belonged to each tribe. This is very fully and exactly set down, [1.] That posterity might, in reading this history, be the more affected with the goodness of God to their ancestors, when they found what a large and fruitful country, and what abundance of great and famous cities, he put them in possession of. God's grants look best, when we descend to the particulars. [2.] That the limits of each tribe being punctually set down in this authentic record, disputes might be prevented, and such contests between the tribes, as commonly happen where boundaries have not been adjusted, nor this matter brought to a certainty. And we have reason to think that the register here prescribed and published of the lot of each tribe, was of great use to Israel in after ages, was often appealed to, and always acquiesced in, for the determining of meum and tuum—mine and thine.

First, We have here the lot of the tribe of Reuben, Jacob's first-born; who, though he had lost the dignity and power which pertained to the birthright, yet, it seems, had the advantage of being first served. Perhaps those of that tribe had an eye to this, in desiring to be seated on that side Jordan, that, since they could not expect the benefit of the best lot, they might have the credit of the first. In the account of the lot of this tribe, mention is made of the slaughter, 1. Of Sihon, king of the Amorites, who reigned in this country, and might have kept it and his life, if he would have been neighbourly, and have suffered Israel to pass through his territories, but, by attempting to oppose them, justly brought ruin upon himself, Numb. 21. 21, &c. 2. Of the princes of Midian, who were slain afterward in another war, Numb. 31. 8. and yet are here called dukes of Sihon, and are said to be smitten with him, because they were either tributaries to him, or, in his opposition to Israel, confederates with him, and hearty in his interests, and his fall made way for their's not long after. 3. Of Balaam particularly, that would, if he could, have cursed Israel, and was soon after recompensed according to the wickedness of his endeavour, Ps. 28. 4. For he fell with those that set him on. This was recorded before, Numb. 31. 8. and is here repeated, because the defeating of Balaam's purpose, to curse Israel, was the turning of that curse into a blessing, and was such an instance of the power and goodness of God, as was fit to be had in everlasting remembrance. See Micah, 6. 5.

Within the lot of this tribe was that mount Pisgah, from the top of which Moses took his view of the earthly Canaan, and his flight to the heavenly. And not far off thence Elijah was, when he was fetched up to heaven in a chariot of fire. The separation of this tribe from the rest by the river Jordan, was that which Deborah lamented; and the preference they gave to their private interests, above the public, was what she censured, Judg. 5. 15, 16. In this tribe lay Heshbon and Sibmah, famed for their fruitful fields and vineyards. See Isa. 16. 3, 9. Jer. 48. 32. This tribe, with that of Gad, was sorely shaken by Hazael king of Syria, 2 Kings, 10. 33. and afterward dislodged and carried into captivity, twenty years before the general captivity of the ten tribes by the king of Assyria, 1 Chron. 5. 26.

Secondly, The lot of the tribe of Gad, v. 24. . 28. This lay north of Reuben's lot; the country of Gilead lay in this tribe, so famous for its balm, that it is thought strange indeed if there be no balm in Gilead, and the cities of Jabesh-Gilead, and Ramoth-Gilead, which we often read of in scripture. Succoth and Peniel, which we read of in the story of Gideon, were in this tribe; and that forest which is called the wood of Ephraim, (from the slaughter Jephthah made there of the Ephraimites,) in which Absalom's rebellious army was beaten, while his father David lay at Mahanaim, one of the frontier-cities of this tribe, v. 26. Sharon was in this tribe, famous for roses. And within the limits of this tribe lived those Gadarenes, that loved their swine better than their Saviour. fitter to be called Girgashites than Israelites.

Thirdly, The lot of the half tribe of Manasseh, v. 29. . 31. Bashan, the kingdom of Og, was in this allotment, famous for the best timber, witness the oaks of Bashan, and the best breed of cattle, witness the bulls and rams of Bashan. This tribe lay north of Gad, reached to mount Hermon, and had in it part of Gilead. Mizpeh was in this half tribe, and Jephthah was one of its ornaments; so was Elijah, for in this tribe was Thisbe, whence he is called the Tishbite, and Jair was another. In the edge of the tribe stood Chorazin, honoured with Christ's wondrous works, but ruined by his righteous woe for not improving them.

Lastly, Twice in this chapter it is taken notice of, that to the tribe of Levi Moses gave no inheritance, v. 14, 33, for so God had appointed, Numb. 18. 20. If they had been appointed to a lot entire by themselves, Moses would have served them first, not because it was his own tribe, but because it was God's, but they must be provided for in another manner; their habitations must be scattered in all the tribes, and their maintenance brought out of all the tribes, and God himself was the portion both of their inheritance and of their cup, Deut. 10. 9.—18. 2.

CHAP. XIV.

Here is, I. The general method that was taken in dividing the land, v. 1. . 5. II. The demand Caleb made of Hebron, as his by promise, and therefore not to be put into the lot with the rest, v. 6. . 12. III. And Joshua's grant of that demand, v. 13. . 15. This was done at Gilgal, which was as yet their headquarters.

1. AND these are the countries which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan, which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, distributed for inheritance to them. 2. By lot was their inheritance, as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses, for the nine tribes, and for the half tribe. 3. For Moses had given the inheritance of two tribes and an half tribe on the other side Jordan: but unto the Levites he gave none inheritance among them. 4. For the children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim: therefore they gave no part unto the Levites in the land, save cities to dwell in, with their suburbs for their cattle and for their substance. 5. As the Lord commanded Moses, so the children of Israel did, and they divided the land.

The historian, having in the foregoing chapter given an account of the disposal of the countries on the other side Jordan, now comes to tell us what they did with the countries in the land of Canaan. They were not conquered to be left desert, a habitation for dragons, and a court for owls, Isa. 34. 13. No, the Israelites, that had hitherto been closely encamped in a body, and the greatest part of them such as never knew any other way of living, must now disperse themselves, to replenish these new conquests. It is said of the earth, God created it not in vain, he formed it to be inhabited, Isa. 45. 18. Canaan would have been subdued in vain, if it had not been inhabited. Yet every man might not go and settle where he pleased, but as there seems to have been in the days of Peleg an orderly and regular division of the habitable earth among the sons of Noah, Gen. 10. 25, 32. so there was now such a division of the land of Canaan among the sons of Jacob. God had given Moses directions how this distribution should be made, and those directions are here punctually observed. See Numb. 33. 53, &c.

I. The managers of this great affair, were Joshua the chief magistrate, Eleazar the chief priest, and ten princes, one of each of the tribes that were now to have their inheritance, whom God himself had nominated (Numb. 34. 17, &c.) some years before, and, it should seem, they were all now in being, and attended this service, that every tribe, having a representative of its own, might be satisfied that there was fair dealing, and might the more contentedly sit down by its lot.

II. The tribes among whom this dividend was to be made, were nine and a half. 1. Not the two and a half that were already seated, v. 3. though, perhaps, now that they saw what a good land Canaan was, and how effectually it was subdued, they might some of them repent their choice, and wish they had now been to have their lot with their brethren, upon which condition they would gladly have given up what they had on the other side Jordan; but it would not be admitted, they had made their election without power of revocation, and so must their doom be, themselves have decided it, they must adhere to their choice. 2. Not the tribe of Levi, that was to be otherwise provided for. God had distinguished them from, and dignified them above, the other tribes, and they must not now mingle themselves with them, nor cast in their lot among them, for that would entangle them in the affairs of this life, which would not consist with a due attendance on their sacred function. But, 3. Joseph made two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim, pursuant to Jacob's adoption of Joseph's two sons, and so the number of the tribes was kept up to twelve, though Levi was taken out, which is intimated here, v. 4. The children of Joseph were two tribes, therefore they gave no part to Levi, they being twelve without him.

III. The rule by which they went, was the lot, v. 2. The disposal of that is of the Lord, Prov. 16. 33. It was here used in an affair of weight, and which could not otherwise be accommodated to universal satisfaction, and it was used in a solemn religious manner as an appeal to God, by consent of parties. In dividing by lot, 1. They referred themselves to God, and to his wisdom and sovereignty, believing him fitter to determine for them, than they for themselves, Ps. 47. 4. He shall choose our inheritance for us. 2. They professed a willingness to abide by the determination of it; for every man must take what is his lot, and make the best of it. In allusion to this, we are said to obtain an inheritance in Christ, Eph. 1. 11. ἐκλήρωθήμεν, we have obtained it by lot. So the word signifies; for it is obtained by a divine designation. Christ, our Joshua, gives eternal life to as many as were given him, Johu, 17. 2.

6. Then the children of Judah came unto Joshua in Gilgal: and Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite said unto him, Thou knowest the thing that the LORD said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea. 7. Forty years old was I when Moses the servant of the LORD sent me from Kadesh-barnea to espy out the land; and I brought him word again as it was in mine heart. 8. Nevertheless my brethren that went up with me made the heart of the people melt: but I wholly followed the LORD my God. 9. And Moses swore that day, saying, Surely the land whereon thy feet have trodden shall be thine inheritance, and thy children's for ever, because thou hast wholly followed the LORD my God. 10. And now, behold, the LORD hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years, even since the LORD spake this word unto Moses, while the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness: and now, lo, I am this day fourscore and five years old. 11. As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out, and to come in. 12. Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the LORD spake in that day; for thou heardest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and fenced: if so be the LORD will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out, as the LORD said. 13. And Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh Hebron for an inheritance. 14. Hebron therefore became the inheritance of Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenezite unto this day, because that he wholly followed the LORD God of Israel. 15. And the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba; which Arba was a great man among the Anakims. And the land had rest from war.

Before the lot was cast into the lap for the determining of the portions of the respective tribes, the particular portion of Caleb is assigned him, who was now, except Joshua, not only the oldest man in all Israel, but was twenty years older than any of them, for all that were above twenty years old when he was forty, were dead in the wilderness; it was fit therefore that this phoenix of his age should have some particular marks of honour put upon him in the dividing of the land. Now,

1. Caleb here presents his petition, or rather makes his demand, to have Hebron given him for a possession, (this mountain he calls it, v. 12.) and not to have that put into the lot with the other parts of the country. To justify his demand, he shews that God had long since, by Moses, promised him that very mountain; so that God's mind being already made known in this matter, it would be a vain and needless thing to consult it any further by casting lots, by which we are to appeal to God in those cases only which cannot otherwise be decided, not in those which, like this here, are already determined. Caleb is here called the Kenezite, some think, from some remarkable victory obtained by him over the Kenezites, as the Romans gave their great generals titles from the countries they conquered, as Africanus, Germanicus, &c.

To enforce his petition, 1. He brings the children of Judah, that is, the heads and great men of that tribe, along with him, to present it, who were willing thus to pay their respects to that ornament of their tribe, and to testify their consent that he should be provided for by himself, and that they would not take it as any reflection upon the rest of his tribe. Caleb was the person whom God had chosen out of that tribe to be employed in dividing the land, Numb. 34. 19. And therefore, lest he should seem to improve his authority as a commissioner for his own private advantage and satisfaction, he brings his brethren along with him, and, waving his own power, seems rather to rely upon their interest. 2. He appeals to Joshua himself concerning the truth of the allegations, upon which he grounded his petition. Thou knowest the thing, v. 6. 3. He makes a very honourable mention of Moses, which he knew would not be at all displeasing to Joshua, Moses the man of God, v. 6. and the servant of the Lord, v. 7. What Moses said, he took as from God himself, because Moses was his mouth, and his agent, and therefore he had reason both to desire and expect it should be made good. What can be more earnestly desired than the tokens of God's favour? And what more confidently expected than the grants of his promise?

Caleb, in his petition, sets forth,

(1.) The testimony of his conscience concerning his integrity in the management of that great affair, on which it proved the late of Israel turned, the spying out of the land. Caleb was one of the twelve that were sent out on that errand, v.7. and he now reflected upon it with comfort, and mentioed it, not in pride, but as that which, being the consideration of the grant, was necessary to be inserted in the plea. [1.] That he made his report as it was in his heart, that is, he spake as he thought, when he spake so honourably of the land of Canaan, so confidently of the power of God to put them in possession of it, and so contemptibly of the opposition that the Canaanites, even the Anakims themselves, could make against them, as we find he did, Numb. 13. 30.—14. 7. 9. He did not do it merely to please Moses, or to keep the people quiet, much less from a spirit of contradiction to his fellows, but from a full conviction of the truth of what he said, and a firm belief of the divine promise. [2.] That herein he wholly followed the Lord his God, that is, he kept close to his duty, and sincerely aimed at the glory of God in it. He conformed himself to the divine will, with an eye to the divine favour. He had obtained this testimony from God himself, Numb. 14. 24. and therefore it was not vain-glory in him to speak of it, any more than it is for those, who have God's spirit witnessing with their spirits that they are the children of God, humbly and thankfully to tell others, for their encouragement, what God has done for their souls. Note, They that follow God fully when they are young, shall have both the credit and comfort of it when they are old, and the reward of it for ever in the heavenly Canaan. [3.] That he did this when all his brethren and companions in that service, except Joshua, did otherwise. They made the heart of the people melt, v.8. and how pernicious the consequences of it were, was very well known. It adds much to the praise of following God, if we adhere to him when others desert and decline from him. Caleb needed not to mention particularly Joshua's conduct in this matter, it was sufficiently known, and he would not seem to flatter him; it was enough to say, v.6. Thou knowest what the Lord spake concerning me and thee.

(2.) The experience he had had of God's goodness to him ever since, to this day. Though he had wandered with the rest in the wilderness, and had been kept thirty-eight years out of Canaan, as they were, for that sin, which he was so far from having a hand in, that he had done his utmost to prevent; yet, instead of complaining of that, he mentions, to the glory of God, his mercy to him in two things. [1.] That he was kept alive in the wilderness, not only notwithstanding the common perils and fatigues of that tedious march, but, though all the generation of Israelites, except himself and Joshua, were one way or other cut off by death. With what a grateful sense of God's goodness to him does he speak it! v.10. Now behold, (behold and wonder,) the Lord hath kept me alive these forty and five years—thirty-eight years in the wilderness, through the plagues of the desert, and seven years in Canaan, through the perils of war! Note, First, While we live, it is God that keeps us alive; by his power he protects us from death, and by his bounty supplies us continually with the supports and comforts of life. He holdeth our soul in life. Secondly, The longer we live, the more sensible we should be of God's goodness to us in keeping us alive, his care in prolonging our frail lives, his patience in prolonging our forfeited lives. Has he kept me alive these forty-five years? Is it about that time of life with us? Or is it more? Or is it less? We have reason to say, It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed. How much are we indebted to the favour of God, and what shall we render! Let the life, thus kept by the providence of God, be devoted to his praise. Thirdly, The death of many others, round about us, should make us the more thankful to God for sparing us and keeping us alive. Thousands falling on our right hand and our left, and yet ourselves spared—these distinguishing favours impose on us strong obligations to singular obedience. [2.] That he was fit for business, now that he was in Canaan. Though eighty-five years old, yet as hearty and lively as when he was forty, v.11. As my strength was then, so it is now. This was the fruit of the promise, and outbid what was said; for God not only gives what he promises, but he gives more; life by promise, shall be life, and health, and strength, and all that which will make the promised life a blessing and comfort. Moses had said in his prayer, Ps. 90. 10. that at eighty years old even their strength is labour and sorrow; and so it is most commonly, but Caleb was an exception to the rule; his strength at eighty-five was ease and joy, this he got by following the Lord fully. Caleb takes notice of this here, to the glory of God, and as an excuse for his asking a portion which he must fetch out of the giant's hands; let not Joshua tell him he knew not what he asked; could he get the possession of that which he begged for a title to? "Yes," says he, "why not? I am as fit for war now as ever I was."

(3.) The promise Moses had made him in God's name, that he should have this mountain, v.9. This promise is his chief plea, and that on which he relies. As we find it, Numb. 14. 24. it is general, Him will I bring into the land whereunto he went, and his seed shall possess it: but it seems it was more particular, and Joshua knew it; both sides understood this mountain, for which Caleb was now a suitor, to be intended. This was the place from which, more than any other, the spies took their report, for here they met with the sons of Anak, Numb. 13. 22. the sight of whom made such an impression upon them, v.33. We may suppose that Caleb, observing what stress they laid upon the difficulty of conquering Hebron, a city garrisoned by the giants, and how from thence they inferred that the conquest of the whole land was utterly impracticable, in opposition to their suggestions, and to convince the people that he spake as he thought, bravely desired to have that city, which they called invincible, assigned to himself for his own portion; "I will undertake to deal with that, and, if I cannot get it for my inheritance, I will be without." "Well," said Moses, "it shall be thine own then, win it and wear it." Such a noble heroic spirit Caleb had, and so desirous was he to inspire his brethren with it, that he chose this place, only because it was the most difficult to be conquered. And, to shew that his soul did not decay any more than his body, now, forty-five years after, he adheres to his choice, and is still of the same mind.

(4.) The hopes he had of being master of it, though the sons of Anak were in possession of it, v.12. If the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out. The city of Hebron Joshua had already reduced, ch.10.37. but the mountain which belonged to it, and which was inhabited by the sons of Anak, was yet unconquered, for though the cutting off the Anakims from Hebron was mentioned, ch.11.21. because the historian would relate all the military actions together, yet it seems it was not conquered till after they had begun to divide the land. Observe, He builds his hopes of driving out the sons of Anak upon the presence of God with him. He does not say, "Because I am now as strong for war as I was at forty, therefore I shall drive them out," depending upon his personal valour; nor does he depend upon his interest in the warlike tribe of Judah, who attended him now in making this address, and no doubt would assist him; nor does he court Joshua's aid, or put it upon that, "If thou wilt be with me, I shall gain my point;" but, If the Lord will be with me. Here, [1.] He seems to speak doubtfully of God's being with him, not from any distrust of his goodness or faithfulness. He had spoken without the least hesitation of God's presence with Israel in general, Numb. 14. 9. The Lord is with us; but for himself, from a humble sense of his own unworthiness of such a favour, he chooses to express himself thus, If the Lord will be with me. The Chaldee paraphrase reads it, If the Word of the Lord be my helper, that Word which is God, and in the fulness of time was made flesh, and is the Captain of our salvation. [2.] But he speaks without the least doubt; he is assured, that, if God were with him, he should be able to dispossess the sons of Anak. "If God be with us, if God be for us, who can be against us, so as to prevail?" It is also intimated, that, if God were not with him, though all the forces of Israel should come in to his assistance, he should not be able to gain his point. Whatever we undertake, God's favourable presence with us is all in all to our success; that therefore we must earnestly pray for, and carefully make sure of, by keeping ourselves in the love of God; and on that we must depend, and from that take our encouragement against the greatest difficulties.

Upon the whole matter, Caleb's request is, v. 12. Give me this mountain; First, Because it was formerly in God's promise, and he would let Israel know how much he valued the promise, insisting upon this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day, as most desirable, though, perhaps, as good a portion might have fallen to him by lot in common with the rest. They that live by faith, value that which is given by promise far above that which is given by providence only. Secondly, Because it was now in the Anakims' possession, and he would let Israel know how little he feared the enemy, and would, by his example, animate them to push on their conquests. Herein Caleb answered his name, which signifies all heart.

11. Joshua grants his petition, v. 13. Joshua blessed him, commended his bravery, applauded his request, and gave him what he asked. He also prayed for him, and for his good success in his intended undertaking against the sons of Anak. Joshua was both a prince and a prophet, and, upon both accounts, it was proper for him to give Caleb his blessing, for the less is blessed of the better. Hebron was settled on Caleb and his heirs, v. 14. because he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel. And happy are we if we follow him. Note, Singular piety shall be crowned with singular favours. Now, 1. We are here told what Hebron had been; the city of Arba, a great man among the Anakims, v. 15. we find it called Kirjath-arba, Gen. 23. 2. as the place where Sarah died. Hereabouts Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, lived most of their time in Canaan, and near to it was the cave of Machpelah, where they were buried, which perhaps had led Caleb hither, when he went to spy out the land, and had made him covet this, rather than any other part, for his inheritance. 2. We are afterward told what Hebron was. (1.) It was one of the cities belonging to the priests, Josh. 21. 13. and a city of refuge, Josh. 20. 7. When Caleb had it, he contented himself with the country about it, and cheerfully gave the city to the priests and the Lord's ministers: thinking it could not be better bestowed, no, not upon his own children, nor that it was the less his own for being thus devoted to God. (2.) It was a royal city, and, in the beginning of David's reign, the metropolis of the kingdom of Judah; thither the people resorted to him, and there he reigned seven years. Thus highly was Caleb's city honoured; pity there should have been such a blemish upon his family, long after, as Nabal was, who was of the house of Caleb, 1 Sam. 25. 3. But the best men cannot entail their virtues.

CHAP. XV.

The land, though not completely conquered, yet being (as was said in the close of the foregoing chapter) at rest from war, for the present, their armies all drawn out of the field to a general rendezvous at Gilgal, there they began to divide the land, though the work was afterward perfected at Shiloh, ch. 18. 1, &c. In this chapter, we have the lot of the tribe of Judah, which in this, as in other things, had the precedency: I. The borders or bounds of the inheritance of Judah, v. 1. .12. II. The particular assignment of Hebron, and the country thereabout, to Caleb and his family, v. 13. .19. III. The names of the several cities that fell within Judah's lot, v. 21. .63.

1. THIS then was the lot of the tribe of the children of Judah by their families; even to the border of Edom, the wilderness of Zin southward was the uttermost part of the south coast. 2. And their south border was from the shore of the salt sea, from the bay that looketh southward: 3. And it went out to the south side to Maaleh-acrabbin, and passed along to Zin, and ascended up on the south side unto Kadesh-barnea, and passed along to Hezron, and went up to Adar, and fetched a compass to Karkaa: 4. From thence it passed toward Azmon, and went out unto the river of Egypt; and the goings out of that coast were at the sea: this shall be your south coast. 5. And the east border was the salt sea, even unto the end of Jordan. And their border in the north quarter was from the bay of the sea at the uttermost part of Jordan: 6. And the border went up to Beth-hogla, and passed along by the north of Beth-arabah; and the border went up to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben: 7. And the border went up toward Debir from the valley of Achor, and so northward, looking toward Gilgal, that is before the going up to Adummim, which is on the south side of the river: and the border passed toward the waters of En-shemesh, and the goings out thereof were at En-rogel: 8. And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite; the same is Jerusalem: and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the giants northward: 9. And the border was drawn from the top of the hill unto the fountain of the water of Nephtoah, and went out to the cities of mount Ephron; and the border was drawn to Baalah, which is Kirjath-jearim: 10. And the border compassed from Baalah westward unto mount Seir, and passed along unto the side of mount Jearim, which is Cheselun, on the north side, and went down to Beth-shemesh, and passed on to Timnah: 11. And the border went out unto the side of Ekron northward: and the border was drawn to Shicron, and passed along to mount Baalah, and went out unto Jabneel; and the goings out of the border were at the sea. 12. And the west border was to the great sea, and the coast thereof. This is the coast of the children of Judah round about according to their families.

Judah and Joseph were the two sons of Jacob on whom Reuben's forfeited birthright devolved. Judah had the dominion entailed on him, and Joseph the double portion, and therefore these two tribes were first seated; Judah in the southern part of the land of Canaan, and Joseph in the northern part, and on them the other seven did attend, and had their respective lots as appurtenances to these two; the lots of Benjamin, Simeon, and Dan, were appendant to Judah, and those of Issachar and Zebulun, Naphtali and Asher, to Joseph. These two were first set up to be provided for, it should seem, before there was such an exact survey of the land as we find afterward, ch. 18. 9. It is probable that the most considerable parts of the northern and southern countries, and those that lay nearest to Gilgal, and which the people were best acquainted with, were first put into two portions, and the lot was cast upon them between these two principal tribes, of the one of which Joshua was, and of the other Caleb, who was the first commissioner in this writ of partition; and, by the decision of that lot, the southern country fell to Judah, and which we have an account of in this chapter, and the northern to Joseph, of which we have an account in the two following chapters. And, when this was done, there was a more equal dividend (either in quantity or quality) of the remainder among the seven tribes. And this, probably, was intended in that general rule which was given concerning this partition, Numb. 33. 54. To the more ye shall give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall give the less, and every man's inheritance shall be where his lot falleth; that is, "Ye shall appoint two greater portions, which shall be determined by lot, to those more numerous tribes of Judah and Joseph, and then the rest shall be lesser portions, to be allotted to the less numerous tribes." The former was done in Gilgal, the latter in Shiloh.

In these verses, we have the borders of the lot of Judah, which, as the rest, is said to be by their families, that is, with an eye to the number of their families. And it intimates, that Joshua and Eleazar, and the rest of the commissioners, when they had, by lot, given each tribe its portion, did afterward (it is probable, by lot likewise) subdivide those larger portions, and assign to each family its inheritance, and then to each household, which would be better done by this supreme authority, and be apt to give less disgust, than if it had been left to the inferior magistrates of each tribe to make that distribution. The borders of this tribe are here largely fixed, yet not unalterably, for a good deal of that which lies within these bounds was afterward assigned to the lots of Simeon and Dan.

1. The eastern border was all, and only, the salt sea, v. 5. Every sea is salt, but this was of an extraordinary and more than natural saltness, the effects of that fire and brimstone with which Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed in Abraham's time, whose ruins lie buried in the bottom of this dead water, which never either was moved itself, or had any living thing in it.

2. The southern border was that of the land of Canaan in general, as will appear by comparing v. 1. .4. with Numb. 34. 3. .5. So that this powerful and warlike tribe of Judah guarded the frontiers of the whole land on that side which lay toward their old sworn enemies, (though their two fathers were twin-brethren,) the Edomites. Our Lord, therefore, who sprang out of Judah, and whose the kingdom is, shall judge the mount of Esau, Obad. 21.

3. The northern border divided it from the lot of Benjamin. In this, mention is made of the stone of Bohan, a Reubenite, v. 6. who probably was a great commander of those forces of Reuben that came over Jordan, and died in the camp at Gilgal, and was buried not far off under this stone. The valley of Achor likewise lies under this border, v. 7. to remind the men of Judah of the trouble which Achan, one of their tribe, gave to the congregation of Israel, that they might not be too much lifted up with their services. This northern line touched close upon Jerusalem, v. 8. so close as to include in the lot of this tribe mount Zion and mount Moriah, though the greater part of the city lay in the lot of Benjamin.

4. The west border went near to the great sea at first, v. 12. but afterward the lot of the tribe of Dan took off a good part of Judah's lot on that side; for the lot was only to determine between Judah and Joseph, which should have the north, and which the south, and not immoveably to fix the border of either.

Judah's inheritance had its boundaries determined; though it was a powerful warlike tribe, and had a great interest in the other tribes, yet they must not therefore be left to their own choice, to enlarge their possessions at pleasure, but must live so as that their neighbours might live by them. Those that are placed high, yet must not think to be placed alone in the midst of the earth.

13. And unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh he gave a part among the children of Judah, according to the commandment of the LORD to Joshua, even the city of Arba the father of Anak, which city is Hebron. 14. And Caleb drove thence the three sons of Anak, Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmai, the children of Anak. 15. And he went up thence to the inhabitants of Debir: and the name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher. 16. And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife. 17. And Othniel the son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, took it: and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife. 18. And it came to pass, as she came unto him, that she moved him to ask of her father a field: and she lighted off her ass; and Caleb said unto her, What wouldest thou? 19. Who answered, Give me a blessing; for thou hast given me a south land; give me also springs of water. And he gave her the upper springs, and the nether springs.

The historian seems pleased with every occasion to make mention of Caleb, and to do him honour, because he had honoured God in following him fully. The grant Joshua made him of the mountain of Hebron for his inheritance is here repeated, v. 13. And it is said to be given him, 1. According to the command of the Lord to Joshua. Though Caleb, in his petition, had made out a very good title to it by promise, yet, because God had ordered Joshua to divide the land by lot, he would not in this one single instance, no, not to gratify his old friend Caleb, do otherwise, without orders from God, whose oracle, it is probable, he consulted upon this occasion. In every doubtful case, it is very desirable to know the mind of God, and to see the way of our duty plain. 2. It is said to be a part among the children of Judah; though it was assigned him before the lot of the tribe came up, yet it proved, God so directing the lot, to be in the heart of that tribe, which was graciously ordered in kindness to him, that he might not be as one separated from his brethren, and surrounded by those of other tribes.

Now, Caleb having obtained this grant, we are told,

I. How he signalized his own valour in the conquest of Hebron, v. 14. He drove thence the three sons of Anak; he and those that he engaged to assist him in this service. This is mentioned here, to shew that the confidence he had expressed of success in this affair, through the presence of God with him, ch. 14. 12. did not deceive him, but the event answered his expectation. It is not said that he slew these giants, but he drove them thence, which intimates, that they retired upon his approach, and fled before him; the strength and stature of their bodies could not keep up the courage of their minds, but, with the countenances of lions, they had the hearts of trembling hares. Thus does God often cut off the spirit of princes, Ps. 76. 12. take away the heart of the chief of the people, Job, 12. 24. and so shame the confidence of the proud; and thus, if we resist the devil, that roaring lion, though he fall not, yet he will flee.

II. How he encouraged the valour of those about him in the conquest of Debir, v. 15, &c. It seems, though Joshua had once made himself master of Debir, ch. 10. 39. yet the Canaanites had regained the possession in the absence of the army, so that the work was to be done a second time; and, when Caleb had completed the reduction of Hebron, which was for himself and his own family, to shew his zeal for the public good, as much as for his own private interest, he pushes on his conquest to Debir, and will not lay down his arms till he sees that city also effectually reduced, which lay but ten miles southward from Hebron, though he had not any particular concern in it, but the reducing of it would be to the general advantage of his tribe. Let us learn hence, not to seek and mind our own things only, but to concern and engage ourselves for the welfare of the community we are members of; we are not born for ourselves, nor must we live to ourselves.

1. Notice is taken of the name of this city. It had been called Kirjath-sepher, the city of a book, and Kirjath-sanha, v. 40. which some translate the city of learning; so the LXX, Πόλις γραμμάτων, whence some conjecture that it had been an university among the Canaanites, like Athens in Greece, in which their youth were educated; or perhaps the books of their chronicles or records on the antiquities of the nation, were laid up there; and, it may be, this was it that made Caleb so desirous to see Israel master of this city, that they might get acquainted with the ancient learning of the Canaanites.

2. The proffer that Caleb made of his daughter, and a good portion with her, to any one that would undertake to reduce that city, and to command the forces that should be employed in that service, v. 15. Thus Saul promised a daughter to him that would kill Goliath, 1 Sam. 17. 25. neither of them intending to force their daughter to marry such as they could not love, but both of them presuming upon their daughter's obedience, and submission to their father's will, though it might, perhaps, be contrary to their own humour or inclination. Caleb's family was not only honourable and wealthy, but religious; he that himself followed the Lord fully, no doubt, taught his children to do so, and therefore it could not but be a desirable match to any young gentleman. Caleb, in making the proposal, aims, (1.) To do service to his country, by the reducing of that important place: And, (2.) To marry a daughter well, to a man of learning, that would have a particular affection for the city of books, and a man of war, that would be likely to serve his country, and do worthily in his generation. Could he but marry his child to a man of such a character, he would think her well bestowed, whether the share in the lot of his tribe were more or less.

3. The place was bravely taken by Othniel, a nephew of Caleb's, whom, probably, Caleb had thoughts of when he made the proffer, v. 17. This Othniel, who thus signalized himself when he was young, long after, in his advanced years, was led by the Spirit to be both a deliverer and a judge in Israel, the first single person that presided in their affairs after Joshua's death. It is good for those who are setting out in the world to begin betimes with that which is great and good, that, excelling in service when they are young, they may excel in honour when they grow old.

4. Hereupon (all parties being agreed) Othniel married his cousin-german, Achsah, Caleb's daughter. It is probable that he had a kindness for her before, which put him upon this bold undertaking to obtain her. Love to his country, an ambition of honour, and a desire to find favour with the princes of his people, might not have engaged him in this great action, but his affection for Achsah did, that made it intolerable to him to think that any one else should do more to win her favour than he would, and so inspired him with this generous fire. Thus is love strong as death, and jealousy cruel as the grave.

5. Because the historian is now upon the dividing of the land, he gives us an account of Achsah's portion, which was in land, as more valuable, because enjoyed by virtue of the divine promise, though we may suppose the conquerors of Canaan, who had had the spoil of so many rich cities, were full of money too. (1.) Some land she obtained by Caleb's free grant, which was allowed while she married within her own tribe and family, as Zelophehad's daughters did. He gave her a south land, v. 19. Land, indeed, but a south land, dry, and apt to be parched. (2.) She obtained more upon her request; she would have had her husband to ask for a field, probably some particular field or champaign ground which belonged to Caleb's lot, and joined to that south land which he had settled upon his daughter at marriage. She thought her husband had the best interest in her father, who, no doubt, was extremely pleased with his late glorious achievement, but he thought it was more proper for her to ask, and she would be more likely to prevail; accordingly she did, submitting to her husband's judgment, though contrary to her own; and she managed the undertaking with great address. [1.] She took the opportunity when her father brought her home to the house of her husband, when the satisfaction of having disposed of his daughter so well would make him think nothing too much to do for her. [2.] She lighted off her ass, in token of respect and reverence to her father, whom she would honour still as much as before her marriage. She cried or sighed from off her ass, so the LXX; and the vulgar Latin read it, She expressed some grief and concern, that she might give her father occasion to ask her what she wanted. [3.] She calls it a blessing, because it would add much to the comfort of her settlement; and she was sure, that, since she married, not only with her father's consent, but in obedience to his command, he would not deny her his blessing. [4.] She asks only for the water, without which the ground she had would be of little use, either for tillage or pasture, but she means the field in which the springs of water were; the modesty and reasonableness of her request gave it a great advantage. Earth without water would be like a tree without sap, or the body of an animal without blood; therefore, when God gathered the waters into one place, he wisely and graciously left some in every place, that the earth might be enriched for the service of man. See Ps. 104. 10, &c. Well, Achsah gained her point; her father gave her what she asked, and perhaps more, for he gave her the upper springs and the nether springs. Two fields, so called from the springs that were in them, as we commonly distinguish between the higher field and the lower field. Those who understand it but of one field, watered both with the rain of heaven and the springs that issued out of the bowels of the earth, give countenance to the allusion we commonly make to this when we pray for spiritual and heavenly blessings, which relate to our souls, as blessings of the upper springs, and those which relate to the body and the life that now is, as blessings of the nether springs.

From this story, we learn, First, That it is no breach of the tenth commandment moderately to desire those comforts and conveniences of this life which we see attainable in a fair and regular way. Secondly, That husbands and wives should mutually advise, and jointly agree, about that which is for the common good of their family; and much more should they concur in asking of their heavenly Father the best blessings, those of the upper springs. Thirdly, That parents must never think that lost which is bestowed upon their children for their real advantage, but must be free in giving them portions as well as maintenance, especially when they are dutiful. Caleb had sons, (1 Chron. 4. 15.) and yet gave thus liberally to his daughter. Those parents forget themselves, and their relations, who grudge their children what is convenient for them, when they can conveniently part with it.

20. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Judah according to their families. 21. And the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah toward the coast of Edom southward were Kabzeel, and Eder, and Jagur, 22. And Kinab, and Dimonah, and Adadah, 23. And Kedesh, and Hazor, and Ithnan, 24. Ziph, and Telem, and Bealoth, 25. And Hazor, Hadattah, and Kerioth, and Hezron, which is Hazor, 26. Anam, and Shema, and Moladah, 27. And Hazar-gaddah, and Heshmon, and Beth-palet, 28. And Hazar-shual, and Beer-sheba, and Bizjothjah, 29. Baalah, and Iim, and Azem, 30. And Ellolad, and Chesil, and Hormah, 31. And Ziklag, and Madmannah, and Sansannah, 32. And Lebaoth, and Shilhim, and Ain, and Rimmon: all the cities are twenty and nine, with their villages: 33. And in the valley, Eshtaol, and Zoreah, and Ashual, 34. And Zanoah, and En-gannim, Tappuah, and Enam, 35. Jarmuth, and Adullam, Socoh, and Azekab, 36. And Sharaim, and Adithaim, and Gederah, and Gederothaim; fourteen cities with their villages: 37. Zenan, and Hadashah, and Migdal-gad, 38. And Dilean, and Mizpeh, and Joktheel, 39. Lachish, and Bozkath, and Eglon, 40. And Cabbon, and Lahmam, and Kithlish, 41. And Gederoth, Beth-dagon, and Naamah, and Makkedah; sixteen cities with their villages: 42. Libnah, and Ether, and Ashan. 43. And Jiphlah, and Ashnah, and Nezib, 44. And Keilah, and Achzib, and Mareshah; nine cities with their villages: 45. Ekron with her towns and her villages: 46. From Ekron even unto the sea, all that lay near Ashdod, with their villages: 47. Ashdod with her towns and her villages, Gaza with her towns and her villages, unto the river of Egypt, and the great sea, and the border thereof: 48. And in the mountains, Shamir, and Jattir, and Socoh, 49. And Dannah, and Kirjath-sannah, which is Debir, 50. And Anab, and Eshtemoth, and Anim, 51. And Goshen, and Holon, and Giloh; eleven cities with their villages: 52. Arab, and Dumah, and Eshean, 53. And Janum, and Beth-tappuah, Aphekah, 54. And Humtah, and Kirjath-arba, which is Hebron, and Zior; nine cities with their villages: 55. Maon, Carmel, and Ziph, and Juttah, 56. And Jezreel, and Jokdeam, and Zanoah, 57. Cain, Gibeah, and Timnah; ten cities with their villages: 58. Halhul, Beth-zur, and Gedor, 59. And Maarath, and Beth-anoth, and Eltekon; six cities with their villages: 60. Kirjath-baal, which is Kirjath-jearim, and Rabbah; two cities with their villages: 61. In the wilderness, Beth-arabah, Middin, and Secacah, 62. And Nibshan, and the city of Salt, and En-ge-di; six cities with their villages. 63. As for the Jebusites the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the children of Judah could not drive them out: but the Jebusites dwell with the children of Judah at Jerusalem unto this day.

We have here a list of the several cities that fell within the lot of the tribe of Judah, which are mentioned by name, that they might know their own, and both keep it, and keep to it, and might, neither through cowardice nor sloth, lose the possession of what was their own, nor, through covetousness, seek the possession of what was not their own. The cities are here named, and numbered in several classes, which they then could account for the reason of better than we can now. Here are, 1. Some that are said to be the uttermost cities toward the coast of Edom, v. 21. .32. Here are thirty-eight named, and yet said to be twenty-nine, v. 32. because nine of these were afterward transferred to the lot of Simeon, and are reckoned as belonging to that, as appears by comparing ch. 19. 2, &c. therefore those only are counted (though the rest are named) which remained to Judah.

2. Others, that are said to be in the valley, v. 33. are counted to be fourteen, yet fifteen are named; but it is probable that Gederah and Gederothaim were either two names, or two parts, of one and the same city. 3. Then sixteen are named, without any head of distinction, v. 37. .41. and nine more, v. 42. .44. 4. Then the three Philistine cities, Ekron, Ashdod, and Gaza, v. 45. .47. 5. Cities in the mountains, eleven in all, v. 48. .51. nine more, v. 52. .54. ten more, v. 55. .57. six more, v. 58, 59. then two, v. 60. and six in the wilderness, a part of the country not so thick of inhabitants as some others were.

Now here, (1.) We do not find Bethlehem, which was afterward the city of David, and was ennobled by the birth of our Lord Jesus in it. But that city, which, at the best, was but little among the thousands of Judah, Mic. 5. 2. except that it was thus dignified, was now so little as not to be accounted one of the cities, but perhaps was one of the villages not named. Christ came to give honour to the places he was related to, not to receive honour from them. (2.) Jerusalem is said to continue in the hands of the Jebusites, v. 63. for the children of Judah could not drive them out, through their sluggishness, stupidity, and unbelief; had they attempted it with vigour and resolution, we have reason to think God would not have been wanting to them to give them success; but they could not do it, because they would not. Jerusalem was afterward to be the holy city, the royal city, the city of the Great King, the brightest ornament of all the land of Israel; God had designed it should be so. It may, therefore, be justly looked upon as a punishment of their neglect to conquer other cities which God had given them, that they were so long kept out of this.

Among the cities of Judah, (in all one hundred and fourteen,) we meet with Libnah, which, in Joram's days, revolted, and probably set up for a free independent state, 2 Kings, 8. 22. and Lachish, where king Amaziah was slain, 2 Kings, 14. 19. it led the dance in idolatry, Mic. 1. 13. it was the beginning of sin to the daughter of Sion. Giloh, Ahithophel's town, is here mentioned, and Tekoa, of which the prophet Amos was, and near which Jehoshaphat obtained that glorious victory, 2 Chron. 20. 20, &c. and Maresha, where Asa was a conqueror. Many of the cities of this tribe occur in the history of David's troubles. Adullam, Ziph, Kellah, Maon, En-ge-di, Ziklag, were places here reckoned in this tribe, near which David had most of his haunts; for though sometimes Saul drove him out from the inheritance of the Lord, yet he kept as close to it as he could. The wilderness of Judah he frequented much, and in it John Baptist preached, and there the kingdom of heaven commenced, Matth. 3. 1. The riches of this country, no doubt, answered Jacob's blessing of this tribe, that he should wash his garments in wine, Gen. 49. 11. And, in general, Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren should praise, not envy.

CHAP. XVI.

It is pity that this and the following chapter should be separated, for both of them give us the lot of the children of Joseph, Ephraim, and Manasseh, who, next to Judah, were to have the post of honour, and therefore had the first and best portion in the northern part of Canaan, as Judah now had in the southern part. In this chapter, we have, I. A general account of the lot of these two tribes together, v. 1. .4. II. The borders of the lot of Ephraim in particular, v. 5. .10. That of Manasseh following in the next chapter.

1. AND the lot of the children of Joseph fell from Jordan by Jericho, unto the water of Jericho on the east, to the wilderness that goeth up from Jericho throughout mount Beth-el, 2. And goeth out from Beth-el to Luz, and passeth along unto the borders of Archi to Ataroth, 3. And goeth down westward to the coast of Japhleti, unto the coast of Beth-horon the nether, and to Gezer: and the goings out thereof are at the sea. 4. So the children of Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim, took their inheritance.

Though Joseph was one of the younger sons of Jacob, yet he was his eldest by his most just and best beloved wife, Rachel; was himself his best beloved son, and had been the greatest ornament and support of his family, kept it from perishing in a time of famine, and had been the shepherd and stone of Israel, and therefore his posterity were very much favoured by the lot. Their portion lay in the very heart of the land of Canaan. It extended from Jordan in the east, v. 1. to the sea, the Mediterranean sea, in the west, so that it took up the whole breadth of Canaan from side to side; and, no question, the fruitfulness of the soil answered the blessings both of Jacob and Moses, Gen. 49. 25, 26. and Deut. 33. 13, &c.

The portions allotted to Ephraim and Manasseh are not so particularly described as those of the others tribes; we have only the limits and boundaries of them, not the particular cities in them, as before we had the cities of Judah, and afterward those of the other tribes. For which no reason can be assigned, unless we may suppose that Joshua, being himself of the children of Joseph, they referred it to him alone to distribute among them the several cities that lay within their lot, and therefore did not bring in the names of their cities to the great council of their princes which sat upon this affair; by which means it came to pass that they were not inserted with the rest in the books.

5. And the border of the children of Ephraim according to their families was thus: even the border of their inheritance on the east side was Ataroth-addar, unto Beth-horon the upper; 6. And the border went out toward the sea to Michmethah on the north side; and the border went about eastward unto Taanath-shiloh, and passed by it on the east to Janohah; 7. And it went down from Janohah to Ataroth, and to Naarath, and came to Jericho, and went out at Jordan. 8. The border went out from Tappuah westward unto the river Kanah; and the goings out thereof were at the sea. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Ephraim by their families. 9. And the separate cities for the children of Ephraim were among the inheritance of the children of Manasseh, all the cities with their villages. 10. And they drove not out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer: but the Canaanites dwell among the Ephraimites unto this day, and serve under tribute.

Here,

1. The border of the lot of Ephraim is set down, by which it was divided on the south from Benjamin and Dan, who lay between it and Judah, and on the north from Manasseh; for east and west it reached from Jordan to the great sea. The learned, who aim to be exact in drawing the line according to the directions here, find themselves very much at a loss, the description here being short and intricate. The report of those who in these latter ages have travelled those countries will not serve to clear the difficulties, so vastly unlike is it now to what it was then; not only cities have been so destroyed, as that no mark or footstep of them remains, but brooks are dried up, rivers alter their courses, and even the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place, Job, 14. 18. Unless I could hope to solve the doubts that arise upon this draught of the border of Ephraim, it is to no purpose to mention them: no doubt, they were then perfectly understood, so as that the first intention of recording them was effectually answered, which was to notify the ancient landmarks, which posterity must by no means remove.

2. Some separate cities are spoken of, that lay not within these borders, at least, not if the line were drawn direct, but lay within the lot of Manasseh, v. 9. which might better be read, and there were separate cities for the children of Ephraim, among the inheritance of the children of Manasseh; because it proved that Manasseh could spare them, and Ephraim had need of them, and it might be hoped that no inconvenience would arise from this mixture of these two tribes together, who were both the sons of Joseph, and should love as brethren. And by this it appears, that though, when the tribes were numbered in the plains of Moab, Manasseh had got the start of Ephraim in number, for Manasseh was then fifty-two thousand, and Ephraim but thirty-two thousand, Numb. 26. 34, 37. yet, by the time they were well settled in Canaan, the hands were crossed again, and the blessing of Moses was verified, Deut. 33. 17. They are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh. Families and kingdoms are diminished and increased, increased and diminished again, as God pleases.

3. A brand is put upon the Ephraimites, that they did not drive out the Canaanites from Gezer, v. 10. Either through carelessness or cowardice, either for want of faith in the promise of God, that he would give them success if they would make a vigorous effort, or for want of zeal for the command of God, which obliged them utterly to drive out the Canaanites, and to make no peace with them. And though they hoped to satisfy the law by putting them under tribute, yet (as Calvin thinks) that made the matter worse, for it shews that they spared them out of covetousness, that they might be profited by their labours, and by dealing with them for their tribute they were in danger of being infected with their idolatry; yet some think, when they brought them under tribute, they obliged them to renounce their idols, and to observe the seven precepts of the sons of Noah; and I should think so, but that we find, in the sequel of the story, that the Israelites were so far from restraining idolatry in others, that they soon fell into it themselves.

Many famous places were within this lot of the tribe of Ephraim, though not mentioned here. In it were Ramah, Samuel's city, called, in the New Testament, Arimathea, of which Joseph was, that took care of our Saviour's burial, and Shiloh, where the tabernacle was first set up. Tirzah, also, the royal-city of Jeroboam and his successors, and Deborah's palm-tree, under which she judged Israel, were in this tribe. Samaria, built by Omri, after the burning of the royal palace of Tirzah, was in this tribe, and was long the royal city of the kingdom of the ten tribes; not far from it were Shechem, and the mountains Ebal and Gerizim, and Sychar, near which was Jacob's well, where Christ talked with the woman of Samaria. We read much of mount Ephraim in the story of the Judges, and of a city called Ephraim, it is probable in this tribe, to which Christ retired, John, 11. 54. The whole kingdom of the ten tribes is often in the prophets, especially in Hosea, called Ephraim.

CHAP. XVII.

The half-tribe of Manasseh comes next to be provided for; and here we have, I. The families of that tribe that were to be portioned, v. 1. . 6. II. The country that fell to their lot, v. 7. . 13. III. The joint request of the two tribes that descended from Joseph, for the enlargement of their lot, and Joshua's answer to that request, v. 14. . 18.

1. THERE was also a lot for the tribe of Manasseh; for he was the first-born of Joseph; to wit, for Machir the first-born of Manasseh, the father of Gilead: because he was a man of war, therefore he had Gilead and Bashan.

2. There was also a lot for the rest of the children of Manasseh by their families; for the children of Abiezer, and for the children of Helek, and for the children of Azriel, and for the children of Shechem, and for the children of Hopher, and for the children of Shemida: these were the male children of Manasseh the son of Joseph by their families. 3. But Zelophehad, the son of Hopher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had no sons, but daughters: and these are the names of his daughters, Mahlah, and Noah, Hoglah, Mileah, and Tirzah. 4. And they came near before Eleazar the priest, and before Joshua the son of Nun, and before the princes, saying, The LORD commanded Moses to give us an inheritance among our brethren. Therefore according to the commandment of the LORD he gave them an inheritance among the brethren of their father. 5. And there fell ten portions to Manasseh, beside the land of Gilead and Bashan, which were on the other side Jordan; 6. Because the daughters of Manasseh had an inheritance among his sons: and the rest of Manasseh's sons had the land of Gilead.

Manasseh was itself but one half of the tribe of Joseph, and yet was divided and subdivided.

1. It was divided into two parts, one already settled on the other side Jordan, consisting of those who were the posterity of Machir, v. 1. This Machir was born to Manasseh in Egypt, there he had signalized himself as a man of war, probably in the contests between the Ephraimites and the men of Gath, 1 Chron. 7. 21. His warlike disposition descended to his posterity, and therefore Moses gave them Gilead and Bashan, on the other side Jordan, of which before, ch. 13. 31. It is here said, that the lot came to Manasseh, for he was the first-born of Joseph. Bishop Patrick thinks it should be translated, though he was the first-born of Joseph, and then the meaning is plain, that the second lot was for Manasseh, because though he was the first-born, yet Jacob had preferred Ephraim before him. See the names of those heads of families that settled on the other side Jordan, 1 Chron. 5. 24.

2. That part on this side Jordan was subdivided into ten families, v. 5. There were six sons of Gilead here named, (v. 2.) the same that are recorded Numb. 26. 30—32. only that he who is there called Jezeer, is here called Abiezer; five of these sons had each of them their portion, the sixth, which was Hopher, had his male line cut off in his son Zelophehad, who left daughters only, five in number, of whom we have often read, and these five had each of them a portion; though perhaps they claiming under Hopher, all their five portions were but equal to one of the portions of the five sons. Or if Hopher had other sons beside Zelophehad, in whom the name of his family was kept up, their posterity married to the daughters of Zelophehad the elder brother, and in their right had these portions assigned them. See Numb. 36. 12.

Here is, (1.) The claim which the daughters of Zelophehad made, grounded upon the command God gave to Moses concerning them, v. 4. They had themselves, when they were young, pleaded their own cause before Moses, and obtained the grant of an inheritance with their brethren, and now they would not lose the benefit of that grant for want of speaking to Joshua, but seasonably put in their demand themselves, as it should seem, and not their husbands for them. (2.) The assignment of their portions according to their claim; Joshua knew very well what God had ordered in their case, and did not object, that they having not served in the wars of Canaan, there was no reason why they should share in the possessions of Canaan, but readily gave them an inheritance among the brethren of their father. And now they reaped the benefit of their own pious zeal and prudent forecast in this matter. Thus they who take care in the wilderness of this world, to make sure to themselves a place in the inheritance of the saints in light, will certainly have the comfort of it in the other world, while those that neglect it now, will lose it for ever.

7. And the coast of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethah, that lieth before Shechem; and the border went along on the right hand unto the inhabitants of Entappuah. 8. Now Manasseh had the land of Tappuah: but Tappuah on the border of Manasseh belonged to the children of Ephraim; 9. And the coast descended unto the river Kanah, southward of the river: these cities of Ephraim are among the cities of Manasseh: the coast of Manasseh also was on the north side of the river, and the outgoings of it were at the sea: 10. Southward it was Ephraim's, and northward it was Manasseh's, and the sea is his border; and they met together in Asher on the north, and in Issachar on the east. 11. And Manasseh had in Issachar and in Asher Beth-shean and her towns, and Ibleam and her towns, and the inhabitants of Dor and her towns, and the inhabitants of Eu-dor and her towns, and the inhabitants of Taanach and her towns, and the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns, even three countries. 12. Yet the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of those cities; but the Canaanites would dwell in that land. 13. Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out.

We have here a short account of the lot of this half-tribe. It reached from Jordan on the east, to the great sea on the west, on the south it lay all along contiguous to Ephraim, but on the north it abutted upon Asher and Issachar; Asher lay north-west, and Issachar north-east, which seems to be the meaning of that, (v. 10.) that they (that is, Manasseh and Ephraim, as related to it, both together making the tribe of Joseph) met in Asher on the north, and Issachar on the east, for Ephraim itself reached not those tribes.

Some things are particularly observed concerning this lot:

1. That there was a great communication between this tribe and that of Ephraim. The city of Tappuah belonged to Ephraim, but the country adjoining, to Manasseh; (v. 8.) there were likewise many cities of Ephraim that lay within the border of Manasseh, (v. 9.) of which before, ch. 16. 9.

2. That Manasseh likewise had cities with their appertinences in the tribes of Issachar and Asher, v. 11. God so ordering it, that though each tribe had its peculiar inheritance, which might not be alienated from it, yet they should thus intermix one with another, to keep up mutual acquaintance and correspondence between the tribes, and to give occasion for the doing of good offices one to another, as became those, who, though of different tribes, were all one Israel, and were bound to love as brethren.

3. That they suffered the Canaanites to live among them, contrary to the command of God, serving their own ends by conniving at them, for they made them tributaries, v. 12, 13. The Ephraimites had done the same, ch. 16. 10. and from them perhaps the Manassites learned it, and with their example excused themselves in it.

The most remarkable person of this half-tribe, in after-time, was Gideon, whose great actions were done within this lot. He was of the family of Abiezer; Cesarea was in this lot, and Antipatris, famed in the latter ages of the Jewish state.

14. And the children of Joseph spake unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as the LORD hath blessed me hitherto? 15. And Joshua answered them, If thou be a great people, then get thee up to the wood-country, and cut down for thyself there in the land of the Perizzites and of the giants, if mount Ephraim be too narrow for thee. 16. And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us: and all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of Bethshean and her towns, and they who are of the valley of Jezreel. 17. And Joshua spake unto the house of Joseph, even to Ephraim and to Manasseh, saying, Thou art a great people, and hast great power: thou shalt not have one lot only: 18. But the mountain shall be thine; for it is a wood, and thou shalt cut it down: and the outgoings of it shall be thine: for thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong.

Here,

I. The children of Joseph quarrel with their lot; if they had had any just cause to quarrel with it, we have reason to think Joshua would have relieved them, by adding to it, or altering it, which it does not appear he did. It is probable, because Joshua was himself of the tribe of Ephraim, they promised themselves that they should have some particular favour shewed them, and should not be confined to the decision of the lot so closely as the other tribes; but Joshua makes them know, that, in the discharge of his office, as a public person, he had no more regard to his own tribe than to any other, but would administer impartially, without favour or affection; wherein he has left an excellent example to all in public trusts. It was a very competent provision that was made for them, as much, for aught that appears, as they were able to manage, and yet they call it in disdain but one lot, as if that which was assigned to them both was scarcely sufficient for one. The word for complainers (Jude, 16.) is μεμψιμοιροι, blamers of their lot, like the children of Joseph, who would have that altered, the disposal whereof is from the Lord. Two things they suggest, to enforce their petition for an augmentation of their lot. 1. That they were very numerous, through the blessing of God upon them, v. 14. I am a great people, for the Lord has blessed me; and we have reason to hope that he that hath sent mouths, will send meat. "I am a great people, and in so small a lot shall not have room to thrive." Yet, observe, when they speak thankfully of their present increase, they do not speak confidently of the continuance of it; "The Lord has blessed me hitherto, however he may see fit to deal with me for the future." The uncertainty of what may be, must not make us unthankful for what has been, and is, done in kindness to us. 2. That a good part of that country, which was now fallen to their lot, was in the hands of the Canaanites, and that they were formidable enemies, who brought into the field of battle chariots of iron, v. 16. that is, chariots with long scythes fastened to the sides of them, or the axle-tree, which made great destruction of all that came in their way, mowing them down like corn. They urge, that though they had a good portion assigned them, yet it was in bad hands, and they could not come to the possession of it, wishing to have their lot in those countries that were more thoroughly reduced than this was.

II. Joshua endeavours to reconcile them to their lot, he owns they were a great people, and, being two tribes, ought to have more than one lot only, v. 17. but tells them, that what was fallen to their share would be a sufficient lot for them both, if they would but work and fight. They desired a lot in which they might indulge themselves in ease and luxury; "No," says Joshua, "you must not count upon that; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, is a sentence in force, even in Canaan itself." He retorts their own argument, that they were a great people, "If so, you are the better able to help yourselves, and have the less reason to expect help from others. If thou hast many mouths to be filled, thou hast twice as many hands to be employed; earn, and then eat."

1. He bids them work for more, v. 15. "Get thee up to the wood-country, which is within thy own border, and let all hands be set on work to cut down the trees, rid the rough lands, and make them, with art and industry, good arable ground. Note, Many wish for larger possessions, who do not cultivate and make the best of what they have, think they should have more talents given them, who do not trade with those with which they are intrusted. Most people's poverty is the effect of their idleness; would they dig, they need not beg.

2. He bids them fight for more, v. 17, 18. when they pleaded that they could not come at the wood-lands he spoke of, because, in the valley between them and it, there were Canaanites whom they durst not enter the lists with. "Never fear them," said Joshua, "thou hast God on thy side, and thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, if thou wilt set about it in good earnest, though they have iron chariots." We straiten ourselves by apprehending the difficulties in the way of our enlargement to be greater than really they are. What can be insuperable to faith and holy resolution?

CHAP. XVIII.

In this chapter we have, I. The setting up of the tabernacle at Shiloh, v. 1. II. The stirring up of the seven tribes that were yet unsettled, to look after their lot, and the putting of them in a method for it, by Joshua, v. 2. 7. III. The distributing of the land into seven lots, by certain men employed for that purpose, v. 8, 9. IV. The determining of these seven portions to the seven tribes yet unprovided for by lot, v. 10. V. The particular lot of the tribe of Benjamin, the borders of it, v. 11. 20. And the cities contained in it, v. 21. 28. The other six tribes we shall find well provided for in the next chapter.

1. AND the whole congregation of the children of Israel: assembled together at Shiloh, and set up the tabernacle of the congregation there. And the land was subdued before them.

In the midst of the story of the dividing of the land, comes in this account of the setting up the tabernacle, which had hitherto continued in its old place in the centre of their camp; but now that three of the four squadrons, that used to surround it in the wilderness, were broken and diminished, those of Judah, Ephraim, and Reuben, by the removal of those tribes to their respective possessions, and that of Dan only remained entire, it was time to think of removing the tabernacle itself into a city. Many a time the priests and Levites had taken it down, carried it, and set it up again in the wilderness, according to the directions given them, Numb. 4. 5, &c. but now they must do it for good and all, not one of the stakes thereof must any more be removed, nor any of the cords thereof broken, Isa. 33. 20. Observe.

1. The place to which the tabernacle was removed, and in which it was set up. It was Shiloh, a city in the lot of Ephraim, but lying close upon the lot of Benjamin. Doubtless, God himself did some way or other direct them to this place, for he had promised to choose the place where he would make his name to dwell, Deut. 12. 11. It is most probable, God made known his mind in this matter by the judgment of Urim. This place was pitched upon, (1.) Because it was in the heart of the country, nearer the centre than Jerusalem was, and therefore the more convenient for the meeting of all Israel there from the several parts of the country; it had been in the midst of their camp in the wilderness, and therefore must now be in the midst of their nation, as that which sanctified the whole, and was the glory in the midst of them. See Ps. 46. 5. (2.) Because it was in the lot of that tribe of which Joshua was, who was now their chief magistrate, and it would be both for his honour and convenience, and for the advantage of the country, to have it near him. The testimony of Israel and the thrones of judgment do well together, Ps. 122. 4, 5. (3.) Some think there was an eye to the name of the place, Shiloh being the name by which the Messiah was known, in dying Jacob's prophecy, Gen. 49. 10. which prophecy, no doubt, was well known among the Jews; the setting up of the tabernacle in Shiloh gave them a hint, that in that Shiloh, whom Jacob spoke of, all the ordinances of this worldly sanctuary should have their accomplishment in a greater and more perfect tabernacle, Heb. 9. 1, 11. And Dr. Lightfoot thinks that the place where the tabernacle was set up was therefore called Shiloh, because of the peaceableness of the land at this time; as afterward in Salem was his temple, which also signifies peaceable.

2. The solemn manner of doing it. The whole congregation assembled together to attend the solemnity, to do honour to the ark of God, as the token of his presence, and to bid it welcome to its settlement. Every Israelite was interested in it, and therefore all testified their joy and satisfaction upon this occasion. See 2 Sam. 6. 15. It is probable, those tribes that were yet encamped when the tabernacle was removed to Shiloh, decamped from Gilgal, and pitched about Shiloh, for every Israelite will desire to fix there where God's tabernacle fixes. Mention is made, on this occasion, of the land's being subdued before them, to intimate, that the country, hereabouts at least, being thoroughly reduced, they met with no opposition, nor were they apprehensive of any danger, but thought it time to make this grateful acknowledgment of God's goodness to them in the constant series of successes with which he had blessed them. It was a good presage of a comfortable settlement to themselves in Canaan, when their first care was to see the ark well settled, as soon as they had a safe place ready to settle it in. Here the ark continued about three hundred years, till the sins of Eli's house forfeited the ark, lost it, and ruined Shiloh, and its ruins were long after made use of as warnings to Jerusalem; Go, see what I did to Shiloh, Jer. 7. 12. Ps. 78. 60.

2. And there remained among the children of Israel seven tribes, which had not yet received their inheritance. 3. And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, How long are ye slack to go to possess the land, which the LORD God of your fathers hath given you? 4. Give out from among you three men for each tribe: and I will send them, and they shall rise, and go through the land, and describe it according to the inheritance of them; and they shall come again to me. 5. And they shall divide it into seven parts: Judah shall abide in their coast on the south, and the house of Joseph shall abide in their coasts on the north. 6. Ye shall therefore describe the land into seven parts, and bring the description hither to me, that I may cast lots for you here before the LORD our God. 7. But the Levites have no part among you; for the priesthood of the LORD is their inheritance: and Gad, and Reuben, and half the tribe of Manasseh, have received their inheritance beyond Jordan on the east, which Moses the servant of the LORD gave them. 8. And the men arose, and went away: and Joshua charged them that went to describe the land, saying, Go and walk through the land, and describe it, and come again to me, that I may here cast lots for you before the LORD in Shiloh. 9. And the men went and passed through the land, and described it by cities into seven parts in a book, and came again to Joshua to the host at Shiloh. 10. And Joshua cast lots for them in Shiloh before the LORD: and there Joshua divided the land unto the children of Israel according to their divisions.

Here,

1. Joshua reproves those tribes which were yet unsettled, that they did not bestir themselves to gain a settlement in the land which God had given them. Seven tribes were yet unprovided for: though sure of an inheritance, yet uncertain where it should be, and, it seems, in no great care about it, v. 2. and with them Joshua reasons, v. 3. How long are ye slack? 1. They were too well pleased with their present condition, liked well enough to live in a body together, the more the merrier, and, like the Babel-builders, had no mind to be scattered abroad, and break good company. The spoil of the cities they had taken served them to live plentifully upon for the present, and they banished the thoughts of time to come. Perhaps, the tribes of Judah and Joseph, who had already received their inheritance in the countries next adjoining, were generous in entertaining their brethren, who were yet unprovided for, so that they went from one good house to another among their friends, with which, instead of grudging that they were postponed, they were so well pleased, that they cared not of going to houses of their own. 2. They were slothful and dilatory; it may be, they wished the thing done, but had not spirit to stir in it, or move toward the doing of it, though it was so much for their own advantage; like the sluggard that hides his hand in his bosom, and it grieves him to bring it to his mouth again. The countries that remained to be divided lay at a distance, and some parts of them in the hands of the Canaanites. If they go to take possession of them, the cities must be rebuilt or repaired, they must drive their flocks and herds a great way, and carry their wives and children to strange places, and this will not be done without care and pains, and breaking through some hardships; thus, He that observes the wind shall not sow; and he that regards the clouds shall not reap, Eccl. 11. 4. Note, Many are diverted from real duties, and debarred from real comforts, by seeming difficulties. God by his grace has given us a title to a good land, the heavenly Canaan, but we are slack to take possession, we enter not into that rest, as we might, by faith, and hope, and holy joy; we live not in heaven, as we might, by setting our affection on things above, and having our conversation there. How long shall it be thus with us? How long shall we thus stand in our own light, and forsake our own mercies for lying vanities? Joshua was sensible of the inconveniencies of this delay, that while they neglected to take possession of the land that was conquered, the Canaanites were recovering strength and spirit, and fortifying themselves in the places that were yet in their hands, which would make the total expulsion of them the more difficult. They would lose their advantages by not following their blow; and therefore as an eagle stirreth up her nest, so Joshua stirs them up to take possession of their lot. He is ready to do his part, if they will but do theirs.

II. He puts them in a way to settle themselves. 1. The land that remained must be surveyed, an account taken of the cities and the territories belonging to them, v. 4. These must be divided into seven equal parts, as near as they could guess at their true value, which they must have an eye to, and not only to the number of the cities, and extent of the country. Judah is fixed on the south, and Joseph on the north, of Shiloh, to protect the tabernacle, v. 5. and therefore they need not describe their country, but those countries only that were yet undisposed of. He gives a reason, v. 7. why they must divide it into seven parts only, because the Levites were to have no temporal estate, (as we say,) but their benefices only, which were entailed upon their families. The priesthood of the Lord is their inheritance, and a very honourable, comfortable, plentiful inheritance it was. Gad and Reuben, with half of the tribe of Manasseh, were already fixed, and needed not to have any further care taken of them. Now, (1.) The surveyors were three men out of each of the seven tribes that were to be provided for, v. 4. one-and-twenty in all, who, perhaps, for greater expedition, because they had already lost time, divided themselves into three companies, one of each tribe in each company, and took each their district to survey. The matter was thus referred equally, that there might be neither any partiality used in making up the seven lots, nor any umbrage or suspicion given, but all might be satisfied that they had right done them. (2.) The survey was accordingly made, and brought in to Joshua, v. 8, 9. Josephus says it was seven months in the doing. And we must in it observe, [1.] The faith and courage of the persons employed, abundance of Canaanites remained in the land, and all raging against Israel, as a bear robbed of her whelps, the business of the surveyors would soon be known, and what could they expect but to be waylaid, and have their brains knocked out by the fierce observers? But, in obedience to Joshua's command, and, in dependence upon God's power, they thus put their lives in their hands to serve their country. [2.] The good providence of God in protecting them from the many deaths they were exposed to, and bringing them all safe again to the host at Shiloh. When we are in the way of our duty, we are under the special protection of the Almighty.

2. When it was surveyed, and reduced to seven lots, then Joshua would, by appeal to God, and direction from him, determine which of these lots should belong to each tribe, v. 6. That I may cast lots for you here at the tabernacle (because it was a sacred transaction) before the Lord our God, to whom each tribe must have an eye, with thankfulness for the conveniencies, and submission to the inconveniencies, of their allotment. What we have in the world, we must acknowledge God's property in, and dispose of it as before him, with justice and charity, and dependence upon Providence. The heavenly Canaan is described to us in a book, the book of the scriptures, and there are in it mansions and portions sufficient for all God's spiritual Israel; Christ is our Joshua that divides it to us, on him we must attend, and to him we must apply ourselves, for an inheritance with the saints in light. See John, 17, 2, 3.

11. And the lot of the tribe of the children of Benjamin came up according to their families: and the coast of their lot came forth between the children of Judah and the children of Joseph. 12. And their border on the north side was from Jordan; and the border went up to the side of Jericho on the north side, and went up through the mountains westward; and the goings out thereof were at the wilderness of Beth-aven. 13. And the border went over from thence toward Luz, to the side of Luz, which is Beth-el, southward; and the border descended to Ataroth-adar, near the hill that lieth on the south side of the nether Beth-horon. 14. And the border was drawn thence, and compassed the corner of the sea southward, from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon southward; and the goings out thereof were at Kirjath-haal, which is Kirjath-jearim, a city of the children of Judah: this was the west quarter. 15. And the south quarter was from the end of Kirjath-jearim, and the border went out on the west, and went out to the well of waters of Nephtoah: 16. And the border came down to the end of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of Hinnom, and which is in the valley of the giants on the north, and descended to the valley of Hinnom, to the side of Jebusi on the south, and descended to En-rogel, 17. And was drawn from the north, and went forth to En-shemesh, and went forth toward Geliloth, which is over against the going up of Adummin, and descended to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben. 18. And passed along toward the side over against Arabah northward, and went down unto Arabah: 19. And the border passed along to the side of Beth-hoglah northward: and the outgoings of the border were at the north bay of the salt sea at the south end of Jordan: this was the south coast. 20. And Jordan was the border of it on the east side. This was the inheritance of the children of Benjamin, by the coasts thereof round about, according to their families. 21. Now the cities of the tribe of the children of Benjamin according to their families were Jericho, and Beth-hoglah, and the valley of Keziz. 22. And Beth-arabah, and Zemaraim, and Beth-el, 23. And Avim, and Parah, and Ophrah, 24. And Chephar-haammonai, and Ophni, and Gaba; twelve cities with their villages: 25. Gibeon, and Ramah, and Beeroth, 26. And Mizpeh, and Chephirah, and Mozah, 27. And Rekem, and Irpeel, and Taralah, 28. And Zelah, Eleph, and Jebusi, which is Jerusalem, Gibeath, and Kirjath: fourteen cities with their villages. This is the inheritance of the children of Benjamin according to their families.

We have here the lot of the tribe of Benjamin, which Providence cast next to Joseph on the one hand, because Benjamin was own and only brother to Joseph, and was little Benjamin, Ps. 68. 27. that needed the protection of great Joseph, and yet had a better Protector, for the Lord shall cover him all the day long, Deut. 33. 12. And next to Judah, on the other hand, that this tribe might hereafter unite with Judah in an adherence to the throne of David, and the temple at Jerusalem. Here we have,

1. The exact borders and limits of this tribe, which we need not be exact in the explication of; as it had Judah on the south, and Joseph on the north, so it had Jordan on the east, and Dan on the west. The western border is said to compass the corner of the sea southward, v. 14. whereas no part of the lot of this tribe came near to the great sea. Bishop Patrick thinks the meaning is, that it ran along in a parallel line to the great sea, though at a distance. Dr. Fuller suggests, that, since it is not called the great sea, but only the sea, which often signifies any lake or mere, it may be meant of the pool of Gibeon, which may be called a corner or canton of a sea; it is called the great waters in Gibeon, (Jer. 41. 12.) and it is compassed by the western border of this tribe.

2. The particular cities in this tribe, not all, but the most considerable, twenty-six, are here named. Jericho is put first, though dismantled, and forbidden to be rebuilt as a city with gates and walls, because it might be built and inhabited as a country-village, and so was not useless to this tribe. Gilgal was in this tribe, where Israel first encamped when Saul was made king, 1 Sam. 11. 14. It was afterward a very profane place, (Hos. 9. 15.) All their wickedness is in Gilgal. Bethel was in this tribe a famous place; though Benjamin adhered to the house of David, yet Bethel, it seems, was in the possession of the house of Joseph, (Judg. 1. 23—25.) and there Jeroboam set up one of his calves. Gibeon was in this tribe, where the altar was in the beginning of Solomon's time, 2 Chron. 1. 3. Gibeah likewise, that infamous place, where the Levite's concubine was abused; Mizpeh, and near it, Samuel's Ebenezer; Anathoth also, Jeremiah's city, were in this tribe, as was the northern part of Jerusalem. Paul was the honour of this tribe, (Rom. 11. 1. Phil. 3. 5.) but where his land lay, we know not, he sought the better country.

CHAP. XIX.

In the description of the lots of Judah and Benjamin, we have an account both of the borders that surrounded them, and of the cities contained in them. In that of Ephraim and Manasseh we have the borders, but not the cities; in this chapter, Simeon and Dan are described by their cities only, and not their borders, because they lay very much within Judah, especially the former, the rest have both their borders described, and their cities named, especially frontiers. Here is, I. The lot of Simeon, v. 1—9. II. Of Zebulun, v. 10—16. III. Of Issachar, v. 17—23. IV. Of Asher, v. 24—31. V. Of Naphtali, v. 32—39. VI. Of Dan, v. 40—48. Lastly, The inheritance assigned to Joshua himself and his own family, v. 49—51.

1. AND the second lot came forth to Simeon, even for the tribe of the children of Simeon according to their families: and their inheritance was within the inheritance of the children of Judah. 2. And they had in their inheritance Beersheba, and Sheba, and Moladah, 3. And Hazarshual, and Balah, and Azem, 4. And Eltolad, and Bethul, and Hormah, 5. And Ziklag, and Beth-markaboth, and Hasarsusah, 6. And Bethlebaoth, and Sharubhen: thirteen cities and their villages: 7. Ain, Remmon, and Ether, and Ashan, four cities and their villages: 8. And all the villages that were round about these cities to Baalathbeer, Ramath of the south. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Simeon according to their families. 9. Out of the portion of the children of Judah was the inheritance of the children of Simeon: for the part of the children of Judah was too much for them: therefore the children of Simeon had their inheritance within the inheritance of them.

Simeon's lot was drawn after Judah's, Joseph's, and Benjamin's, because Jacob had put that tribe under disgrace, yet it is put before the two younger sons of Leah and the three sons of the handmaids. Not one person of note, either judge or prophet, was of this tribe, that we know of.

1. The situation of their lot was within that of Judah, (v. 1.) and was taken from it, v. 9. It seems, they that first surveyed the land, thought it larger than it was, and that it would have held out, to give every tribe in proportion as large a share as they had carved out for Judah; but, upon a more strict inquiry, it was found that it would not reach, (v. 9.) the part of the children of Judah was too much for them, more than they needed, and more, as it proved, than fell to their share. Yet God did not by the lot lessen it, but left it to their prudence and care afterward to discover and rectify the mistake, which when they did, (1.) The men of Judah did not oppose the taking away of the cities again, which by the first distribution fell within their border, when they were convinced that they had more than their proportion. In all such cases errors must be excepted, and a review admitted if there be occasion. Though, in strictness, what fell to their lot, was their right against all the world, yet they would not insist upon it, when it appeared that another tribe would want what they had to spare. Note, We must look on the things of others, and not on our own only. The abundance of some must supply the wants of others, that there may be something of an equality, for which there may be equity, where there is not law. (2.) That which was thus taken off from Judah to be put into a new lot, Providence directed to the tribe of Simeon, that Jacob's prophecy concerning this tribe might be fulfilled, I will divide them in Jacob. The cities of Simeon were scattered in Judah, with which tribe they were surrounded, except on that side toward the sea. This brought them into a confederacy with the tribe of Judah, (Judg. 1. 3.) and afterward was a happy occasion of the adherence of many of this tribe to the house of David, at the time of the revolt of the ten tribes to Jeroboam, (2 Chron. 15. 9.) out of Simeon they fell to Asa in abundance. It is good being in a good neighbourhood.

2. The cities within their lot are here named. Beersheba, or Sheba, for they seem to be the same place, is put first, Ziklag is one of them which we read of in David's story. What course they took to enlarge their borders and make room for themselves, we find 1 Chron. 4. 39, &c.

10. And the third lot came up for the children of Zebulun according to their families: and the border of their inheritance was unto Sarid: 11. And their border went up toward the sea, and Maralah, and reached Dabbasheth, and reached to the river that is before Jokneam; 12. And turned from Sarid eastward toward the sun-rising, unto the border of Chisloth-tabor, and then goeth out to Daberath, and goeth out to Japhta, 13. And from thence passeth on along on the east to Gittah-hepher, to Ittah-kazin, and goeth out to Remmon-methoar to Neah; 14. And the border compasseth it on the north side to Hannathon: and the out-goings thereof are in the valley of Jiphthah-el: 15. And Kattath, and Naballah, and Shimron, and Idalah, and Bethlehem: twelve cities with their villages. 16. This is the inheritance of the children of Zebulun according to their families, these cities with their villages.

This is the lot of Zebulun, who, though born of Leah after Issachar, yet was blessed by Jacob and Moses before him; and therefore it was so ordered, that his lot was drawn before that of Issachar's, north of which it lay, and south of Asher.

1. The lot of this tribe was washed by the great sea on the west, and by the sea of Tiberias on the east, answering Jacob's prophecy, (Gen. 49. 13.) Zebulun shall be a haven of ships, trading ships on the great sea, and fishing ships on the sea of Galilee.

2. Though there were some places in this tribe which were made famous in the Old Testament, especially mount Carmel, on which the famous trial was between God and Baal in Elijah's time, yet it was made much more illustrious in the New Testament, for within the lot of this tribe was Nazareth, where our blessed Saviour spent so much of his time on earth, and from which he was called Jesus of Nazareth, and mount Tabor, on which he was transfigured, and that coast of the sea of Galilee on which Christ preached so many sermons, and wrought so many miracles.

17. And the fourth lot came out to Issachar, for the children of Issachar according to their families. 18. And their border was toward Jezreel, and Chesulloth, and Shunem, 19. And Haphraim, and Shibon, and Anaharath, 20. And Rabbith, and Kishion, and Abez, 21. And Remeth, and En-gannim, and En-haddah, and Beth-pazzez; 22. And the coast reacheth to Tabor, and Shalazimah, and Beth-shemesh; and the outgoings of their border were at Jordan: sixteen cities with their villages. 23. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Issachar according to their families, the cities and their villages.

The lot of Issachar ran from Jordan in the east, to the great sea in the west, Manasseh on the south, and Zebulun on the north. A numerous tribe, Numb. 26. 25. Tola, one of the judges, was of this tribe, Judg. 10. 1. So was Baasha, one of the kings of Israel, 1 Kings, 15. 27. The most considerable places in this tribe were, 1. Jezreel, in which was Ahab's palace, and near it Naboth's vineyard. 2. Shunem, where lived the good Shunamite, that entertained Elisha. 3. The river Kishon, on the banks of which, in this tribe, Sisera was beaten by Deborah and Barak. 4. The mountains of Gilboa, on which Saul and Jonathan were slain, which were not far from En-dor, where Saul consulted the witch. 5. The valley of Megiddo, where Josiah was slain, near Hadad-rimmon, 2 Kings, 23. 29. Zech. 12. 11.

24. And the fifth lot came out for the tribe of the children of Asher according to their families. 25. And their border was Helkath, and Hali, and Beten, and Achshaph, 26. And Alammelech, and Amad, and Misheal; and reacheth to Carmel westward, and to Shihor-libnath; 27. And turneth toward the sun-rising to Beth-dagon, and reacheth to Zebulun, and to the valley of Jiphtah-el toward the north side of Beth-emek, and Neiel, and goeth out to Cabul on the left hand, 28. And Hebron, and Rehob, and Hammon, and Kanah, even unto great Zidon; 29. And then the coast turneth to Ramah, and to the strong city Tyre; and the coast turneth to Hosah; and the outgoings thereof are at the sea from the coast to Achzib; 30. Ummah also, and Aphek, and Rehob: twenty-and-two cities with their villages. 31. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Asher according to their families, these cities with their villages.

The lot of Asher lay upon the coast of the great sea; we read not of any famous person of this tribe, but Anna the prophetess, who was a constant resident in the temple at the time of our Saviour's birth, Luke, 2. 36. Nor were there many famous places in this tribe. Aphek, mentioned v. 30. was the place near which Ben-hadad was beaten by Ahab, 1 Kings, 20. 30. But close adjoining to this tribe were the celebrated sea-port towns of Tyre and Sidon, which we read so much of. Tyre is called here that strong city, v. 29. but Bishop Patrick thinks it was not the same Tyre that we read of afterwards, for that was built on an island; this old strong city was on the continent. And it is conjectured by some, that into these two strong-holds, Sidon and Tzor, or Tyre, many of the people of Canaan fled and took shelter, when Joshua invaded them.

32. The sixth lot came out to the children of Naphtali, even for the children of Naphtali according to their families. 33. And their coast was from Heleph, from Allon to Zaauamin, and Adami, Nekeb, and Jabneel, unto Lakum: and the outgoings thereof were at Jordan: 34. And then the coast turneth westward to Aznoth-tabor, and goeth out from thence to Hukkok, and reacheth to Zebulun on the south side, and reacheth to Asher on the west side, and to Judah upon Jordan toward the sun-rising. 35. And the fenced cities are Ziddim, Zer, and Hammath, Rakkath, and Chinnereth, 36. And Adamah, and Ramah, and Hazor, 37. And Kedesh, and Edrei, and En-hazor, 38. And Iron, and Migdal-el, Horem, and Beth-anath, and Beth-shemesh; nineteen cities with their villages. 39. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Naphtali according to their families, the cities and their villages.

Naphtali lay furthest north of all the tribes, bordering on mount Libanus. The city of Leshem, or Laish, lay on the utmost edge of it to the north, and therefore, when the Danites had made themselves masters of it, and called it Dan, the length of Canaan, from north to south, was reckoned from Dan to Beer-sheba. It had Zebulun on the south, Asher on the west, and Judah upon Jordan, probably a city of that name, and so distinguished from the tribe of Judah, on the east. It was in the lot of this tribe, near the waters of Merom, that Joshua fought and routed Jabin, ch. 11. 1, &c. In this tribe stood Capernaum and Beth-saida, on the north end of the sea of Tiberias, in which Christ did no many mighty works; and the mountain (as is supposed) on which Christ preached, Matth. 5. 1.

40. And the seventh lot came out for the tribe of the children of Dan according to their families. 41. And the coast of their inheritance was Zorah, and Eshtaol, and Ir-shemesh, 42. And Shaalabbin, and Ajalon, and Jethlah, 43. And Elon, and Thimnathah, and Ekron, 44. And Eltekeh, and Gibbethon, and Baalath, 45. And Jehud, and Bene-berak, and Gath-rimmon, 46. And Me-jarkon, and Rakkon, with the border before Japho. 47. And the coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them: therefore the children of Dan went up to fight against Leshem, and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called Leshem, Dan, after the name of Dan their father. 48. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Dan according to their families, these cities with their villages.

Dan, though commander of one of the four squadrons of the camp of Israel, in the wilderness, that which brought up the rear.

yet was last provided for in Canaan, and his lot fell in the southern part of Canaan, between Judah on the east, and the land of the Philistines on the west; Ephraim on the north, and Simeon on the south. Providence ordered this numerous and powerful tribe into a post of danger, as best able to deal with those vexatious neighbours the Philistines, and so it was found in Samson. Here is,

1. An account of what fell to this tribe by lot: Zorah, and Eshtaol, and the camp of Dan thereabouts, we read of in the story of Samson. And near there was the valley of Eshcol, whence the spies brought the famous bunch of grapes. Japho, or Joppa, was in this lot.

2. An account of what they got by their own industry and valour, which is mentioned here, v. 47. but related at large, Judg. 18. 7, &c.

49. When they had made an end of dividing the land for inheritance by their coasts, the children of Israel gave an inheritance to Joshua the son of Nun among them: 50. According to the word of the LORD they gave him the city which he asked, even Timnath-serah in mount Ephraim; and he built the city, and dwelt therein. 51. These are the inheritances, which Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, divided for an inheritance by lot in Shiloh before the LORD, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. So they made an end of dividing the country.

Before this account of the dividing of the land is solemnly closed up, in the last verse, which intimates that the thing was done to the satisfaction of all, here is an account of the particular inheritance assigned to Joshua.

1. He was last served, though the eldest and greatest man of all Israel, and who, having commanded in the conquest of Canaan, might have demanded the first settlement in it for himself and his family. But he would make it to appear, that, in all he did, he sought the good of his country, and not any private interest of his own. He was content to be unfixed till he saw them all placed; and herein is a great example to all in public places, to prefer the common welfare before their particular satisfaction. Let the public first be served.

2. He had his lot according unto the word of the Lord; it is probable, when God by Moses told Caleb what inheritance he should have, Josh. 14. 9. he gave the like promise to Joshua, which he had an eye to in making his election, which made his portion doubly pleasant, that he had it, not as the rest, by common providence, but by special promise.

3. He chose it in mount Ephraim, which belonged to his own tribe, with which he thereby put himself in common, when he might by prerogative have chosen his inheritance in some other tribe, as suppose that of Judah, and thereby have distinguished himself from them. Let no man's preferment or honour make him ashamed of his family or country, or estrange him from it. The tabernacle was set up in the lot of Ephraim, and Joshua would forecast not to be far from that.

4. The children of Israel are said to give it him, v. 49. which bespeaks his humility, that he would not take it to himself without the people's consent and approbation, as if he would thereby own himself, though major singulis—greater than any one, yet minor universis—less than the whole assemblage, and would hold even the estate of his family, under God, by the grant of the people.

5. It was a city that must be built before it was fit to be dwelt in: while others dwell in houses which they builded not, Joshua must build for himself, that he might be a pattern of industry and contentment with mean things, such buildings as he could hastily run up, without curiosity or magnificence. Our Lord Jesus thus came and dwelt among us, not in pomp, but poverty, providing rest for us, yet himself not having where to lay his head. Even Christ pleased not himself.

CHAP. XX.

This short chapter is concerning the cities of refuge, which we often read of in the writings of Moses but this is the last time that we find mention of them, for now that matter was thoroughly settled. Here is, I. The law God gave concerning them, v. 1. .6. II. The people's designation of the particular cities for that use, v. 7. .9. And this remedial law was a figure of good things to come.

1. THE LORD also spake unto Joshua, saying, 2. Speak to the children of Israel, saying, Appoint out for you cities of refuge, whereof I spake unto you by the hand of Moses: 3. That the slayer that killeth any person unawares and unwittingly may flee thither: and they shall be your refuge from the avenger of blood. 4. And when he that doth flee unto one of those cities shall stand at the entering of the gate of the city, and shall declare his cause in the ears of the elders of that city, they shall take him into the city unto them, and give him a place, that he may dwell among them. 5. And if the avenger of blood pursue after him, then they shall not deliver the slayer up into his hand; because he smote his neighbour unwittingly, and hated him not before-time. 6. And he shall dwell in that city, until he stand before the congregation for judgment, and until the death of the high priest that shall be in those days: then shall the slayer return, and come unto his own city, and unto his own house, unto the city from whence he fled.

Many things were by the law of Moses ordered to be done when they came to Canaan, and this among the rest, the appointing of sanctuaries for the protecting of those that were guilty of casual murder; which was a privilege to all Israel, since no man could be sure but some time or other it might be his own case; and it was for the interest of the land, that the blood of an innocent person, whose hand only was guilty, but not his heart, should not be shed, no, not by the avenger of blood: of this law God here reminds them, which was so much for their advantage, that they might remind themselves of the other laws he had given them, which concerned his honour.

I. Orders are given for the appointing of these cities, v. 2. and very seasonably at this time when the land was surveyed, and so they were the better able to divide the coasts of it into three parts, as God had directed them, in order to the more convenient situation of these cities of refuge, Deut. 19. 3. Yet, it is probable, that it was not done till after the Levites had their portion assigned them in the next chapter, because the cities of refuge were all to be Levites' cities. As soon as ever God had given them cities of rest, he bade them appoint cities of refuge, to which none of them knew but they might be glad to escape. Thus God provided, not only for their ease at all times, but for their safety in time of danger, and such times we must expect and prepare for in this world. And it intimates what God's spiritual Israel have, and shall have, in Christ and heaven, not only rest to repose themselves in, but refuge to secure themselves in. And we cannot think these cities of refuge would have been so often, and so much, spoken of in the law of Moses, and have had so much care taken about them, (when the intention of them might have been effectually answered, as it is in our law, by authorising the courts of judgment to protect and acquit the manslayer in all those cases wherein he was to have privilege of sanctuary,) if they were not designed to typify the relief which the gospel provides for poor penitent sinners, and their protection from the curse of the law and the wrath of God, in our Lord Jesus, to whom believers flee for refuge, Heb. 6. 18. and in whom they are found, Phil. 3. 9. as in a sanctuary, where they are privileged from arrests, and there is now no condemnation to them, Rom. 8. 1.

II. Instructions are given for the using of these cities. The laws in this matter we had before, Numb. 35. 10, &c. where they were opened at large.

1. It is supposed that a man might possibly kill a person, it may be, his own child, or dearest friend, unawares and unwittingly, v. 3. not only whom he hated not, but whom he truly loved, beforetime, v. 5. for the way of man is not in himself. What reason have we to thank God, who has kept us both from slaying and from being slain by accident! In this case, it is supposed that the relations of the person slain would demand the life of the slayer, as a satisfaction to that ancient law, that whoso sheds man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed.

2. It is provided, that if, upon trial, it appeared that the murder was done purely by accident, and not by design, either upon an old grudge, or a sudden passion, then the slayer should be sheltered from the avenger of blood in any one of these cities, v. 4, 6. By this law he was entitled to a dwelling in that city, was taken into the care of the government of it, but was confined to it, as a prisoner at large; only, if he survived the high priest, then, and not till then, he might return to his own city. And the Jews say, "If he died before the high priest in the city of his refuge and exile, and was buried there, yet, at the death of the high priest, his bones should be removed, with respect, to the place of his fathers' sepulchres."

7. And they appointed Kedesh in Galilee in mount Naphtali, and Shechem in mount Ephraim, and Kirjath-arba, which is Hebron, in the mountain of Judah. 8. And on the other side Jordan by Jericho eastward, they assigned Bezer in the wilderness upon the plain out of the tribe of Reuben, and Ramoth in Gilead out of the tribe of Gad, and Golan in Bashan out of the tribe of Manasseh. 9. These were the cities appointed for all the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them, that whosoever killeth any person at unawares might flee thither, and not die by the hand of the avenger of blood, until he stood before the congregation.

We have here the nomination of the cities of refuge in the land of Canaan, which was made by the advice and authority of Joshua and the princes, v. 7. and, upon occasion of the mention of this, is repeated the nomination of the other three in the lot of the other two tribes and a half, which was made by Moses, Deut. 4. 43. but (as Bishop Patrick thinks,) they had not the privilege till now.

1. They are said to sanctify these cities, that is the original word for appointed, v. 7. Not that any ceremony was used to signify the consecration of them, only they did, by a public act of court, solemnly declare them cities of refuge; and, as such, sacred to the honour of God, as the Protector of exposed innocency. If they were sanctuaries, it was proper to say, they were sanctified. Christ, our Refuge, was sanctified by his Father; nay, for our sakes he sanctified himself, John, 17. 19.

2. These cities (as those also on the other side Jordan,) stood in the three several parts of the country, so conveniently that a man might (they say) in half a day reach some one of them from any corner of the country. Kedesh was in Naphtali, the most northern tribe, Hebron in Judah, the most southern, and Shechem in Ephraim, which lay in the middle, about equally distant from the other two. God is a refuge at hand.

5. They were all Levites' cities, which put an honour upon God's tribe, making them judges in those cases wherein divine providence was so nearly concerned, and protectors to oppressed innocency; it was also a kindness to the poor refugee, that when he might not go up to the house of the Lord, nor tread his courts, yet he had the servants of God's house with him, to instruct him, and pray for him, and help to make up the want of public ordinances. If he must be confined, it shall be to a Levite city, where he may, if he will, improve his time.

4. These cities were upon hills, to be seen afar off, for a city on a hill cannot be hid; and this would both direct and encourage the poor distressed man that was making that way; and though therefore his way at last was up-hill, yet this would comfort him, that he would be in his place of safety quickly; and if he could but get into the suburbs of the city, he was well enough off.

5. Some observe a significancy in the names of these cities with application to Christ our Refuge. I delight not in quibbling upon names, yet am willing to take notice of these. Kedesh signifies holy, and our Refuge is the holy Jesus. Shechem, a shoulder, and the government is upon his shoulder. Hebron, fellowship, and believers are called into the fellowship of Christ Jesus our Lord. Bezer, a fortification, for he is a Strong-hold to all them that trust in him. Ramoth, high, or exalted, for him hath God exalted with his own right-hand. Golan, joy, or exultation, for in him all the saints are justified, and shall glory.

Lastly, Beside all these, the horns of the altar, wherever it was, were a refuge to those who took hold on them, if the crime were such as that sanctuary allowed. This is implied in that law, Exod. 21. 14. that a wilful murderer shall be taken from God's altar to be put to death. And we find the altar used for this purpose, 1 Kings, 1. 50.—2. 28. Christ is, our Altar, who not only sanctifies the gifts, but protects the giver.

CHAP. XXI.

It had been often said, that the tribe of Levi should have no inheritance with their brethren, no particular part of the country assigned them, as the other tribes had, no, not the country about Shiloh, which, one would have expected, should have been appropriated to them as the lands of the church; but, though they were not thus cast into a country by themselves, it appears, by the provision made for them in this chapter, that they were no losers, but the rest of the tribes were very much gainers, by their being dispersed. We have here, I. The motion they made to have their cities assigned them, according to God's appointment, v. 1, 2. II. The nomination of the cities accordingly, out of the several tribes, and the distribution of them to the respective families of this tribe, v. 3. .8. III. A catalogue of the cities, forty-eight in all, v. 9. .42. IV. A receipt entered in full of all that God had promised to his people Israel, v. 43. .45.

1. THEN came near the heads of the fathers of the Levites unto Eleazar the priest, and unto Joshua the son of Nun, and unto the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel; 2. And they spake unto them at Shiloh in the land of Canaan, saying, The LORD commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities to dwell in, with the suburbs thereof for our cattle. 3. And the children of Israel gave unto the Levites out of their inheritance, at the commandment of the LORD, these cities and their suburbs. 4. And the lot came out for the families of the Kohathites: and the children of Aaron the priest, which were of the Levites, had by lot out of the tribe of Judah, and out of the tribe of Simeon, and out of the tribe of Benjamin, thirteen cities.

5. And the rest of the children of Kohath had by lot out of the families of the tribe of Ephraim, and out of the tribe of Dan, and out of the half tribe of Manasseh, ten cities.

6. And the children of Gershon had by lot out of the families of the tribe of Issachar, and out of the tribe of Asher, and out of the tribe of Naphtali, and out of the half tribe of Manasseh in Bashan, thirteen cities.

7. The children of Merari by their families had out of the tribe of Reuben, and out of the tribe of Gad, and out of the tribe of Zebulun, twelve cities.

8. And the children of Israel gave by lot unto the Levites these cities with their suburbs, as the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses.

Here is,

I. The Levites' petition presented to this general convention of the states, now sitting at Shiloh, v. 1, 2. Observe,

1. They had not their lot assigned them till they made their claim. There is an inheritance provided for all the saints, that royal priesthood, but then they must petition for it, Ask, and it shall be given you. Joshua had quickened the rest of the tribes who were slack, to put in their claims, but the Levites, it may be supposed, knew their duty and interest better than the rest, and were therefore forward in this matter, when it came to their turn, without being called upon. They build their claim upon a very good foundation, not their own merits or services, but the divine precept. "The Lord commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities, commanded you to grant them, which implied a command to us to ask them." Note, The maintenance of ministers is not an arbitrary thing, left purely to the good-will of the people, who may let them starve if they please; no, as the God of Israel commanded that the Levites should be well provided for, so has the Lord Jesus, the King of the Christian church, ordained, and a perpetual ordinance it is, that they which preach the gospel, should live of the gospel, 1 Cor. 9. 14. and should live comfortably.

2. They did not make their claim till all the rest of the tribes were provided for, and then they did it immediately. There was some reason for it: every tribe must first know their own, else they would not know what they gave the Levites, and so it could not be such a reasonable service as it ought to be. But it is also an instance of their humility, modesty, and patience, (and Levites should be examples of these and other virtues,) that they were willing to be served last, and they fared never the worse for it. Let not God's ministers complain, if at any time they find themselves postponed in men's thoughts and cares, but let them make sure of the favour of God, and the honour that comes from him, and then they may well enough afford to bear the slights and neglects of men.

II. The Levites' petition granted immediately, without any dispute, the princes of Israel being perhaps ashamed that they needed to be called upon in this matter, and that the motion had not been made among themselves for the settling of the Levites.

1. The children of Israel are said to give the cities for the Levites. God had appointed how many they should be in all, forty-eight. It is probable that Joshua, and the princes, upon consideration of the extent and value of the lot of each tribe, as it was laid before them, had appointed how many cities should be taken out of each; and then the fathers of the several tribes themselves agreed which they should be, and therefore are said to give them as an offering to the Lord; so God had appointed,

Numb. 35. 8. Every one shall give of his cities to the Levites. Here God tried their generosity, and it was found to praise and honour, for it appears, by the following catalogue, that the cities they gave to the Levites were generally some of the best and most considerable in each tribe. And it is probable that they had an eye to the situation of them, taking care they should be so dispersed, as that no part of the country should be too far distant from a Levites' city.

2. They gave them at the commandment of the Lord, that is, with an eye to the command, and in obedience to it, which was it that sanctified the grant. They gave the number that God commanded, and it was well that matter was settled, that the Levites might not ask more, nor the Israelites offer less. They gave them also with their suburbs, or glebe lands, belonging to them, so many cubits by measure from the walls of the city, as God had commanded, Numb. 35. 4, 5. and did not go about to cut them short.

3. When the forty-eight cities were pitched upon, they were divided into four lots, as they lay next together, and then by lot were determined to the four several families of the tribe of Levi. When the Israelites had surrendered the cities into the hand of God, he would himself have the distributing of them among his servants. (1.) The family of Aaron, who were the only priests, had to their share the thirteen cities that were given by the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, v. 4. God, in wisdom, ordered it thus, that though Jerusalem itself was not one of their cities, it being as yet in the possession of the Jebusites, (and those generous tribes would not mock the Levites, who had another warfare to mind, with a city that must be recovered by the sword before it could be enjoyed,) yet the cities that fell to their lot were those which lay next to Jerusalem, because that was to be, in process of time, the holy city, where their business would chiefly lie. (2.) The Kohathite Levites (among whom were the posterity of Moses, though never distinguished from them,) had the cities that lay in the lot of Dan, which lay next to Judah, and in that of Ephraim, and the half tribe of Manasseh, which lay next to Benjamin. So they, who descended from Aaron's father, joined nearest to Aaron's sons. (3.) Gershon was the eldest son of Levi, and therefore, though the younger house of the Kohathites was preferred before his, yet his children had the precedency of the other family of Merari, v. 6. (4.) The Merarites, the youngest house, had their lot last, and it lay furthest off, v. 7. The rest of the sons of Jacob had a lot for every tribe only, but Levi, God's tribe, had a lot for each of its families; for there is a particular providence directing and attending the removes and settlements of ministers, and appointing where they shall fix who are to be the lights of the world.

9. And they gave out of the tribe of the children of Judah, and out of the tribe of the children of Simeon, these cities which are here mentioned by name, 10. Which the children of Aaron, being of the families of the Kohathites, who were of the children of Levi, had: for their's was the first lot. 11. And they gave them the city of Arba the father of Anak, which city is Hebron, in the hill country of Judah, with the suburbs thereof round about it. 12. But the fields of the city, and the villages thereof, gave they to Caleb the son of Jephunneh for his possession. 13. Thus they gave to the children of Aaron the priest Hebron with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Libnah with her suburbs, 14. And Jattir with her suburbs, and Eshtemoa with her suburbs, 15. And Holon with her suburbs, and Debir with her suburbs, 16. And Ain with her suburbs, and Jattah with her suburbs, and Beth-shemesh with her suburbs; nine cities out of those two tribes. 17. And out of the tribe of Benjamin, Gibeon with her suburbs, Geba with her suburbs, 18. Anathoth with her suburbs, and Almon with her suburbs; four cities. 19. All the cities of the children of Aaron, the priests, were thirteen cities with their suburbs. 20. And the families of the children of Kohath, the Levites which remained of the children of Kohath, even they had the cities of their lot out of the tribe of Ephraim. 21. For they gave them Shechem with her suburbs in mount Ephraim, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Gezer with her suburbs, 22. And Kibzaim with her suburbs, and Beth-horon with her suburbs; four cities. 23. And out of the tribe of Dan, Eltekeh with her suburbs, Gibbethon with her suburbs, 24. Aijalon with her suburbs, Gath-rimmon with her suburbs; four cities. 25. And out of the half tribe of Manasseh, Tanach with her suburbs, and Gath-rimmon with her suburbs; two cities. 26. All the cities were ten with their suburbs for the families of the children of Kohath that remained. 27. And unto the children of Gershon, of the families of the Levites, out of the other half tribe of Manasseh they gave Golan in Bashan with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Beeshterah with her suburbs; two cities. 28. And out of the tribe of Issachar, Kishon with her suburbs, Dabareh with her suburbs, 29. Jarmuth with her suburbs, En-gannim with her suburbs; four cities. 30. And out of the tribe of Asher, Mishal with her suburbs, Abdon with her suburbs, 31. Helkath with her suburbs, and Rehob with her suburbs; four cities. 32. And out of the tribe of Naphtali, Kedesh in Galilee with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Hammoth-dor with her suburbs, and Kartan with her suburbs; three cities. 33. All the cities of the Gershonites according to their families were thirteen cities with their suburbs. 34. And unto the families of the children of Merari, the rest of the Levites, out of the tribe of Zebulun, Jokneam with her suburbs, and Kartah with her suburbs, 35. Dimnah with her suburbs, Nahalal with her suburbs; four cities. 36. And out of the tribe of Reuben, Bezer with her suburbs, and Jahazah with her suburbs, 37. Kedemoth with her suburbs, and Mephaath with her suburbs; four cities. 38. And out of the tribe of Gad, Ramoth in Gilead with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Mahanaim with her suburbs, 39. Heshbon with her suburbs, Jazer with her suburbs; four cities in all. 40. So all the cities for the children of Merari by their families, which were remaining of the families of the Levites, were by their lot twelve cities. 41. All the cities of the Levites within the possession of the children of Israel were forty and eight cities with their suburbs. 42. These cities were every one with their suburbs round about them: thus were all these cities.

We have here a particular account of the cities which were given to the children of Levi, out of the several tribes, not only to be occupied and inhabited by them, as tenants to the several tribes in which they lay; no, their interest in them was not dependent and precarious, but to be owned and possessed by them as lords and proprietors, and as having the same title to them that the rest of the tribes had to their cities or lands, as appears by the law which preserved the houses in the Levites' cities from being alienated any longer than till the year of jubilee, Lev. 25. 32, 33. Yet it is probable, that the Levites having only the cities and suburbs, while the land about pertained to the tribes in which they lay, those of that tribe, for the convenience of occupying that land, might commonly rent houses of the Levites, as they could spare them in their cities, and so live among them as their tenants.

Several things may be observed in this account, beside what was observed in the law concerning it, Num. 35.

1. That the Levites were dispersed into all the tribes, and not suffered to live all together in any one part of the country: this would find them all with work, and employ them all for the good of others; for ministers, of all people, must neither be idle, nor live to themselves, or to one another only. Christ left his twelve disciples together in a body, but left orders that they should in due time disperse themselves, that they might preach the gospel to every creature. The mixing of the Levites thus with the other tribes, would be an obligation upon them to walk circumspectly, and as became their sacred function, and to avoid every thing that might disgrace it; had they lived all together, they would have been tempted to wink at one another's faults, and to excuse one another when they did amiss; but, by this means, they were made to see the eyes of all Israel upon them, and therefore saw it their concern to walk so as that their ministry might in nothing be blamed, nor their high character suffer by their ill carriage.

2. That every tribe of Israel was adorned and enriched with its share of Levites' cities, in proportion to its compass, even those that lay most remote. They were all God's people, and therefore they all had Levites among them, (1.) To shew kindness to, as God appointed them, Deut. 12. 19.—14. 29. They were God's receivers, to whom the people might give their grateful acknowledgments of God's goodness, as the occasion and disposition were. (2.) To receive advice and instruction from; when they could not go up to the tabernacle to consult those who attended there, they might go to a Levites' city, and be taught the good knowledge of the Lord. Thus God set up a candle in every room of his house, to give light to all his family; as those that attended the altar kept the charge of the Lord, to see that no divine appointment was neglected there; so they that were scattered in the country had their charge too, which was to see that no idolatrous superstitious usages were introduced at a distance, and to watch for the souls of God's Israel. Thus did God graciously provide for the keeping up of religion among them, and that they might have the word nigh them; yet, blessed be God, we, under the gospel, have it yet nigher, not only Levites in every county, but Levites in every parish, whose office it is still to teach the people knowledge, and to go before them in the things of God.

3. That here were thirteen cities, and those some of the best, appointed for the priests, the sons of Aaron, v. 19. Aaron left but two sons, Eleazar and Ithamar, yet his family was now so much increased, and it was foreseen that it would, in process of time, grow so numerous, as to replenish all these cities; though a considerable number must, of necessity, be resident wherever the ark and the altar were. We read in both Testaments of such numbers of priests, that we may suppose none of all the families of Israel, that came out of Egypt, increased afterward so much as that of Aaron did; and the promise afterward to the house of Aaron, is, God shall increase you more and more, you and your children, Ps. 115. 12, 14. He will raise up a seed to serve him.

4. That some of the Levites' cities were afterward famous upon other accounts. Hebron was the city in which David began his reign, and in Mahanaim, another Levites' city, v. 38. he lay, and had his head-quarters when he fled from Absalom. The first Israelite that ever wore the title of king, namely, Abimelech, the son of Gideon, reigned in Shechem, another Levites' city, v. 21.

5. That the number of them in all was more than of most of the tribes, except Judah, though the tribe of Levi was one of the least of the tribes, to shew how liberal God is, and his people should be, to his ministers; yet the disproportion will not appear so great as at first it seems, if we consider that the Levites had cities only with the suburbs to dwell in, but the rest of the tribes, beside their cities, (and those perhaps were many more than are named in the account of their lot,) had many unwall'd towns and villages, which they inhabited, beside country houses.

Upon the whole, it appears that effectual care was taken, that the Levites should live both comfortably and usefully; and those, whether ministers or others, for whom Providence has done well, must look upon themselves as obliged thereby to do good, and, according as their capacity and opportunity are, to serve their generation.

43. And the LORD gave unto Israel all the land which he sware to give unto their fathers; and they possessed it, and dwelt therein. 44. And the LORD gave them rest round about, according to all that he sware unto their fathers: and there stood not a man of all their enemies before them; the LORD delivered all their enemies into their hand. 45. There failed not aught of any good thing which the LORD had spoken unto the house of Israel; all came to pass.

We have here the conclusion of this whole matter, the foregoing history summed up, and, to make it appear the more bright, compared with the promise, of which it was the full accomplishment. God's word and his works mutually illustrate each other. The performance makes the promise appear very true, and the promise makes the performance appear very kind.

1. God had promised to give the seed of Abraham the land of Canaan for a possession, and now, at last, he performed that promise, v. 43. they possessed it, and dwelt therein. Though they had often forfeited the benefit of that promise, and God had long delayed the performance of it, yet, at last, all difficulties were conquered, and Canaan was their own. And the promise of the heavenly Canaan is as sure to all God's spiritual Israel, for it is the promise of him that cannot lie.

2. God had promised to give them rest in that land, and now they had rest round about. Rest from the fatigues of their travel through the wilderness, which tedious march, perhaps, was long in their bones; rest from their wars in Canaan, and the insults which their enemies there had at first offered them. They now dwelt, not only in habitations of their own, but those quiet and peaceable ones; though there were Canaanites that remained, yet none that had either strength or spirit to attack them, or so much as give them an alarm. This rest continued, till they, by their own sin and folly, put thorns into their own beds, and their own eyes.

3. God had promised to give them victory and success in their wars, and this promise likewise was fulfilled, there stood not a man before them, v. 44. They had the better in every battle, and, which way soever they turned their forces, they prospered. It is true, there were Canaanites now remaining in many parts of the land, and such as afterward made head against them, and became very formidable. But, (1.) As to the present remains of the Canaanites, they were no contradiction to the promise, for God had said he would not drive them out all at once, but by little and little, Exod. 23. 30. They had now as much in their full possession as they had occasion for, and as they had hands to manage; so that the Canaanites only kept possession of some of the less cultivated parts of the country against the beasts of the field, till Israel, in process of time, should become numerous enough to replenish them. (2.) As to the after-prevalency of the Canaanites, that was purely the effect of Israel's cowardice and slothfulness, and the punishment of their sinful inclination to the idolatries and other abominations of the heathen, which the Lord would have cast out before them, but they harboured and indulged them.

So that the foundation of God stands sure: Israel's experience of God's fidelity is here upon record, and is an acquittance under their hands to the honour of God, the vindication of his promise, which had been so often distrusted, and the encouragement of all believers, to the end of the world. There failed not any good thing, no, nor aught of any good thing, (so full is it expressed,) which the Lord had spoken unto the house of Israel, but in due time all came to pass, v. 45. Such an acknowledgment as this, here subscribed by Joshua, in the name of all Israel, we afterward find made by Solomon, and all Israel did in effect say amen to it, 1 Kings, 8. 56. The inviolable truth of God's promise, and the performance of it to the utmost, is what all the saints have been ready to bear their testimony to; and if in any thing it has seemed to come short, they have been as ready to own that they themselves must bear all the blame.

CHAP. XXII.

Many particular things we have read concerning the two tribes and a half, though nothing separated them from the rest of the tribes except the river Jordan, and this chapter is wholly concerning them. I. Joshua's dismissal of the militia of those tribes from the camp of Israel, in which they had served as auxiliaries, during all the wars of Canaan, and their return thereupon to their own country, v. 1. .9. II. The altar they built on the borders of Jordan, as token of their communion with the land of Israel, v. 10. III. The offence which the rest of the tribes took at this altar, and the message they sent thereupon, v. 11. .20. IV. The apology which the two tribes and a half made for what they had done, v. 21. .29. V. The satisfaction which their apology gave to the rest of the tribes, v. 30. .31. And (which is strange) whereas in most differences that happen there is a fault on both sides, on this there was fault on no side; none (for aught that appears) were to be blamed, but all to be praised.

1. THEN Joshua called the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh, 2. And said unto them, Ye have kept all that Moses the servant of the LORD commanded you, and have obeyed my voice in all that I commanded you: 3. Ye have not left your brethren these many days unto this day, but have kept the charge of the commandment of the LORD your God. 4. And now the LORD your God hath given rest unto your brethren, as he promised them: therefore now return ye, and get you unto your tents, and unto the land of your possession, which Moses the servant of the LORD gave you on the other side Jordan. 5. But take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law, which Moses the servant of the LORD charged you, to love the LORD your God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto him, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul. 6. So Joshua blessed them, and sent them away: and they went unto their tents. 7. Now to the one half of the tribe of Manasseh Moses had given possession in Bashan: but unto the other half thereof gave Joshua among their brethren on this side Jordan westward. And when Joshua sent them away also unto their tents, then he blessed them, 8. And he spake unto them, saying, Return with much riches unto your tents, and with very much cattle, with silver, and with gold, and with brass, and with iron, and with very much raiment; divide the spoil of your enemies with your brethren. 9. And the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half-tribe of Manasseh returned, and departed from the children of Israel out of Shiloh, which is in the land of Canaan, to go unto the country of Gilead, to the land of their possession, whereof they were possessed, according to the word of the LORD by the hand of Moses.

The war being ended, and ended gloriously, Joshua, as a prudent general, disbands his army, who never designed to make war their trade, and sends them home to enjoy what they had conquered, and to beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; and, particularly, the forces of these separate tribes, who had received their inheritance on the other side Jordan from Moses upon this condition, that their men of war should assist the other tribes in the conquest of Canaan, which they promised to do, (Numb. 32. 32.) and renewed the promise to Joshua at the opening of the campaign, Josh. 1. 16. And now that they had performed their bargain, Joshua publicly and solemnly in Shiloh gives them their discharge. Whether this was done, as it was placed, not till after the land was divided, as some think, or whether after the war was ended, and before the division was made, as others think, (because there was no need of their assistance in dividing the land, but only in conquering it, nor were there any of their tribes employed as commissioners in that affair, but only of the other ten, (Numb. 34. 18. &c.) this is certain, it was not done till after Shiloh was made the head-quarters, (v. 2.) and the land was begun to be divided before they removed from Gilgal, ch. 14. 6.

It is probable that this army of Reubenites and Gadites, which had led the van in all the wars of Canaan, had sometimes, in the intervals of action, and when the rest of the army retired into winter-quarters, some of them, at least, made a step over Jordan, for it was not far, to visit their families, and to look after their private affairs, and perhaps tarried at home, and sent others in their room more serviceable; but still these two tribes and a half had their quota of troops ready, forty thousand in all, which, whenever there was occasion, rendered themselves at their respective posts, and now attended in a body to receive their discharge. Though their affection to their families, and concern for their affairs, could not but make them, after so long absence, very desirous to return, yet, like good soldiers, they would not move till they had orders from their general. So though our heavenly Father's house above be ever so desirable, (it is Bishop Hall's allusion,) yet must we stay on earth till our warfare be accomplished, wait for a due discharge, and not anticipate the time of our removal.

I. Joshua dismisses them to the land of their possession, v. 4.

They that were first in the assignment of their lot, were last in the enjoyment of it; they got the start of their brethren in title, but their brethren were before them in full possession; so the last shall be first, and the first last, that there may be something of equality.

II. He dismisses them with their pay; for who goes a warfare at his own charge? v. 8. Return with much riches unto your tents. Though all the land they had helped to conquer, was to go to the other tribes, yet they should have their share of the plunder, and had so, and that was all the pay that any of the soldiers expected; for the wars of Canaan bore their own charges. "Go," says Joshua, "go home to your tents," that is, "your houses," which he calls tents, because they had been so much used to tents in the wilderness; and indeed the strongest and staliest houses in this world are to be looked upon but as tents, mean and movable in comparison with our house above. "Go home with much riches, not only cattle, the spoil of the country, but silver and gold, the plunder of the cities, and," 1. "Let your brethren whom you leave behind, have your good word, who have allowed you your share in full, though the land is entirely theirs, and have not offered to make any drawback. Do not say that you are losers by us." 2. "Let your brethren whom you go to, who abode by the stuff, have some share of the spoil. Divide the spoil with your brethren, as that was divided, which was taken in the war with Midian, Numb. 31. 27. Let your brethren that have wanted you all this while, be the better for you when you come home."

III. He dismisses them with a very honourable character. Though their service was a due debt, and the performance of a promise, and they had done no more than was their duty to do, yet he highly commends them; not only gives them up their bonds, as it were, now that they had fulfilled the condition, but applauds their good services. Though it was by the favour of God and his power, that Israel got possession of this land, and he must have all the glory, yet Joshua thought there was a thankful acknowledgment due to their brethren who assisted them, and whose sword and bow were employed for them. God must be chiefly eyed in our praises, yet instruments must not be altogether overlooked. He here commends them, 1. For the readiness of their obedience to their commanders, v. 2. When Moses was gone, they remembered and observed the charge he had given them; and all the orders which Joshua, as general of the forces, had issued out, they had carefully obeyed, went, and came, and did, as he appointed, Matth. 8. 9. It is as much as any thing the soldier's praise, to observe the word of command. 2. For the constancy of their affection, and adherence to their brethren, Ye have not left them these many days. How many days, he does not say, nor can we gather it for certain from any other place. Calvisius and others of the best chronologers compute, that the conquering and dividing of the land was the work of about six or seven years, and so long, these separate tribes attended their camp, and did them the best service they could. Note, It will be the honour of those that have espoused the cause of God's Israel; and twisted interests with them, to adhere to them, and never to leave them till God has given them rest, and then they shall rest with them. 3. For the faithfulness of their obedience to the divine law. They had not only done their duty to Joshua and Israel, but, which was best of all, they had made conscience of their duty to God, Ye have kept the charge; or, as the word is, Ye have kept the keeping, that is, "Ye have carefully and circumspectly kept the commandment of the Lord your God"; not only in this particular instance of continuing in the service of Israel to the end of the war, but, in general, you have kept up religion in your part of the camp, a rare and excellent thing among soldiers, and where it is worthy to be praised."

IV. He dismisses them with good counsel, not to cultivate their ground, fortify their cities, and, now that their hands were inured to war and victory, to invade their neighbours, and so enlarge their own territories, but to keep up serious godliness among them in the power of it. They were not politic but pious instructions that he gave them, (v. 5.) in general, to take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law. They that have the commandment have it in vain, unless they do the commandment; and it will not be done aright, (so apt are we to turn aside, and so industrious are our spiritual enemies to turn us aside,) unless we take heed, diligent heed. In particular, to love the Lord our God, as the best of beings, and the best of friends; and, as far as that principle rules in the heart, and is the spring of its pulses, there will be a constant care and sincere endeavour to walk in his ways, in all his ways, even those that are narrow and up hill, in every particular instance, and in all manner of conversation to keep his commandments; and at all times, and in all conditions, with purpose of heart to cleave unto him, and to serve him and his honour, and the interests of his kingdom among men, with all our heart, and with all our soul. What good counsel was here given to them, is given to us all; God give us grace to take it!

V. He dismisses them with a blessing, v. 6. particularly the half tribe of Manasseh, to which Joshua, as an Ephraimite, was somewhat nearer akin than to the other two, and who, perhaps, were the more loath to depart, because they left one half of their own tribe behind them, and therefore, bidding often farewell, and lingering behind, had a second dismissal and blessing, v. 7. Joshua not only prayed for them as a friend, but blessed them as a father in the name of the Lord, recommending them, their families, and affairs, to the grace of God. Some, by the blessing Joshua gave them, understand the presents he made them, in recompence of their services; but Joshua being a prophet, and having given them one part of a prophet's reward, in the instructions he gave them, v. 5. no doubt, we must understand this of the other, even the prayers he made for them, as one having authority, and as God's vicegerent.

Being thus dismissed, they returned to the land of their possession in a body, v. 9. ferry-boats being, it is likely, provided for their repassing Jordan. Though masters of families may have occasion to be absent, long absent, from their families sometimes, yet, when their business abroad is finished, they must remember home is their place, from which they ought not to wander as a bird from her nest.

10. And when they came unto the borders of Jordan, that are in the land of Canaan, the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh built there an altar by Jordan, a great altar to see to. 11. And the children of Israel heard say, Behold, the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh have built an altar over against the land of Canaan, in the borders of Jordan, at the passage of the children of Israel. 12. And when the children of Israel heard of it, the whole congregation of the children of Israel gathered themselves together at Shiloh, to go up to war against them. 13. And the children of Israel sent unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh, into the land of Gilead, Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, 14. And with him ten princes, of each chief house a prince throughout all the tribes of Israel; and each one was an head of the house of their fathers among the thousands of Israel. 15. And they came unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh, unto the land of Gilead, and they spake with them, saying, 16. Thus saith the whole congregation of the LORD, what trespass is this that ye have committed against the God of Israel, to turn away this day from following the LORD, in that ye have builded you an altar, that ye might rebel this day against the LORD? 17. Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us, from which we are not cleansed until this day, although there was a plague in the congregation of the LORD, 18. But that ye must turn away this day from following the LORD? And it will be, seeing ye rebel to-day against the LORD, that to-morrow he will be wrath with the whole congregation of Israel. 19. Notwithstanding, if the land of your possession be unclean, then pass ye over unto the land of the possession of the LORD, wherein the LORD's tabernacle dwelleth, and take possession among us: but rebel not against the LORD, nor rebel against us, in building you an altar beside the altar of the LORD our God. 20. Did not Achan the son of Zerah commit a trespass in the accursed thing, and wrath fell on all the congregation of Israel? and that man perished not alone in his iniquity.

Here is,

I. The pious care of the separated tribes to keep their hold of Canaan's religion, then when they were leaving Canaan's land, that they might not be as the sons of the stranger, utterly separated from God's people, Isa. 56. 3. In order to this, they built a great altar on the borders of Jordan, to be a witness for them that they were Israelites, and, as such, partakers of the altar of the Lord, 1 Cor. 10. 14. When they came to Jordan, v. 10. they did not consult how to preserve the remembrance of their own exploits in the wars of Canaan, and the services they had done their brethren, by erecting a monument to the immortal honour of the two tribes and a half; but their relation to the church of God, together with their interest in the communion of saints, is that which they are solicitous to preserve and perpetuate the proofs and evidences of; and therefore, without delay, when the thing was first proposed by some among them, who, though glad to think that they were going toward home, were sorry to think that they were going from the altar of God, immediately they erected this altar, which served as a bridge to keep up their fellowship with the other tribes in the things of God. Some think they built this altar on the Canaan side of Jordan, in the lot of Benjamin, that, looking over the river, they might see the figure of the altar at Shiloh, when they could not conveniently go to it; but it is more likely that they built it on their own side of the water, for what had they to do to build on another man's land without his consent? And it is said to be over-against the land of Canaan, nor would there have been any cause of suspecting it designed for sacrifice, if they had not built it among themselves.

This altar was very innocently and honestly designed, but it had been well, if, since it had in it an appearance of evil, and might be an occasion of offence to their brethren, they had consulted the oracle of God about it before they did it; or, at least, acquainted their brethren with their purpose, and given them the same explication of their altar before, to prevent their jealousy, which they did after, to remove it. Their zeal was commendable, but it ought to have been guided with discretion; there was no need to hasten the building of an altar for the purpose they intended this, but they might have taken time to consider and take advice; yet, when their sincerity was made to appear, we do not find that they were blamed for their rashness; God does, and men should, overlook the weakness of an honest zeal.

H. The holy jealousy of the other tribes for the honour of God, and his altar at Shiloh. Notice was immediately brought to the princes of Israel of the setting up this altar, v. 11. And they, knowing how strict and severe that law was, which required them to offer all their sacrifices in the place which God should choose, and not elsewhere, Deut. 12. 5, 7. were soon apprehensive, that the getting up of another altar was an affront to the choice which God had lately made of a place to put his name in, and had a direct tendency to the worship of some other god.

Now, 1. Their suspicion was very excusable, for it must be confessed, the thing prima facie—at first sight, looked ill, and seemed to shadow forth a design to set up and maintain a competitor with the altar at Shiloh. It was no strained innuendo, from the building an altar, to infer an intention to offer sacrifice upon it, and that might introduce idolatry, and end in a total apostasy from the faith and worship of the God of Israel. So great a matter might this fire kindle. God is jealous for his own institutions, and therefore we should be so too, and afraid of every thing that looks like, or leads to, idolatry.

2. Their zeal, upon this suspicion, was very commendable, v. 12. When they apprehended that these tribes, which by the river Jordan were separated from them, were separating themselves from God, they took it as the greatest injury that could be done to themselves, and shewed a readiness, if it were necessary, to put their lives in their hands, in defence of the altar of God, and to take up arms for the chastising and reducing of these rebels, and to prevent the spreading of the infection, if no gentle methods would serve, by cutting off from their body the gangrened member. They all gathered together, and Shiloh was the place of their rendezvous, because it was in defence of the divine charter, lately granted to that place, that they now appeared; their resolution was as became a kingdom of priests, who, being devoted to God and his service, did not acknowledge their brethren, nor know their own children, Deut. 33. 9. They would immediately go up to war against them, if it appeared they were revolted from God, and in rebellion against him: though they were bone of their bone, and had been companions with them in tribulation in the wilderness, and serviceable to them in the wars of Canaan; yet, if they turn to serve other gods, they will treat them as enemies, not as sons of Israel, but as children of whoredoms, for so God had appointed, Deut. 13. 12, &c. They had but lately sheathed their swords, and retired from the perils and fatigues of war to the rest God had given them, and yet they are willing to begin a new war, rather than be any way wanting in their duty to restrain, repress, and revenge idolatry, and every step towards it. A brave resolution, and which shews them hearty for their religion, and, we hope, careful and diligent in the practice of it themselves. Corruptions in religion are best dealt with at first, before they get a head, and plead prescription.

3. Their prudence, in prosecution of this zealous resolution, is no less commendable. God had appointed them, in cases of this nature, to inquire and make search, Deut. 13. 14. that they might not wrong their brethren under pretence of righting their religion; accordingly, they resolve here not to send forth their armies to wage war, till they had first sent their ambassadors to inquire into the merits of the cause, and these men of the first rank, one out of each tribe, and Phinehas at the head of them to be their spokesman, v. 13, 14. Thus was their zeal for God tempered, guided, and governed, by the weakness of wisdom. He that knows all things, and hates all evil things, would not punish the worst of criminals, but he would first go down and see, Gen. 18. 21. Many an unhappy strife would be prevented, or soon taken up, by an impartial and favourable inquiry into that which is the matter of the offence. The rectifying of mistakes and misunderstandings, and the setting of misconstrued words and actions in a true light, would be the most effectual way to accommodate both private and public quarrels, and bring them to a happy period.

4. The ambassadors' management of this matter came fully up to the sense and spirit of the congregation concerning it, and bespeaks much both of zeal and prudence.

(1.) The charge they draw up against their brethren, is, indeed, very high, and admits no other excuse than that it was in their zeal for the honour of God, and was now intended to justify the resentments of the congregation at Shiloh, and to awaken the supposed delinquents to clear themselves, otherwise they might have suspected their judgment, or mollified it at least, and not have taken it for granted, as they do here, v. 16. that the building of this altar was a trespass against the God of Israel, and a trespass, no less heinous than the revolt of soldiers from their captain, (to turn from following the Lord), and the rebellion of subjects against their sovereign (that ye might rebel this day against the Lord.) Hard words! It is well they were not able to make good their charge. Let not innocency think it strange to be thus misrepresented and accused; they laid to my charge things that I knew not.

(2.) The aggravation of the crime, charged upon their brethren, is somewhat far-fetched, v. 17. Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us? Probably, that is mentioned, because Phinehas, the first commissioner in this treaty, had signalized himself in that matter, Numb. 25. 7. and because we may suppose they were now about the very place in which that iniquity was committed on the other side Jordan. It is good to recollect and improve those instances of the wrath of God, revealed from heaven against the ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, which have fallen out in our own time, and which we ourselves have been eye-witnesses of. He reminds them of the iniquity of Peor, [1.] As a very great sin, and very provoking to God. The building of this altar seemed but a small matter, but it might lead to an iniquity as bad as that of Peor, and therefore must be crushed in its first rise. Note, The remembrance of great sins, committed formerly, should engage us to stand upon our guard against the least occasions and beginnings of sin: for the way of sin is down hill. [2.] As a sin that the whole congregation had smarted for; There was a plague in the congregation of the Lord, of which, in one day, there died no less than twenty-four thousand. Was not that enough for ever to warn you against idolatry? What! will you bring upon yourselves another plague? Are you so mad upon an idolatrous altar, that you will run yourselves thus upon the sword's point of God's judgments? Does not our camp still feel from that sin, and the punishment of it? We are not cleansed from it unto this day; there are remaining sparks," First, "Of the infection of that sin; some among us so inclined to idolatry, that, if you set up another altar, they will soon take occasion from that, whether you intend it or no, to worship another god." Secondly, "Of the wrath of God against us for that sin: we have reason to fear, that, if we provoke God by another sin to visit, he will remember against us the iniquity of Peor, as he threatened to do that of the golden calf, Exod. 32. 34. And dare you wake the sleeping lion of divine vengeance?" Note, It is a foolish and dangerous thing for people to think their former sins little, too little for them, as those do who add sin to sin, and so treasure up wrath against the day of wrath. Let, therefore, the time past suffice, 1 Pet. 4. 3.

(3.) The reason they give for their concerning themselves so warmly in this matter, is very sufficient; they were obliged to it, in their own necessary defence, by the law of self-preservation; "for, if you revolt from God to-day, who knows but, to-morrow, his judgments may break in upon the whole congregation, v. 18. as in the case of Achan? v. 20. He sinned, and we all smarted for it, by which we should receive instruction, and, from what God did then, infer what we may do, and fear what he will do, if we do not witness against your sin, who are so many, and punish it." Note, The conservators of the public peace are obliged, in justice to the common safety, to use their power for the restraining, and so suppressing, of vice and profaneness, lest, if it be connived at, the sin thereby become national, and bring God's judgments upon the community. Nay, we are all concerned, therefore, to reprove our neighbour when he does amiss, lest we bear sin for him, Lev. 19. 17.

(4.) The offer they make is very fair and kind, v. 19. that if they thought the land of their possession unclean for want of an altar, and therefore could not be easy without one, rather than they should set up another in competition with that at Shiloh, they should be welcome to come back to the land where the Lord's tabernacle was, and settle there, and they would very willingly straiten themselves to make room for them. By this they shewed a sincere and truly pious zeal against schism, that rather than their brethren should have any occasion to set up a separate altar, though their pretence for it, as here supposed, was very weak, and grounded upon a great mistake, yet they were willing to part with a considerable share of the land which God himself had by the lot assigned them, to comprehend them, and take them in among them. This was the spirit of Israelites indeed.

21. Then the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh answered, and said unto the heads of the thousands of Israel, 22. The LORD God of gods, the LORD God of gods, he knoweth, and Israel he shall know; if it be in rebellion, or if in transgression against the LORD, (save us not this day,) 23. That we have built us an altar to turn from following the LORD, or if to offer thereon burnt-offering or meat-offering, or if to offer peace-offerings thereon, let the LORD himself require it; 24. And if we have not rather done it for fear of this thing, saying, In time to come your children might speak unto our children, saying, What have ye to do with the LORD God of Israel? 25. For the LORD hath made Jordan a border between us and you, ye children of Reuben and children of Gad; ye have no part in the LORD: so shall your children make our children cease from fearing the LORD. 26. Therefore we said, Let us now prepare to build us an altar; not for burnt-offering, nor for sacrifice: 27. But that it may be a witness between us and you, and our generations after us, that we might do the service of the LORD before him with our burnt-offerings, and with our sacrifices, and with our peace-offerings; that your children may not say to our children in time to come, Ye have no part in the LORD. 28. Therefore said we, that it shall be, when they should so say to us or to our generations in time to come, that we may say again, Behold the pattern of the altar of the LORD, which our fathers made, not for burnt-offerings, nor for sacrifices; but it is a witness between us and you. 29. God forbid that we should rebel against the LORD, and turn this day from following the LORD, to build an altar for burnt-offerings, for meat-offerings, or for sacrifices, beside the altar of the LORD our God that is before his tabernacle.

We may suppose there was a general convention called of the princes and great men of the separate tribes, to give audience to these ambassadors; or, perhaps, the army, as it came home, were still encamped together in a body, and not yet dispersed; however it was, there were enough to represent the two tribes and a half, and to give their sense.

Their reply to the warm remonstrance of the ten tribes is very fair and ingenuous. They do not retort their charge, upbraid them with the injustice and unkindness of their threatenings, or reproach them for their rash and hasty censures; but give them that soft answer which turns away wrath, avoiding all these grievous words which stir up anger; they demur not to their jurisdiction, nor plead that they were not accountable to them for what they had done, nor bid them mind their own business; but, by a free and open declaration of their sincere intention in what they did, free themselves from the imputation they were under, and set themselves right in the opinion of their brethren; to do which, they only needed to state the case, and put the matter in a true light.

1. They solemnly protest against any design to use this altar for sacrifice or offering, and therefore were far from setting it up in competition with the altar at Shiloh, or from entertaining the least thought of deserting that. They had, indeed, set up that which had the shape and fashion of an altar, but they had not dedicated it to a religious use, had had no solemnity of its consecration, and therefore ought not to be charged with a design to put it to any such use. To gain credit to this protestation, here is,

1. A solemn appeal to God concerning it, with which they begin their defence, intending thereby to give glory to God first, and then to give satisfaction to their brethren, v. 22.

(1.) A profound awe and reverence of God are expressed in the form of their appeal; The Lord God of gods, the Lord God of gods, he knows. Or, as it might be read somewhat closer to the original, The God of gods, Jehovah, the God of gods, Jehovah, he knows; which bespeaks his self-existence and self-sufficiency, he is Jehovah, and has sovereignty and supremacy over all beings and powers whatsoever, even those that are called gods, or that are worshipped. This brief confession of their faith would help to obviate and remove their brethren's suspicion of them, as if they intended to desert the God of Israel, and worship other gods: how could they entertain such a thought, who believed him to be God over all? Let us learn hence always to speak of God with reverence and seriousness, and to mention his name with a solemn pause. Those who make their appeals to Heaven with a slight, careless, "God knows!" have reason to fear lest they take his name in vain, for it is very unlike this here.

(2.) It is a great confidence of their own integrity, which they express in the matter of their appeal. They refer the controversy to the God of gods, whose judgment, we are sure, is according to truth, such as the guilty have reason to dread, and the upright to rejoice in. "If it be in rebellion or transgression that we have built this altar, to confront the altar of the Lord at Shiloh, to make a party, or to set up any new gods or worships;" [1.] "He knows it, v. 22. for he is perfectly acquainted with the thoughts and intents of the heart, and, particularly, with all inclinations to idolatry, Ps. 44. 20, 21. that is in a particular manner before him, we believe he knows it, and we cannot, by any arts, conceal it from him." [2.] "Let him require it, as we know he will, for he is a jealous God." Nothing but a clear conscience would have thus imprecated divine justice to avenge the rebellion, if there had been any. Note, First, In every thing we do in religion, it highly concerns us to approve ourselves to God in our integrity therein, remembering that he knows the heart. Secondly, When we fall under the censures of men, it is very comfortable to be able, with a humble confidence, to appeal to God concerning our sincerity. See 1 Cor. 4. 3, 4.

2. A sober apology presented to their brethren. Israel he shall know. Though the record on high, and the witness in our bosoms, are principally to be made sure for us, yet there is a satisfaction besides, which we owe to our brethren, who doubt concerning our integrity, and which we should be ready to give with meekness and fear. If our sincerity be known to God, we should study likewise to let others know it by its fruits, especially those who, though they mistake us, yet shew a zeal for the glory of God, as the ten tribes here did.

3. A serious abjuration or renunciation of the design which they were suspected to be guilty of. With this they conclude their defence, v. 29. "God forbid that we should rebel against the Lord, as we own we should, if we had set up this altar for burnt-offerings; no, we abhor the thought of it. We have as great a value and veneration for the altar of the Lord at Shiloh, as any of the tribes of Israel have, and are as firmly resolved to adhere to it, and constantly to attend it; we have the same concern that you have for the purity of God's worship, and the unity of his church; far he it, far be it from us, to think of turning away from following God."

II. They fully explain their true intent and meaning in building this altar; and we have all the reason in the world to believe that it is a true representation of their design, and not advanced now to palliate it afterward; as we have reason to think that these same persons meant very honestly, when they petitioned to have their lot on that side Jordan, though then also it was their unhappiness of be misunderstood even by Moses himself.

In their vindication, they make it out, that the building of this altar was so far from being a step toward a separation from their brethren, and from the altar of the Lord at Shiloh, that, on the contrary, it was really designed for a pledge and preservative of their communion with their brethren, and with the altar of God, and a token of their resolution to do the service of the Lord before him, v. 27. and to continue to do so.

1. They gave an account of the fears they had, lest, in process of time, their posterity, being seated at such a distance from the tabernacle, should be looked upon and treated, as strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, v. 24. it was for fear of this thing, and the word signifies a great perplexity and solicitude of mind, which they were in, until they eased themselves by this expedient. As they were returning home, (and we may suppose it was not thought of before, else they would have made Joshua acquainted with their purpose,) some of them in discourse started this matter, and the rest took the hint, and represented to themselves, and one another, a very melancholy prospect of what might, probably, happen in after-ages, that their children would be looked upon by the other tribes as having no interest in the altar of God, and the sacrifices there offered. Now, indeed, they were owned as brethren, and were as welcome at the tabernacle as any other of the tribes; but what if their children after them should be disowned? They, by reason of their distance, and the interposition of Jordan, which it was not easy at all times to pass and repass, could not be so numerous and constant in their attendance on the three yearly feasts as the other tribes, to make a continual claim to the privileges of Israelites, and would therefore be looked upon as inconsiderable members of their church, and by degrees would be rejected, as not members of it at all, so shall your children (who in their pride will be apt to monopolize the privileges of the altar) make our children (who perhaps will not be so careful as they ought to be to keep hold of those privileges) cease from fearing the Lord. Note, (1.) They that are cut off from public ordinances, are likely to lose all religion, and will by degrees cease from fearing the Lord. Though the form and profession of godliness are kept up by many without the life and power of it, yet the life and power of it will not long be kept up without the form and profession of it. You take away grace, if you take away the means of grace. (2.) They who have themselves found the comfort and benefit of God's ordinances, cannot but desire to preserve and perpetuate the entail of them upon their seed, and use all possible precautions that their children after them may not be made to cease from following the Lord, or be looked upon as having no part in him.

2. The project they had to prevent this, v. 26. 28. "Therefore, to secure an interest in the altar of God to those who shall come after us, and to prove their title to it, we said, Let us build an altar, to be a witness between us and you." That, having this copy of the altar in their custody, it might be produced as an evidence of their right to the privileges of the original. Every one that saw this altar, and observed it was never used for sacrifice and offering, would inquire what was the meaning of it, and this answer would be given to that inquiry, that it was built by those separate tribes, in token of their communion with their brethren, and their joint interest with them in the altar of the Lord. Christ is the great Altar that sanctifies every gift; the best evidence of our interest in him will be the pattern of his Spirit in our hearts, and our conformity to him: if we can produce that, it will be testimony for us, that we have a part in the Lord, and an earnest of our perseverance in following him.

30. And when Phinehas the priest, and the princes of the congregation and heads of the thousands of Israel which were with him, heard the words that the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the children of Manasseh spake, it pleased them. 31. And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest said unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the children of Manasseh, This day we perceive that the LORD is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the LORD: now ye have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the LORD. 32. And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, and the princes, returned from the children of Reuben, and from the children of Gad, out of the land of Gilead, unto the land of Canaan, to the children of Israel, and brought them word again. 33. And the thing pleased the children of Israel; and the children of Israel blessed God, and did not intend to go up against them in battle, to destroy the land wherein the children of Reuben and Gad dwelt. 34. And the children of Reuben and the children of Gad called the altar Ed: for it shall be a witness between us that the LORD is God.

We have here the good issue of this controversy, which, if there had not been on both sides a disposition to peace, as there was on both sides a zeal for God, might have been of ill consequence; for quarrels about religion, for want of wisdom and love, often prove the most fierce and most difficult to be taken up. But these contending parties, when the matter was fairly stated and argued, were so happy as to understand one another very well, and so the difference was presently compromised.

1. The ambassadors were exceedingly pleased, when the separate tribes had given in a protestation of the innocency of their intentions in building this altar. (1.) The ambassadors did not call in question their sincerity in that protestation, did not say, "You tell us you design it not for sacrifice and offering, but who can believe you? What security will you give us, that it shall never be so used?" No, charity believes all things, hopes all things, believes and hopes the best, and is very loath to give the lie to any.

(2.) They did not upbraid them with the rashness and unadvisedness of this action; did not tell them, "If you would do such a thing, and with this good intention, yet you might have had that respect for Joshua and Eleazar, as to have advised with them, or at least have made them acquainted with it, and so have saved the trouble and expence of this embassy." But a little want of consideration and good manners should be excused and overlooked in those who, we have reason to think, mean honestly. (3.) Much less did they go about to fish for evidence to make out their charge, because they had once exhibited it, but were glad to have their mistake rectified, and were not at all ashamed to own it. Proud and peevish spirits, when they have passed an unjust censure upon their brethren, though never so much convincing evidence be brought of the injustice of it, will stand to it, and can by no means be persuaded to retract it. These ambassadors were not so prejudiced; their brethren's vindication pleased them, v. 30. They looked upon their innocency as a token of God's presence, v. 31. especially when they found what was done was so far from being an indication of their growing cool to the altar of God, that, on the contrary, it was a fruit of their zealous affection to it; Ye have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the Lord, that is, "You have not, as we feared, delivered them into the hand of the Lord, or exposed them to his judgments by the trespass we were jealous of."

2. The congregation was abundantly satisfied, when their ambassadors reported to them their brethren's apology for what they had done. It should seem they staid together, at least, by their representatives, until they heard the issue; (v. 32.) and when they understood the truth of the matter, it pleased them, (v. 33.) and they blessed God. Note, Our brethren's constancy in religion, their zeal for the power of godliness, and their keeping the unity of the Spirit in faith and love, notwithstanding the jealousies conceived of them as breaking the unity of the church, are things which we should be very glad to be satisfied of, and should make the matter both of our rejoicing and of our thanksgiving; let God have the glory of it, and let us take the comfort of it. Being thus satisfied, they laid down their arms immediately, and were so far from any thoughts of prosecuting the war they had been meditating against their brethren, that we may suppose them wishing for the next feast, when they should meet them at Shiloh.

3. The separate tribes were gratified, and since they had a mind to preserve among them this pattern of the altar of God, though there was not likely to be that occasion for it which they fancied, yet Joshua and the princes let them have their humour, and did not give orders for the demolishing of it, though there was as much reason to fear that it might in process of time be an occasion of idolatry, as there was to hope that ever it might be a preservation from idolatry. Thus did the strong bear the infirmities of the weak. Only, care was taken that they having explained the meaning of their altar, that it was intended for no more than a testimony of their communion with the altar at Shiloh, this explanation should be recorded, which was done according to the usage of those times, by giving a name to it, signifying so much; (v. 34.) they called it Ed, a witness, to that and no more. A witness of the relation they stood in to God and Israel, and of their concurrence with the rest of the tribes in the same common faith, that Jehovah he is God, he and no other. It was a witness to posterity of their care to transmit their religion pure and entire to them, and would be a witness against them if ever they should forsake God, and turn from following after him.

CHAP. XXIII.

In this and the following chapter we have two farewell-sermons, which Joshua preached to the people of Israel a little before his death. Had he designed to gratify the curiosity of succeeding ages, he would rather have recorded the method of Israel's settlement in their new conquests, their husbandry, manufactures, trade, customs, courts of justice, and the constitutions of their infant commonwealth, which one would wish to be informed of; but that which he intended in the registers of this book, was, to entail on posterity a sense of religion and their duty to God; and therefore, overlooking these things which are the usual subjects of a common history, he here transmits to his reader the methods he took to persuade Israel to be faithful to their covenant with their God, which might have a good influence on the generations to come who should read those reasonings, as we may hope they had on that generation which then heard them. In this chapter we have, I. A consecution of the state called, (v. 1, 2.) probably, to consult about the common concerns of their land, and to set in order that which, after some years' trial, being left to their prudence, was found wanting. II. Joshua's speech to them at the opening, or perhaps at the concluding, of the sessions, to hear which was the principal design of their coming together. In it, I. Joshua reminds them of what God had done for them, (v. 3, 4, 9, 14.) and what he was ready to do yet further, v. 5, 10. 2. He exhorts them carefully and resolutely to persevere in their duty to God, v. 6, 8, 11. III. He cautions them against all familiarity with their idolatrous inmates, v. 7. IV. He gives them fair warning of the fatal consequences of it, if they should revolt from God and turn to idols, v. 12, 13, 15, 16. In all which he showed himself zealous for his God, and jealous over Israel with a godly jealousy.

1. AND it came to pass a long time after that the LORD had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies round about, that Joshua waxed old and stricken in age. 2. And Joshua called for all Israel, and for their elders, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers, and said unto them, I am old, and stricken in age: 3. And ye have seen all that the LORD your God hath done unto all these nations because of you; for the LORD your God is he that hath fought for you. 4. Behold, I have divided unto you by lot these nations that remain, to be an inheritance for your tribes, from Jordan, with all the nations that I have cut off, even unto the great sea westward. 5. And the LORD your God, he shall expel them from before you, and drive them from out of your sight; and ye shall possess their land, as the LORD your God hath promised unto you. 6. Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside therefore to the right hand or to the left; 7. That ye come not among these nations, these that remain among you; neither make mention of the name of their gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, nor bow yourselves unto them: 8. But cleave unto the LORD your God, as ye have done unto this day. 9. For the LORD hath driven out from before you great nations and strong; but as for you, no man hath been able to stand before you unto this day. 10. One man of you shall chase a thousand: for the LORD your God, he it is that fighteth for you, as he hath promised you.

As to the date of this edict of Joshua's,

1. No mention at all is made of the place where this general assembly was held; some think it was at Timnath-erah, Joshua's own city, where he lived, and whence, being old, he could not well remove: but it does not appear that he took so much state upon him, therefore it is more probable this meeting was at Shiloh, where the tabernacle of meeting was, and to which place, perhaps, all the males that could, were now come up to worship before the Lord, at one of the three great feasts, which Joshua took the opportunity of, for the delivering of this charge to them.

II. There is only a general mention of the time when this was done. It was long after the Lord had given them rest, but it is not said how long, v. 1. It was, 1. So long as that Israel had time to feel the comforts of their rest and possessions in Canaan, and to enjoy the advantages of that good land. 2. So long as that Joshua had time to observe which way their danger lay of being corrupted, namely, by their intimacy with the Canaanites that remained, against which he is therefore careful to arm them.

III. The persons to whom Joshua made this speech, to all Israel, even their elders, &c. So it might be read, v. 2. They could not all come within hearing, but he called for all the elders, that is, the privy-councillors, which in latter times constituted the great Sanhedrim, the heads of the tribes, that is, the noblemen and gentlemen of their respective countries, the judges learned in the laws, that tried criminals and causes, and gave judgment upon them—and, lastly, the officers or sheriffs, who were intrusted with the execution of those judgments. These Joshua called together, and to them he addressed himself, 1. That they might communicate what he said, or at least the sense and substance of it, to those under them in their respective countries, and so this charge might be dispersed through the whole nation. 2. Because if they would be prevailed with to serve God, and cleave to him, they, by their influence on the common people, would keep them right. If great men be good men, they will help to make many good.

IV. Joshua's circumstances, when he gave them this charge; he was old and stricken in age; (v. 1.) probably it was in the last year of his life, and he lived to be one hundred and ten years old, ch. 24. 29. And he himself takes notice of it, in the first words of his discourse, v. 2. When he began to be old, some years ago, God reminded him of it, (ch. 13. 1.) Thou art old. But now that he did himself feel so much of the decays of age that he needed not to be told of it, he readily speaks of it himself, I am old and stricken in age. He uses it, 1. As an argument with himself to give them this charge, because being old he could expect to be but a little while with them to advise and instruct them, and therefore (as St. Peter speaks, 2 Pet. 1. 13.) as long as he is in this tabernacle, he will take all opportunities to put them in remembrance of their duty, knowing by the increasing infirmities of age, that he must shortly put off this tabernacle, and desiring that after his decease they might continue as good as they were now. When we see death hastening towards us, that should quicken us to do the work of life with all our might. 2. As an argument with them to give heed to what he said. He was old and experienced, and therefore to be the more regarded, for days should speak; he was grown old in their service, and had spent himself for their good, and therefore was to be the more regarded by them. He was old and dying, they would not have him long to preach to them, therefore let them observe what he said now, and lay it up in store for the time to come.

V. The discourse itself, the scope of which is to engage them, if possible, them, and their seed after them, to persevere in the true faith and worship of the God of Israel.

1. He put them in mind of the great things God had done for them, now in his days, and under his administration, for here he goes no further back. And for the proof of this, he appeals to their own eyes, (v. 3.) "Ye have seen all that the Lord your God has done; not what I have done, or what you have done, we were only instruments in God's hand, and what God himself had done by me, and for you." (1.) Many great and mighty nations (as the rate of nations then went) were driven out from as fine a country as any was at that time upon the face of the earth, to make room for Israel. "You see what he has done to these nations who were his creatures, the work of his hands, and whom he could have made new creatures, and fit for his service; yet see what destruction he has made of them because of you, (v. 1.) how he has driven them out from before you, (v. 9.) as if they were of no account with him, though great and strong in comparison with you." (2.) They were not only driven out, (that they might have been, and yet sent to some other country less rich, to begin a new plantation there, suppose to that wilderness in which Israel had wandered so long, and so they had only exchanged seats with them,) but they were trodden down before them; though they held out against them with the greatest obstinacy that could be, yet they were subdued before them, which made the possessing of their land so much the more glorious to Israel, and so much the more illustrious an instance of the power and goodness of the God of Israel, v. 3. "The Lord your God has not only led you, and fed you, and kept you, but he has fought for you as a Man of war," by which title he was known among them when he first brought them out of Egypt, Exod. 15. 3. So clear and cheap were all their victories during the course of this long war, that no man had been able to stand before them, (v. 9.) that is, to make head against them, so as either to put them in fear, create them any difficulty, or give any check to the progress of their victorious arms. In every battle they carried the day, and in every siege they carried the city; their loss before Ai was upon a particular occasion, was inconsiderable, and only served to show them on what terms they stood with God; but otherwise, never was army crowned with such a constant uninterrupted series of successes, as the armies of Israel were in the wars of Canaan. (3.) They had not only conquered the Canaanites, but were put in full possession of their land; (v. 4.) "I have divided to you by lot these nations, both those which are cut off, and those which remain, not only that you may spoil and plunder them. and live at discretion in them for a time, but to be a sure and lasting inheritance for your tribes. You have it not only under your feet, but in your hands."

2. He assures them of God's readiness to carry on, and complete, this glorious work in due time. It is true, some of the Canaanites did yet remain, and in some places were strong and daring, but that should be no disappointment to their expectations, when Israel was so multiplied as to be able to replenish this land, God would expel the Canaanites to the last man, provided Israel would pursue their advantages, and carry on the war against them with vigour, (v. 5.) "The Lord your God will drive them from out of your sight, so that there shall not be a Canaanite to be seen in the land: and even that part of the country which is yet in their hands, ye shall possess." If it were objected, that the men of war of the several tribes being dispersed to their respective countries, and the army disbanded, it would be difficult to get them together when there was occasion to renew the war upon the remainder of the Canaanites; in answer to that, he tells them what little need they had to be in care about the numbers of their forces, (v. 10.) One man of you shall chase a thousand, as Jonathan did, 1 Sam. 14. 13. "Each tribe may venture for itself, and for the recovery of its own lot, without fearing disadvantage by the disproportion of numbers; for the Lord your God, whose all power is, both to inspirit and to dispirit, and who has all creatures at his beck, he it is, that fighteth for you; and how many do ye reckon him for?"

3. He hereupon most earnestly charges them to adhere to their duty, to go on and persevere in the good ways of the Lord, where-in they were so well set out. He exhorts them,

(1.) To be very courageous; (v. 6.) "God fighteth for you against your enemies, do you therefore behave yourselves valiantly for him. Keep, and do with a firm resolution all that is written in the book of the law." He presses upon them no more than what they were already bound to. "Keep with care, do with diligence, and eye what is written with sincerity."

(2.) To be very cautious; "Take heed of missing it, either on the right hand or on the left, for there are errors and extremes on both hands. Take heed of running either into a profane neglect of any of God's institutions, or into a superstitious addition of any of your own inventions." They must especially take heed of all approaches towards idolatry, the sin to which they were first inclined, and would be most tempted, v. 1. [1.] They must not acquaint themselves with idolaters, nor come among them to visit them, or be present at any of their feasts or entertainments, for they could not contract any intimacy, or keep up any conversation, with them, without danger or infection. [2.] They must not show the least respect to any idol, nor make mention of the name of their gods, but endeavour to bury the remembrance of them in perpetual oblivion, that the worship of them may never be revived: let the very name of them be forgotten. "Look upon idols as filthy, detestable things, not to be named without the utmost loathing and detestation." The Jews would not suffer their children to name swine's flesh, because it was forbidden, lest the naming of it should occasion their desiring of it; but if they had occasion to speak of it, they must call it, that strange thing. It is pity, that among christians the names of the heathen gods are so commonly used, and made so familiar as they are, especially in plays and poems: let these names which have been set up in rivalry with God, be for ever loathed and lost. [3.] They must not countenance others in showing respect to them. They must not only not swear by them themselves, but they must not cause others to swear by them, which supposes that they must not make any covenants with idolaters, because they, in the confirming of their covenants, would swear by their idols; never let Israelites admit such an oath. [4.] They must take heed of these occasions of idolatry, lest by degrees they should arrive at the highest step of it, which was serving false gods, and bowing down to them, against the letter of the second commandment.

(3.) To be very constant; (v. 8.) Cleave unto the Lord your God, that is, "delight in him, depend upon him, devote yourselves to his glory, and continue to do so to the end, as you have done unto this day, ever since you came to Canaan;" for, being willing to make the best of them, he looks not so far back as the iniquity of Peor. There might be many things amiss among them, but they had not forsaken the Lord their God, and it is in order to insinuate his exhortation to perseverance with the more pleasing power, that he praises them. "Go on and prosper, for the Lord is with you while you are with him." Those that command, should commend; the way to make people better, is, to make the best of them. "You have cleaved to the Lord unto this day, therefore go on to do so, else you lose the praise and recompence of what you have wrought. Your righteousness will not be mentioned unto you, if you turn from it."

11. Take good heed therefore unto yourselves, that ye love the LORD your God. 12. Else if ye do in any wise go back, and cleave unto the remnant of these nations, even these that remain among you, and shall make marriages with them, and go in unto them, and they to you: 13. Know for a certainty that the LORD your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land which the LORD your God hath given you. 14. And, behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth: and ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the LORD your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof. 15. Therefore it shall come to pass, that as all good things are come upon you, which the LORD your God promised you; so shall the LORD bring upon you all evil things, until he have destroyed you from off this good land which the LORD your God hath given you. 16. When ye have transgressed the covenant of the LORD your God, which he commanded you, and have gone and served other gods, and bowed yourselves to them; then shall the anger of the LORD be kindled against you, and ye shall perish quickly from off the good land which he hath given unto you.

Here,

I. Joshua directs them what to do, that they might persevere in religion, v. 11. Would we cleave to the Lord, and not forsake him, 1. We must always stand upon our guard, for many a precious soul is lost and ruined through carelessness; "Take heed, therefore, take good heed to yourselves, to your souls, (so the word is,) that the inward man be kept clean from the pollutions of sin, and closely employed in the service of God. God has given us precious souls, with this charge, "Take good heed to them, keep them with all diligence, above all keepings." 2. What we do in religion, we must do from a principle of love, not by constraint, or from a slavish fear of God, but of choice, and with delight. "Love the Lord your God, and you will not leave him."

II. He urges God's fidelity to them, as an argument why they should be faithful to him, v. 14. "I am going the way of all the earth, I am old and dying:" to die, is to go a journey, a journey to our long home; it is the way of all the earth, the way that all mankind must go, sooner or later Joshua himself, though so great and good a man, and one that could so ill be spared, cannot be exempted from this common lot. He takes notice of it here, that they might look upon these as his dying words, and regard them accordingly. Or thus, "I am dying, and leaving you, me ye have not always, but if you cleave to the Lord, he will never leave you." Or thus, "Now, that I am near my end, it is proper to look back upon the years that are past; and, in the review, I find, and ye yourselves know it in all your hearts, and in all your souls, by a full conviction on the clearest evidence, and the thing has made an impression upon you," (that knowledge does us good, which is seated, not in the head only, but in the heart and soul, and with which we are duly affected,) "ye know, that not one thing hath failed, of all the good things which the Lord spake concerning you;" (and he speaks a great many;) see ch. 21. 45. God had promised them victory, rest, plenty, his tabernacle among them, &c. and not one thing had failed of all he had promised. "Now," said he, "has God been thus true to you? Be not you false to him." It is the apostle's argument for perseverance, Heb. 10. 23. He is faithful that has promised.

III. He gives them fair warning, what would be the fatal consequences of apostacy, v. 12, 13, 15, 16. "If you go back, know for a certainty it will be your ruin." Observe,

1. How he describes the apostacy which he warns them against. The steps of it would be, v. 12. growing intimate with idolaters, who would craftily wheedle them, and insinuate themselves into their acquaintance, now that they were become lords of the country, to serve their own ends. The next step would be intermarrying with them, drawn to it by their artifices, who would be glad to bestow their children upon these wealthy Israelites. And the consequence of that would be, v. 16. serving their gods, (which were pretended to be the ancient deities of the country,) and bowing down to them. Thus, the way of sin is down hill, and those who have fellowship with sinners, cannot avoid having fellowship with sin. This he represents, (1.) As a base and shameful desertion; "it is going back from what you have so well begun," v. 12. (2.) As a most perfidious breach of promise, v. 16. "It is a transgression of the covenant of the Lord your God, which he commanded you, and which you yourselves set your hand to." Other sins were transgressions of the law God commanded them, but this was a transgression of the covenant that he commanded them, and amounted to a breach of the relation between God and them, and a forfeiture of all the benefits of the covenant.

2. How he describes the destruction which he warns them of. He tells them, (1.) That these remainders of the Canaanites, if they should harbour them, and indulge them, and join in affinity with them, would be snares and traps to them, both to draw them to sin, (not only to idolatry, but to all immoralities, which would be the ruin, not only of their virtue, but of their wisdom and sense, their spirit and honour,) and also to draw them into foolish bargains, unprofitable projects, and all manner of inconveniencies; and having thus, by underhand practices, decoyed them into one mischief or other, so as to gain advantages against them, they would then act more openly, and be scourges in their sides, and thorns in their eyes, would perhaps kill or drive away their cattle, burn or steal their corn, alarm or plunder their houses, and would by all ways possible be vexatious to them: for, whatever pretences of friendship they might make, a Canaanite, unless proselyted to the faith and worship of the true God, would, in every age, hate the very name and sight of an Israelite. See how the punishment would be made to answer the sin, nay, how the sin itself would be the punishment. (2.) That the anger of the Lord would be kindled against them. Their making leagues with the Canaanites, would not only give them the opportunity of doing them a mischief, and be the fostering of snakes in their bosoms, it would likewise provoke God to become their enemy, and would kindle the fire of his displeasure against them. (3.) That all the threatenings of the word would be fulfilled, as the promises had, for the God of eternal truth is faithful to both, v. 15. "As all good things have come upon you according to the promise, so long as you have kept close to God, so all evil things will come upon you

According to the threatening, if you forsake him." Moses had set before them good and evil; they had experienced the good, and were now in the enjoyment of it, and the evil would as certainly come, if they were disobedient. As God's promises are not a fool's paradise, so his threatenings are not bugbears. (4.) That it would end in the utter ruin of their church and nation, as Moses had foretold. This is three times mentioned here. Your enemies will vex you, until ye perish from off this good land, v. 13. Again, "God will plague you, until he have destroyed you from off this good land, v. 15. Heaven and earth will concur to root you out. So that, v. 16. ye shall perish from off the good land." It will aggravate their perdition, that the land from which they shall perish is a good land, and a land which God himself had given them, and which therefore he would have secured to them, if they by their wickedness had not thrown themselves out of it. Thus the goodness of the heavenly Canaan, and the free and future grant God has made of it, will aggravate the misery of those that shall for ever be shut out and perish from it. Nothing will make them see how wretched they are, so much as to see how happy they might have been. Joshua thus sets before them the fatal consequences of their apostacy, that, knowing the terror of the Lord, they might be persuaded with purpose of heart to cleave to him.

CHAP. XXIV.

This chapter concludes the life and reign of Joshua, in which we have, 1. The great cure and pains he took to confirm the people of Israel in the true faith and worship of God, that they might, after his death, persevere therein. In order to this, he called another general assembly of the heads of the congregation of Israel, v. 1. and dealt with them. 1. By way of narrative, recounting the great things God had done for them and their fathers, v. 2. .13. 2. By way of charge to them, in consideration thereof, to serve God, v. 11. 3. By way of treaty with them, wherein he aims to bring them, (1.) To make religion their deliberate choice; and they did so, with reasons for their choice, v. 15. .18. (2.) To make it their determinate choice, and to resolve to adhere to it, v. 19. .24. 4. By way of covenant upon that treaty, v. 25. .28. 11. The conclusion of this history, with, 1. The death and burial of Joshua, v. 29, 30. and Eleazar, v. 33. and the mention of the burial of Joseph's bones upon that occasion, v. 32. 2. A general account of the state of Israel at that time, v. 31.

1. AND Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and called for the elders of Israel, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers; and they presented themselves before God. 2. And Joshua said unto all the people, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood in old time, even Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nachor: and they served other gods. 3. And I took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood, and led him throughout all the land of Canaan, and multiplied his seed, and gave him Isaac. 4. And I gave unto Isaac, Jacob and Esau: and I gave unto Esau mount Seir, to possess it; but Jacob and his children went down into Egypt. 5. I sent Moses also and Aaron, and I plained Egypt, according to that which I did among them; and afterward I brought you out. 6. And I brought your fathers out of Egypt: and ye came unto the sea; and the Egyptians pursued after your fathers with chariots and horsemen unto the Red sea. 7. And when they cried unto the LORD, he put darkness between you and the Egyptians, and brought the sea upon them, and covered them; and your eyes have seen what I have done in Egypt: and ye dwelt in the wilderness a long season. 8. And I brought you into the land of the Amorites, which dwelt on the other side Jordan; and they fought with you: and I gave them into your hand, that ye might possess their land; and I destroyed them from before you. 9. Then Balak the son of Zippor, king of Moab, arose and warred against Israel, and sent and called Balaam the son of Beor to curse you: 10. But I would not hearken unto Balaam; therefore he blessed you still: so I delivered you out of his hand. 11. And ye went over Jordan, and came unto Jericho: and the men of Jericho fought against you, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Girgashites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; and I delivered them into your hand. 12. And I sent the hornet before you, which drove them out from before you, even the two kings of the Amorites; but not with thy sword, nor with thy bow. 13. And I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and oliveyards which ye planted not do ye eat. 14. Now therefore fear the LORD, and serve him in sincerity and in truth: and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt; and serve ye the LORD.

Joshua thought he had taken his last farewell of Israel, in the solemn charge he gave them in the foregoing chapter, when he said, I go the way of all the earth; but God graciously continuing his life longer than he expected, and renewing his strength, he was desirous to improve it for the good of Israel; he did not say, "I have taken my leave of them once, and let that serve;" but, having yet a longer space given him, he summons them together again, that he might try what more he could do to engage them for God. Note, We must never think our work for God done, till our life is done; and if he lengthen out our days beyond what we thought, we must conclude it is because he has some further service for us to do.

The assembly is the same with that in the foregoing chapter, the elders, heads, judges, and officers of Israel, v. 1. But it is here made something more solemn than it was there.

1. The place appointed for their meeting is Shechem, not only because that lay nearer to Joshua than Shiloh, and therefore more convenient, now that he was infirm and unfit for travelling, but because it was the place where Abraham, the first trustee of God's covenant with this people, settled at his coming to Canaan, and where God appeared to him, Gen. 12. 6, 7. and near which stood mount Gerizim and Ebal, where the people had renewed their covenant with God, at their first coming into Canaan, Josh. 8. 30. Of the promises God had made to their fathers, and of the promises they themselves had made to God, this place might serve to put them in mind.

11. They presented themselves, not only before Joshua, but before God, in this assembly; that is, they came together in a solemn religious manner, as into the special presence of God, and with an eye to him speaking to them by Joshua; and, it is probable, the service began with prayer. It is the conjecture of interpreters, that, upon this great occasion, Joshua ordered the ark of God to be brought by the priests to Shechem, which, they say, was but about ten miles from Shiloh, and to be set down in the place of their meeting, which is therefore called, v.26. the sanctuary of the Lord, the presence of the ark making it so at that time; and this was done to grace the solemnity, and to strike an awe upon the people that attended. We have not now any such sensible tokens of the divine presence, but are to believe that where two or three are gathered together in Christ's name, he is as really in the midst of them, as God was where the ark was, and they are indeed presenting themselves before him.

III. Joshua spake to them in God's name, and as from him, in the language of a prophet, v.2. "Thus saith the Lord, Jehovah, the great God, and the God of Israel, your God in covenant, whom therefore you are bound to hear and give heed to." Note, The word of God is to be received by us as his, whoever is the messenger that brings it, whose greatness cannot add to it, nor his meanness diminish from it.

His sermon consists of doctrine and application.

1. The doctrinal part is a history of the great things God had done for his people, and for their fathers before them. God by Joshua recounts the marvels of old; "I did so and so." They must know and consider, not only that such and such things were done, but that God did them. It is a series of wonders that is here recorded, and perhaps many more were mentioned by Joshua, which for brevity's sake are here omitted. See what God had wrought; (1.) He brought Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldees, v.2,3. He and his ancestors had served other gods there, for it was the country in which, though celebrated for learning, idolatry, as some think, had its rise; there the world by wisdom knew not God. Abraham, who afterward was the friend of God, and the great favourite of Heaven, was bred up in idolatry, and lived long in it, till God by his grace snatched him as a brand out of that burning. Let them remember that rock out of which they were hewn, and not relapse into that sin from which their fathers by a miracle of free grace were delivered. "I took him," says God, "else he had never come out of that sinful state." Hence Abraham's justification is made by the apostle an instance of God's justifying the ungodly, Rom.4.5. (2.) He brought him to Canaan, and built up his family, led him through the land to Shechem, where they now were, multiplied his seed by Ishmael, who begat twelve princes, but at last gave him Isaac the promised son, and in him multiplied his seed. When Isaac had two sons, Jacob and Esau, God provided an inheritance for Esau elsewhere in mount Seir, that the land of Canaan might be reserved entire for the seed of Jacob, and the posterity of Esau might not pretend to a share in it. (3.) He delivered the seed of Jacob out of Egypt with a high hand, v.5,6. and rescued them out of the hands of Pharaoh and his host at the Red sea, v.6,7. The same waters were the Israelites' guard, and the Egyptians' grave; and this in answer to prayer; for though we find in the story, that they in that distress murmured against God, Exod.14.11,12. notice is here taken of their crying to God; he graciously accepted those that prayed to him, and overlooked the folly of those that quarrelled with him. (4.) He protected them in the wilderness, where they are here said, not to wander, but to dwell for a long season, v.7. So wisely were all their motions directed, and so safely were they kept, that even there they had as certain a dwelling-place, as if they had been in a walled city. (5.) He gave them the land of the Amorites, on the other side Jordan, v.8. and there defeated the plot of Balak and Balaam against them, so that Balaam could not curse them, as he desired, and therefore Balak durst not fight them, as he designed, and, because he designed it, is here said to do it. The turning of Balaam's tongue to bless Israel, when he intended to curse them, is often mentioned as an instance of the divine power put forth in Israel's favour, as remarkable as any other, because in it God proved (and does still, more than we are aware of) his dominion over the powers of darkness, and over the spirits of men. (6.) He brought them safely and triumphantly into Canaan, delivered the Canaanites into their hand, v.11. sent hornets before them, when they were actually engaged in battle with the enemy, which with their stings tormented them, and with their noise terrified them, so that they became a very easy prey to Israel. These dreadful swarms first appeared in their war with Sihon and Og, the two kings of the Amorites, and afterward in their other battles, v.12. God had promised to do this for them, Exod.23.27,28. And here Joshua takes notice of the fulfilling of that promise. See Exod.23,27,28. Deut.7.20. These hornets, it should seem, annoyed the enemy more than the artillery of Israel, therefore he adds, not with thy sword nor bow. It was purely the Lord's doings. Lastly, They were now in the peaceable possession of a good land, and lived comfortably upon the fruit of other people's labour, v.13.

2. The application of this history of God's mercies to them, is by way of exhortation, to fear and serve God, in gratitude for his favour, and that it might be continued to them, v.14. Now therefore, in consideration of all this, (1.) "Fear the Lord, the Lord and his goodness, Hos.3.5. Reverence a God of such infinite power, fear to offend him, and to forfeit his goodness. Keep up an awe of his majesty, a deference to his authority, a dread of his displeasure, and a continual regard to his all-seeing eye upon you." (2.) "Let your practice be consonant to this principle, and serve him, both by the outward acts of religious worship, and every instance of obedience in your whole conversation, and this in sincerity and truth, with a single eye and an upright heart, and inward impressions, answerable to outward expressions." That is the truth in the inward part which God requires, Ps.51.6. For what good will it do us to dissemble with a God that searches the heart? (3.) "Put away the strange gods, both Chaldean and Egyptian idols, for those they were most in danger of revolting to. It should seem by this charge, which is repeated, v.23. that there were some among them that privately kept in their closets the images or pictures of these dunghill-deities, which came to their hands from their ancestors, as heir-looms of their families, though, it may be, they did not worship them; these Joshua earnestly urges them to throw away. "Deface them, destroy them, lest you be tempted to serve them." Jacob pressed his household to do this, and at this very place; for when they gave him up the little images they had, he buried them under the oak which was by Shechem, Gen.35.2,4. Perhaps the oak mentioned here, v.26. was the same oak, or another in the same place, which might be well called the oak of reformation, as there were idolatrous oaks.

15. And if it seem evil unto you to serve the LORD, choose you this day whom ye will serve; whether the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but as for me and my house, we will serve the LORD. 16. And the people answered and said, God forbid that we should forsake the LORD, to serve other gods; 17. For the LORD our God, he it is that brought us up and our fathers out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage, and which did those great signs in our sight, and preserved us in all the way wherein we went, and among all the people through whom we passed: 18. And the LORD drave out from before us all the people, even the Amorites which dwelt in the land: therefore will we also serve the LORD; for he is our God. 19. And Joshua said unto the people, Ye cannot serve the LORD: for he is an holy God; he is a jealous God; he will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins. 20. If ye forsake the LORD, and serve strange gods, then he will turn and do you hurt, and consume you, after that he hath done you good. 21. And the people said unto Joshua, Nay; but we will serve the LORD. 22. And Joshua said unto the people, Ye are witnesses against yourselves that ye have chosen you the LORD, to serve him. And they said, We are witnesses. 23. Now therefore put away, said he, the strange gods which are among you, and incline your heart unto the LORD God of Israel. 24. And the people said unto Joshua, The LORD our God will we serve, and his voice will we obey. 25. So Joshua made a covenant with the people that day, and set them a statute and an ordinance in Shechem. 26. And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God, and took a great stone, and set it up there under an oak that was by the sanctuary of the LORD. 27. And Joshua said unto all the people, Behold, this stone shall be a witness unto us; for it hath heard all the words of the LORD which he spake unto us: it shall be therefore a witness unto you, lest ye deny your God. 28. So Joshua let the people depart, every man unto his inheritance.

Never was any treaty carried on with better management, nor brought to a better issue, than this of Joshua's with the people, to engage them to serve God: the manner of his dealing with them shews him to be in earnest, and that his heart was much upon it, to leave them under all possible obligations to cleave to Him, particularly the obligation of a choice, and of a covenant.

1. Would it be any obligation upon them, if they made the service of God their choice—he here puts them to their choice; not as if it were antecedently indifferent whether they served God or no, or as if they were at their liberty to refuse his service, but because it would have a great influence upon their perseverance in religion, if they embraced it with the reason of men, and with the resolution of men. These two things he here brings them to.

1. He brings them to embrace their religion rationally and intelligently, for it is a reasonable service. The will of man is apt to glory in its native liberty, and, in a jealousy for the honour of that, adheres with most pleasure to that which is its own choice, and is not imposed upon it; therefore it is God's will that this service should be, not our chance, or a force upon us, but our choice. Accordingly,

(1.) Joshua fairly puts the matter to their choice, v. 15. Where, [1.] He proposes the candidates that stand for the election. The LORD, Jehovah, on one side, and, on the other side, either the gods of their ancestors, which would pretend to recommend themselves to those that were fond of antiquity, and that which was received by tradition from their fathers, or the gods of their neighbours, the Amorites, in whose land they dwell, which would insinuate themselves into the affections of those that were complaisant and fond of good fellowship. [2.] He supposes there were those to whom, upon some account or other, it would seem evil to serve the Lord. There are prejudices and objections which some people raise against religion, which, with those that are inclined to the world and the flesh, have great force. It seems evil to them, hard and unreasonable, to be obliged to deny themselves, mortify the flesh, take up their cross, &c. But, being in a state of probation, it is fit there should be some difficulties in the way, else there were no trial. [3.] He refers it to themselves, "Choose you whom ye will serve, choose this day, now that the matter is laid thus plainly before you, speedily bring it to a head, and do not stand hesitating." Elijah, long after this, referred the decision of the controversy between Jehovah and Baal to the consciences of those with whom he was treating,

1 Kings, 18. 21. Joshua's putting of the matter here to this issue, plainly intimates two things, First, That it is the will of God, we should every one of us make religion our serious and deliberate choice. Let us state the matter impartially to ourselves, weigh things in an even balance, and then determine for that which we find to be really true and good. Let us resolve upon a life of serious godliness, not merely because we know no other way, but because really, upon search, we find no better. Secondly, That religion has so much self-evident reason and righteousness on its side, that it may safely be referred to every man, that allows himself a free thought, either to choose or refuse it; for the merits of the cause are so plain, that no considerate man can do otherwise but choose it. The case is so clear, that it determines itself. Perhaps Joshua designed, by putting them to their choice, thus to try if there were any among them, who, upon so fair an occasion given, would shew a coolness and indifference toward the service of God; whether they would desire time to consider and consult their friends, before they gave in an answer; that, if any such should appear, he might set a mark upon them, and warn the rest to avoid them. [4.] He directs their choice in this matter, by an open declaration of his own resolutions. "But as for me and my house, whatever you do, we will serve the Lord, and I hope you will all be of the same mind." Here he resolves, First, For himself; As for me, I will serve the Lord. Note, The service of God is nothing below the greatest of men; it is so far from being a diminution and disparagement to princes and those of the first rank to be religious, that it is their greatest honour, and adds the brightest crown of glory to them. Observe how positive he is, "I will serve God." It is no abridgment of our liberty to bind ourselves with a bond to God. Secondly, For his house, that is, his family, his children, and servants, such as were immediately under his eye and care, his inspection and influence. Joshua was a ruler, a judge in Israel, yet he will not make his necessary application to public affairs an excuse for the neglect of family religion. Those that have the charge of many families, as magistrates and ministers, must take special care of their own, 1 Tim. 3. 4, 5. I and my house will serve God.

1. "Not my house, without me." He would not engage them to that work, which he would not set his own hand to. As some, who would have their children and servants good, but will not be so themselves; that is, they would have them go to heaven, but intend to go to hell themselves. 2. "Not I, without my house." He supposes he might be forsaken by his people, but in his house, where his authority was greater, and more immediate, there he would over-rule. Note, When we cannot bring as many as we would to the service of God, we must bring as many as we can, and extend our endeavours to the utmost sphere of our activity; if we cannot reform the land, let us put away iniquity far from our own tabernacle. 3. "First, I, and then my house." Note, Those that lead and rule in other things should be first in the service of God, and go before in the best things. Lastly, He resolves to do this, whatever others did. Though all the families of Israel should revolt from God, and serve idols, yet Joshua and his family will steadfastly adhere to the God of Israel. Note, Those that resolve to serve God, must not mind being singular in it, nor be drawn by the crowd to forsake his service. Those that are bound for heaven, must be willing to swim against the stream, and must not do as the most do, but as the best do.

(2.) The matter being thus put to their choice, they immediately determine it by a free, rational, and intelligent, declaration, for the God of Israel, against all competitors whatsoever, v. 16. 18. Here, [1.] They concur with Joshua in this resolution, being influenced by the example of so great a man, who had been so great a blessing to them, v. 13. We also will serve the Lord. See how much good great men might do, if they were but zealous in religion, by their influence on their inferiors. [2.] They startle at the thought of apostatizing from God, v. 16. God forbid! the word intimates the greatest dread and detestation imaginable; "Far be it, far be it from us, that we or our's should ever forsake the Lord to serve other gods. We must be lost to all sense of justice, gratitude, and honour, ere we can harbour the least thought of such a thing." Thus must our hearts rise against all temptations to desert the service of God: Get thee behind me, Satan. [3.] They give very substantial reasons for their choice, to shew that they did not make it purely in compliance to Joshua, but from a full conviction of the reasonableness and equity of it. They make this choice for, and in consideration, First, Of the many great and very kind things God had done for them, bringing them out of Egypt through the wilderness into Canaan, v. 17, 18. Thus they repeat to themselves Joshua's sermon, and then express their sincere compliance with the intentions of it. Secondly, Of the relation they stood in to God, and his covenant with them, "We will serve the Lord, v. 18. for he is our God, who has graciously engaged himself by promise to us, and to whom we have by solemn vow engaged ourselves."

2. He brings them to embrace their religion resolutely, and to express a full purpose of heart to cleave to the Lord. Now that he has them in a good mind, he follows his blow, and drives the nail to the head, that it might, if possible, be a nail in a sure place. Fast bind, fast find.

(1.) In order to this, he sets before them the difficulties of religion, and that in it which might be thought discouraging, v. 19, 20. Ye cannot serve the Lord, for he is a holy God, or, as it is in the Hebrew, he is the holy Gods, intimating the mystery of the Trinity, three in one; holy, holy, holy, holy Father, holy Son, holy Spirit. He will not forgive. And, if ye forsake him, he will do you hurt. Certainly Joshua does not intend hereby to deter them from the service of God, as impracticable and dangerous. But, [1.] He perhaps intends to represent here the suggestions of seducers, who tempted Israel from their God, and from the service of him, with such insinuations as these: That he was a hard Master, his work impossible to be done, and he not to be pleased, and, if displeased, implacable and revengeful; that he would confine their respects to himself only, and would not suffer them to shew the least kindness for any other; and that herein he was very unlike the gods of the nations, which were easy, and neither holy nor jealous. It is probable that this was then commonly objected against the Jewish religion, as it has all along been the artifice of Satan, ever since he tempted our first parents, thus to misrepresent God, and his laws, as harsh and severe; and Joshua, by his tone and manner of speaking, might make them perceive he intended it as an objection, and would put it to them how they would keep their ground against the force of it. Or, [2.] He thus expresses his godly jealousy over them, and his fear concerning them, that, notwithstanding the professions they now made of zeal for God and his service, they would afterward draw back, and, if they did, they would find him just and jealous to avenge it. Or, [3.] He resolves to let them know the worst of it, and what strict terms they must expect to stand upon with God, that they might sit down and count the cost. "Ye cannot serve the Lord, except you put away all other gods, for he is holy and jealous, and will by no means admit a rival, and therefore you must be very watchful and careful, for it is at your peril, if you desert his service; better you had never known it." Thus, though our Master has assured us that his yoke is easy, yet, lest, upon the presumption of that, we should grow remiss and careless, he has also told us that the gate is strait, and the way narrow, that leads to life, that we may therefore strive to enter, and not seek only. "You cannot serve God and mammon; therefore, if you resolve to serve God, you must renounce all competitors with him. You cannot serve God in your own strength, nor will he forgive your transgressions for any righteousness of your own; but all the seed of Israel must be justified and must glory in the Lord alone, as their righteousness and strength, Isa. 45. 24, 25. They must therefore come off from all confidence in their own sufficiency, else their purposes would be to no purpose. Or, [4.] Joshua thus urges on them the seeming discouragements which lay in their way, that he might sharpen their resolutions, and draw from them a promise yet more express and solemn, that they would continue faithful to God and their religion. He draws it from them, that they might catch at it the more earnestly, and hold it the faster.

(2.) Notwithstanding this statement of the difficulties of religion, they declared a firm and fixed resolution to continue and persevere therein, v. 21. Nay, but we will serve the Lord, we will think never the worse of him for his being a holy and jealous God, nor for his confining his servants to worship himself only. Justly will he consume them that forsake him, but we never will forsake him; not only we have a good mind to serve him, and we hope we shall, but we are at a point, we cannot bear to hear any entreaties to leave him, or to turn from following after him, Ruth, 1. 16. in the strength of divine grace, we are resolved that we will serve the Lord." This resolution they repeat with an explication, v. 24. "The Lord our God will we serve, not only he called his servants, and wear his livery, but our religion shall rule us in every thing, and his voice will we obey." And in vain do we call him Master and Lord, if we do not the things which he saith, Luke, 6. 46. This last promise they make, in answer to the charge Joshua gave them, v. 23. that, in order to their perseverance, they should, [1.] Put away the images and relics of the strange gods, and not keep any of the tokens of those other lovers in their custody, if they resolved their Maker should be their Husband; they promise, in this, to obey his voice. [2.] That they should incline their hearts to the God of Israel, use their authority over their own hearts to engage them for God, not only to set their affections upon him, but to settle them so. These terms they agree to, and thus, as Joshua explains the bargain, they strike it, The Lord our God will we serve.

II. The service of God being thus made their deliberate choice, Joshua binds them to it by a solemn covenant, v. 25. Moses had twice publicly ratified this covenant between God and Israel, at mount Sinai, Exod. 24. and in the plains of Moab, Deut. 29. 1. Joshua had likewise done it once, ch. 8. 31, &c. and now the second time. It is here called a statute and an ordinance, because of the strength and perpetuity of its obligation; and because even this covenant bound them to no more than what they were antecedently bound to by the divine command.

Now, to give it the formalities of a covenant, 1. He calls witnesses, no other than themselves, v. 22. Ye are witnesses that ye have chosen the Lord; he promises himself that they would never forget the solemnities of this day, but, if hereafter they should break this covenant, he assures them that the professions and promises they had now made would certainly rise up in judgment against them, and condemn them; and they agreed to it, "We are witnesses; let us be judged out of our own mouths, if ever we be false to our God." 2. He put it in writing, and inserted it, as we find it here, in the sacred canon: he wrote it in the book of the law, v. 26. in that original which was laid up in the side of the ark, and from thence, probably, it was transcribed into the several copies which the princes had for the use of each tribe. There it was written, that their obligation to religion by the divine precept, and that by their own promise, might remain on record together. 3. He erected a memorandum of it, for the benefit of those who perhaps were not conversant with writing, v. 26, 27. He set up a great stone under an oak, as a monument of this covenant, and perhaps wrote an inscription upon it, by which stones are made to speak, signifying the intention of it. When he says, It had heard what was past, he tacitly upbraids the people with the hardness of their hearts, as if this stone had heard to as good purpose as some of them; and, if they should forget what was now done, this stone would so far preserve the remembrance of it, as to reproach them for their stupidity and carelessness, and be a witness against them.

The matter being thus settled, Joshua dismissed this assembly of the grandees of Israel, v. 28. and took his last leave of them, well satisfied in having done his part, by which he had delivered his soul; if they perished, their blood would be upon their own heads.

29. And it came to pass after these things, that

Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the LORD, died, being an hundred and ten years old. 30. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah, which is in mount Ephraim, on the north side of the hill of Gaash. 31. And Israel served the LORD all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that overlied Joshua, and which had known all the works of the LORD, that he had done for Israel. 32. And the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel brought up out of Egypt, buried they in Shechem, in a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor the father of Shechem for an hundred pieces of silver: and it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph. 33. And Eleazar the son of Aaron died; and they buried him in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son, which was given him in mount Ephraim.

This book, which began with triumphs, here ends with funerals, by which all the glory of man is stained.

1. Here is Joseph buried, v. 32. He died about two hundred years before in Egypt, but gave commandment concerning his bones, that they should not rest in their grave until Israel had rest in the land of promise; now therefore the children of Israel, who had brought this coffin full of bones with them out of Egypt, carried it along with them in all their marches through the wilderness, (the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, it is probable, taking particular care of it,) and kept it in their camp till Canaan was perfectly reduced, now at last they deposited it in that piece of ground which his father gave him near Shechem, Gen. 48. 22. Probably, it was upon this occasion that Joshua called out for all Israel to meet him at Shechem, (v. 1.) to attend Joseph's coffin to the grave there; so that the sermon in this chapter served both for Joseph's funeral sermon, and his own farewell sermon; and if it was, as is supposed, in the last year of his life, the occasion might very well remind him of his own death being at hand, for he was now just at the same age that his illustrious ancestor Joseph was arrived at when he died, one hundred and ten years old; compare v. 29, with Gen. 50. 26.

2. Here is the death and burial of Joshua, v. 29, 30. We are not told how long he lived after the coming of Israel into Canaan. Dr. Lightfoot thinks it was about seventeen years; but the Jewish chronologers generally say it was about twenty-seven, or twenty-eight years. He is here called the servant of the Lord, the same title that was given to Moses, (ch. 1. 1.) when mention was made of his death; for though Joshua was in many respects inferior to Moses, yet in this he was equal to him, that, according as his work was, he approved himself a diligent and faithful servant of God. And he that traded with his two talents had the same approbation that he had who traded with five; Well done, good and faithful servant. Joshua's burying-place is here said to be on the north side of the hill of Gaash, or the quaking-hill; the Jews say, it was so called, because it trembled at the burial of Joshua, to upbraid the people of Israel with their stupidity, in that they did not lament the death of that great and good man so as they ought to have done. Thus, at the death of Christ, our Joshua, the earth quaked. The learned Bishop Patrick observes, that there is no mention of any days of mourning for Joshua, as there were for Moses and Aaron, in which, he says, St. Hierom and other of the fathers think there is a mystery, namely, That under the law, when life and immortality were not brought to so clear a light as they are now, they had reason to mourn and weep for the death of their friends; but now, that Jesus, our Joshua, has opened the kingdom of heaven, we may rather rejoice.

3. Here is the death and burial of Eleazar, the chief priest, who, it is probable, died about the same time that Joshua did, as Aaron in the same year with Moses, v. 33. The Jews say that Eleazar, a little before he died, called the elders together, and gave them a charge, as Joshua had done. He was buried in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son, which came to him, not by descent, for then it would have pertained to his father first, nor had the priests any cities in mount Ephraim; but either it fell to him by marriage, as the Jews conjecture, or it was freely bestowed upon him, to build a country-seat on, by some pious Israelite that was well-affected to the priesthood, for it is here said to be given him; and there he buried his dear father.

Lastly, We have a general idea given us of the state of Israel at this time, v. 31. While Joshua lived, religion was kept up among them under his care and influence; but soon after he and his contemporaries died, it went to decay: so much oftentimes does one head hold up. How well is it for the gospel church, that Christ, our Joshua, is still with it, by his Spirit, and will be always, even unto the end of the world!

AN E X P O S I T I O N, WITH Practical Observations, OF THE BOOK OF
J U D G E S.

This is called in the Hebrew Shepher Shophtim, the Book of Judges, which the Syriac and Arabic versions enlarge upon, and call it The Book of the Judges of the Children of Israel; the judgments of that nation being peculiar, so were their Judges, whose office differed vastly from that of the Judges of other nations. The LXX entitle it only Kpural, Judges. It is the history of the Commonwealth of Israel, during the government of the Judges from Othniel to Eli; so much of it as God saw fit to transmit to us. It contains the history (according to Dr. Lightfoot's computation) of two hundred and ninety-nine years; reckoning to Othniel of Judah, forty years; to Ehud of Benjamin, eighty years; to Barak of Naphtali, forty years; to Gideon of Manasseh, forty-years; to Abimelech his son, three years; to Tola of Issachar, twenty-three; to Jair of Manasseh, twenty-two; to Jephthah of Manasseh, six; to Ibzan of Judah, seven; to Elon of Zebulun, ten; to Abdon of Ephraim, eight; to Samson of Dan, twenty: In all, two hundred and ninety-nine. As for the years of their servitude, as where Eglon is said to oppress them eighteen years, and Jabin twenty years, and so some others, those must be reckoned to fall in with some or other of the years of the Judges. The Judges here appear to have been of eight several tribes; that honour was thus diffused, until at last it centred in Judah. Eli and Samnel, the two Judges that fall not within this book, were of Levi. It seems there was no Judge of Reuben or Simeon, Gad or Asher. The history of these Judges, in their order, we have in this book, to the end of ch. 16. And then, in the five last chapters, we have an account of some particular memorable events, which happened, as the story of Ruth did, (Ruth, 1. 1.) in the days when the Judges ruled, but it is not certain in which Judge's days; but they are put together at the end of the book, that the thread of the general history might not be interrupted. Now, as to the state of the commonwealth of Israel during this period,

- I. They do not appear here either so great or so good as one might have expected the character of such a peculiar people should have been; that were governed by such laws, and enriched by such promises. We find them wretchedly corrupted, and wretchedly oppressed, by their neighbours about them, and no where in all the book, either in war, or council, do they make any figure proportionable to their glorious entry into Canaan. What shall we say to it? God would hereby shew us the lamentable imperfection of all persons and things under the sun, that we may look for complete holiness and happiness in the other world, and not in this. Yet,
- II. We may hope, that, though the historian, in this book, enlarges most upon their provocations and grievances, yet there was a face of religion upon the land; and however there were those among them, that were drawn aside to idolatry, yet the tabernacle service, according to the law of Moses, was kept up and there were many that attended it. Historians record not the common course of justice and commerce in a nation, taking that for granted, but only the wars and disturbances that happen; but the reader must consider the other, to balance the blackness of them.
- III. It should seem, that, in these times, each tribe had very much its government in ordinary within itself, and acted separately, without one common head, or council, which occasioned many differences among themselves, and kept them from being or doing any thing considerable.
- IV. The government of the Judges was not constant, but occasional; when it is said that after Ehud's victory the land rested eighty years, and after Barak's forty, it is not certain that they lived, much less that they governed, so long; but they and the rest were raised up and animated by the Spirit of God, to do particular service to the public, when there was occasion.

to avenge Israel of their enemies, and to purge Israel of their idolatries, which are the two things principally meant by their judging Israel. Yet Deborah, as a prophetess, was attended for judgment by all Israel, before there was occasion for her agency in war, ch. 4. 4.

V. During the government of the Judges, God was in a more especial manner Israel's King, so Samuel tells them when they were resolved to throw off this form of government, 1 Sam. 12. 12. God would try what his own law and the constitutions of that would do to keep them in order, and it proved, that, when there was no king in Israel, every man did that which was right in his own eyes; he therefore, toward the latter end of this time, made the government of the Judges more constant and universal than it was at first, and at length gave them David, a king after his own heart; then, and not till then, Israel began to flourish; which should make us very thankful for magistrates, both supreme and subordinate, for they are ministers of God unto us for good. Four of the Judges of Israel are canonized, Heb. 11. 32. Gideon, Barak, Samson, and Jephthah. The learned Bishop Patrick thinks the prophet Samuel was the penman of this Book.

The Punishment of Adoni-bezek.

CHAP. I.

This chapter gives us a particular account of what sort of progress the several tribes of Israel made in the reducing of Canaan after the death of Joshua. He did (as we say) break the neck of that great work, and put it into such a posture, that they might easily have perfected it in due time, if they had not been wanting to themselves; what they did in order hereunto, and wherein they came short, we are here told. I. The united tribes of Judah and Simeon did bravely. 1. God appointed Judah to begin, v. 1, 2. 2. Judah took Simeon to act in conjunction with him, v. 3. 3. They succeeded in their enterprises against Bezek, (v. 4. 7.) Jerusalem, (v. 8.) Hebron and Debir, (v. 9. 15.) Hornah, Gaza, and other places, (v. 17. 19.) 4. Yet, where there were chariots of iron, their hearts failed them, v. 19. Mention is made of the Kenites settling among them, v. 16. II. The other tribes, in comparison with these, acted a cowardly part. 1. Benjamin failed, v. 21. 2. The house of Joseph did well against Beth-el, v. 22. 26. but in other places did not improve their advantages, nor Manasseh, v. 27, 28. nor Ephraim, v. 29. 3. Zebulun spared the Canaanites, v. 30. 4. Asher truckled worse than any of them to the Canaanites, v. 31, 32. 5. Naphtali was kept out of the full possession of several of his cities, v. 33. 6. Dan was straitened by the Amorites, v. 34. No account is given of Issachar, nor of the two tribes and a half on the other side Jordan.

I. NOW after the death of Joshua, it came to pass, that the children of Israel asked the Lord, saying, Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites first, to fight against them? 2. And the Lord said, Judah shall go up: behold, I have delivered the land into his hand. 3. And Judah said unto Simeon his brother, Come up with me into my lot, that we may fight against the Canaanites; and I likewise will go with thee into thy lot. So Simeon went with him. 4. And Judah went up; and the Lord delivered the Canaanites and the Perizzites into their hand: and they slew of them in Bezek ten thousand men. 5. And they found Adoni-bezek in Bezek: and they fought against him, and they slew the Canaanites and the Perizzites. 6. But Adoni-bezek fled; and they pursued after him, and caught him, and cut off his thumbs and his great toes. 7. And Adoni-bezek said, Threescore and ten kings, having their thumbs and their great toes cut off, gathered their meat under my table: as I have done, so God hath requited me. And they brought him to Jerusalem, and there he died. 8. Now the children of Judah, had fought against Jerusalem, and had taken it, and smitten it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire.

Here,

I. The children of Israel consult the oracle of God, for direction, which of all the tribes should first attempt to clear their country of the Canaanites, and to animate and encourage the rest. It was after the death of Joshua: while he lived, he directed them, and all the tribes were obedient to him; but when he died, he left no successor in the same authority that he had had: but the people must consult the breast-plate of judgment, and thence receive the word of command; for God himself, as he was their King, so he was the Lord of their roasts. The question they ask is, Who shall go up first? v. 1. By this time, we may suppose, they were so multiplied, that the places they were in possession of, began to be too strait for them, and they must thrust out the enemy to make room; now they inquire, who should first take up arms. Whether each tribe was ambitious of being first, and so strove for the honour of it, or whether each was afraid of being first, and so strove to decline it, does not appear; but by common consent the matter was referred to God himself, who is the fittest both to dispose of honours, and to cut out work.

II. God appointed that Judah should go up first, and promised him success; (v. 2.) "I have delivered the land into his hand to be possessed, and therefore will deliver the enemy into his hand, that keeps him out of possession, to be destroyed." And why must Judah be first in this undertaking? 1. Judah was the most numerous and powerful tribe, and therefore let Judah venture first. Note, God appoints service according to the strength he has given. Those that are most able, from them most work is expected. 2. Judah was first in dignity, and therefore must be first in duty. He it is whom his brethren must praise, and therefore he it is who must lead in perilous services. Let the burthen of honour and the burthen of work go together. 3. Judah was first served; the lot came up for Judah first, and therefore Judah must first fight. 4. Judah was the tribe out of which our Lord was to spring: so that in Judah, Christ, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, went before them. Christ engaged the powers of darkness first, and foiled them, which animates us for our conflicts; and it is in him that we are more than conquerors. Observe, The service and the success are put together: "Judah shall go up; let him do his part, and then he shall find I have delivered the land into his hand." His service will not avail, unless God give the success; but God will not give the success, unless he vigorously apply himself to the service.

III. Judah hereupon prepares to go up, but courts his brother and neighbour, the tribe of Simeon, (the lot of which tribe fell within that of Judah, and was assigned out of it,) to join forces with him, v. 3. Observe here, 1. That the strongest should not despise, but desire the assistance even of those that are weaker.

Judah was the most considerable of all the tribes, and Simeon the least considerable, and yet Judah begs Simeon's friendship, and prays an aid from him; the head cannot say to the foot, I have no need of thee, for we are members one of another. 2. Those that crave assistance must be ready to give assistance; Come with me into my lot, and then I will go with thee into thine. It becomes Israelites to help one another against Canaanites; and all Christians, even those of different tribes, to strengthen one another's hands against the common interests of Satan's kingdom. Those who thus help one another, in love, have reason to hope that God will graciously help them both.

IV. The confederate forces of Judah and Simeon take the field. Judah went up, (v. 4.) and Simeon with him, v. 3. Caleb, it is probable, was commander in chief of this expedition; for who so fit as he who had both an old man's head, and a young man's hand; the experience of age, and the vigour of youth! Josh. 14. 10, 11. It should seem too, by what follows, that he (v. 10, 11.) was not yet in possession of his own allotment. It was happy for them that they had such a general, as, according to his name, was all heart. Some think that the Canaanites were got together into a body, a formidable body, when Israel consulted who should go fight against them; and that they then began to stir when they heard of the death of Joshua, whose name had been so dreadful to them; but, if so, it proved they did but meddle to their own hurt.

V. God gave them great success. Whether they invaded the enemy, or the enemy first gave them the alarm, the Lord delivered them into their hand, v. 4. Though the army of Judah was strong and bold, yet the victory is attributed to God; he delivered the Canaanites into their hand; having given them authority, he here gives them ability to destroy them—put it in their power, and so tried their obedience to his command, which was utterly to cut them off. Bishop Patrick observes upon this, that we meet not with such religious expressions in the heathen writers, concerning the success of their arms, as we have here and elsewhere in this sacred history. I wish such pious acknowledgments of the Divine Providence were not grown into disuse, at this time, with many that are called Christians. Now, 1. We are told how the army of the Canaanites was routed in the field, in or near Bezek, the place where they drew up, which afterward Saul made the place of a general rendezvous; (1 Sam. 11. 8.) they slew ten thousand men, which blow, if followed, could not but be a very great weakening to those that were brought already so very low. 2. How their king was taken and mortified. His name was Adoni-zedek, which signifies, lord of Bezek. There have been those that called their lands by their own names, (Ps. 49. 11.) but here was one (and there has been many another) that called himself by his land's name. He was taken prisoner after the battle, and we are here told how they used him: they cut off his thumbs, to disfit him for fighting, and his great toes, that he might not be able to run away, v. 6. It had been barbarous thus to triumph over a man in misery, and that lay at their mercy, but that he was a devoted Canaanite, and one that had in like manner abused others, which, probably, they had heard of. Josephus says, "They cut off his hands and his feet," probably supposing those more likely to be mortal wounds, than only the cutting off his thumbs and his great toes. But this indignity, which they did him, extorted from him an acknowledgment of the righteousness of God, v. 7. Where observe, (1.) What a great man this Adoni-bezek had been, how great in the field, where armies fled before him, how great at home, where kings were set with the dogs of his flock; and yet now himself a prisoner, and reduced to the extremity of meanness and disgrace. See how changeable this world is, and how slippery its high places are. Let not the highest be proud, nor the strongest secure, for they know not how low they may be brought before they die. (2.) What desolations he had made among his neighbours; he had wholly subdued seventy kings, to that degree as to have them his prisoners; he that was the chief person in a city was then called a king, and the greatness of their title did but aggravate their disgrace, and fired the pride of him that insulted over them. We cannot suppose that Adoni-bezek had seventy of these petty princes at once his slaves, but, first and last, in the course of his reign, he had thus deposed and abused so many, who perhaps were many of them kings of the same cities that successively opposed him, and whom he thus treated to please his own imperious barbarous fancy, and for a terror to others. It seems, the Canaanites had been wasted by civil wars, and those bloody ones, among themselves, which would very much facilitate the conquest of them by Israel. "Judah," says Dr. Lightfoot, "in conquering Adoni-bezek, did in effect, conquer seventy kings." (3.) How justly he was treated as he had treated others. Thus the righteous God, sometimes, in his providence, makes the punishment to answer the sin, and observes an equality in his judgments; the spoiler should be spoiled, and the treacherous dealer dwelt treacherously with, Isa. 33. 1. And they that showed no mercy shall have no mercy showed them, Jam. 2. 13. See Rev. 13. 10.—18. 6. (4.) How honestly he owned the righteousness of God herein. As I have done, so God has requited me. See the power of conscience, when God by his judgments awakens it, how it brings sin to remembrance, and subscribes to the justice of God. He that in his pride had set God at defiance, now yields to him, and reflects with as much regret upon the kings under his table, as ever he had looked upon them with pleasure, when he had them there. He seems to own that he was better dealt with, than he had dealt with his prisoners; for though the Israelites maimed him, (according to the law of retaliation, an eye for an eye, so a thumb for a thumb,) yet they did not put him under the table to be fed with the crumbs there; because, though the other might well be looked upon as an act of justice, that would have savoured more of pride and haughtiness than did become an Israelite.

VI. Particular notice is taken of the conquest of Jerusalem, v. 8. Our translators judge it spoken of here, as done formerly in Joshua's time, and only repeated on occasion of Adoni-bezek's dying there, and therefore read it, "they had fought against Jerusalem," and put this verse in a parenthesis; but the original speaks of it as a thing now done; and that seems most probable, because it is said to be done by the children of Judah in particular, not by all Israel in general, whom Joshua commanded. Joshua indeed conquered and slew Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem, Josh. 10. but we read not there of his taking the city; probably, while he was pursuing his conquests elsewhere, this Adoni-bezek, a neighbouring prince, got possession of it, whom, having conquered in the field, the city fell into their hands, and they slew the inhabitants, except those who retreated into the castle, and held out there till David's time, and they set the city on fire, in token of their detestation of the idolatry wherewith it had been deeply infected, yet, probably, not so as utterly to consume it, but to leave convenient habitations for as many as they had to put into the possession of it.

9. And afterward the children of Judah went down to fight against the Canaanites, that dwelt in the mountain, and in the south, and in the valley. 10. And Judah went against the Canaanites that dwelt in Hebron: (now the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba:) and they slew Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmai. 11. And from thence he went against the inhabitants of Debir: and the name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher: 12. And Caleb said, He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife. 13. And Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, took it: and he gave him Achsah his daughter to wife. 14. And it came to pass, when she came to him, that she moved him to ask of her father a field:

and she lighted from off her ass; and Caleb said unto her, What wilt thou? 15. And she said unto him, Give me a blessing; for thou hast given me a south-land, give me also springs of water. And Caleb gave her the upper springs and the nether springs. 16. And the children of the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law, went up out of the city of palm-trees with the children of Judah into the wilderness of Judah, which lieth in the south of Arad; and they went and dwelt among the people. 17. And Judah went with Simeon his brother, and they slew the Canaanites that inhabited Zephath, and utterly destroyed it: (And the name of the city was called Hormah.) 19. Also Judah took Gaza with the coast thereof, and Askelon with the coast thereof, and Ekron with the coast thereof. 19. And the LORD was with Judah, and he drove out the inhabitants of the mountain, but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron. 20. And they gave Hebron unto Caleb, as Moses said: and he expelled thence the three sons of Anak.

We have here a further account of that glorious and successful campaign which Judah and Simeon made.

1. The lot of Judah was pretty well cleared of the Canaanites, yet not thoroughly. Those that dwelt in the mountain (the mountains that were round about Jerusalem) were driven out, (v. 9, 19.) but those in the valley kept their ground against them, having chariots of iron, such as we read of, Josh. 17. 16. Here the men of Judah failed, and thereby spoiled the influence, which otherwise their example hitherto might have had on the rest of the tribes, who followed them in this instance of their cowardice, rather than in all the other instances of their courage. They had iron chariots, and therefore it was thought not safe to attack them; but had not Israel God on their side, whose chariots are thousands of angels, (Ps. 68. 17.) before whom these iron chariots would be but as stubble to the fire? Had not God expressly promised by the oracle, (v. 2.) to give them success against the Canaanites in this very expedition, without excepting those that had iron chariots? Yet they suffered their fears to prevail against their faith, they could not trust God under any disadvantages, and therefore durst not face the iron chariots, but meanly withdrew their forces, then when with one bold stroke they might have completed their victories; and it proved of pernicious consequence. They did run well, what hindered them? Gal. 5. 7.

2. Caleb was put in possession of Hebron, which, though given him by Joshua ten or twelve years ago, (as Dr. Lightfoot computes,) yet being employed in public service, for the settling of the tribes, which he preferred before his own private interests, it seems he did not till now make himself master of; so well content was that good man to serve others, while he left himself to be served last; few men are like-minded, for all seek their own, Phil. 2. 20, 21. Yet now the men of Judah all came in to his assistance for the reducing of Hebron, (v. 10.) slew the sons of Anak, and put him in possession of it, v. 20. They gave Hebron unto Caleb. And now Caleb, that he might return the kindness of his countrymen, is impatient to see Debir reduced, and put into the hands of the men of Judah, to expedite which, he proffers his daughter to the person that will undertake to command in the siege of that important place, v. 11, 12. Othniel bravely undertakes it, and wins the town and the lady; (v. 13.) and by his wife's interest and management with her father, gains a very good inheritance for himself and family, v. 14, 15. We had this passage before, Josh. 15. 16. . 19. where it was largely explained and improved.

3. Simeon got ground of the Canaanites in his border, v. 17, 18. In the eastern part of Simeon's lot, they destroyed the Canaanites in Zephath, and called it Hormah; destruction; adding this to some other devoted cities not far off, which they had some time ago, with that reason, called by that name, Numb. 21. 2, 3. And this perhaps was the complete performance of the vow they then made, that they would utterly destroy these cities of the Canaanites in the south. In the western part they took Gaza, Askelon, and Ekron, cities of the Philistines; they gained present possession of the cities, but not destroying the inhabitants, the Philistines in process of time recovered the cities, and proved inveterate enemies to the Israel of God, and no better could come of doing their work by the halves.

4. The Kenites gained a settlement in the tribe of Judah, choosing it there, rather than in any other tribe, because it was the strongest, and there they hoped to be safe and quiet, v. 16. These were the posterity of Jethro, who either went with Israel when Moses invited them, (Numb. 10. 29.) or met them about the same place, when they came up from their wanderings in the wilderness thirty-eight years after, and went with them then to Canaan, Moses having promised them that they should fare as Israel fared, Numb. 10. 32. They had at first seated themselves in the city of palm-trees, that is, Jericho, a city which never was to be rebuilt, and therefore the fitter for them who dwelt in tents, and did not mind building. But afterward they removed into the wilderness of Judah, either out of their affection to that place, because solitary and retired, or out of their affection to that tribe, which perhaps had been in a particular manner kind to them. Yet we find the tent of Jael, who was of that family, far north, in the lot of Naphtali, when Sisera took shelter there, ch. 4. 17. This respect Israel showed them to let them fix where they pleased, being a quiet people, who, wherever they were, were content with a little. They that molested none, were molested by none. Blessed are the meek, for thus they shall inherit the earth.

21. And the children of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites that inhabited Jerusalem; but the Jebusites dwelt with the children of Benjamin in Jerusalem unto this day. 22. And the house of Joseph, they also went up against Beth-el: and the LORD was with them. 23. And the house of Joseph sent to descry Beth-el: (Now the name of the city before was Luz.) 24. And the spies saw a man come forth out of the city, and they said unto him, Show us, we pray thee, the entrance into the city, and we will show thee mercy. 25. And when he showed them the entrance into the city, they smote the city with the edge of the sword; but they let go the man and all his family. 26. And the man went into the land of the Hittites, and built a city, and called the name thereof Luz: which is the name thereof unto this day. 27. Neither did Manasseh drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shean and her towns, nor Taanach and her towns, nor the inhabitants of Dor and her towns, nor the inhabitants of Ibleam and her towns, nor the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns: but the Canaanites would dwell in that land. 28. And it came to pass, when Israel was strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute, and did not utterly drive them out. 29. Neither did Ephraim drive out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer; but the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among them. 30. Neither did Zebulun drive out the inhabitants of Kitron, nor the inhabitants of Nahalol; but the Canaanites dwelt among them, and became tributaries. 31. Neither did Asher drive out the inhabitants of Accho, nor the inhabitants of Zidon, nor of Ahlab, nor of Achzib, nor of Helbah, nor of Aphik, nor of Rehob: 32. But the Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land: for they did not drive them out. 33. Neither did Naphtali drive out the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh, nor the inhabitants of Beth-anath; but he dwelt among the Canaanites; the inhabitants of the land: nevertheless the inhabitants of Beth-shemesh and of Beth-anath became tributaries unto them. 34. And the Amorites forced the children of Dan into the mountain: for they would not suffer them to come down to the valley: 35. But the Amorites would dwell in mount Heres in Aijalon, and in Shaalvim; yet the hand of the house of Joseph prevailed, so that they became tributaries. 36. And the coast of the Amorites was from the going up to Akrabim, from the rock, and upward.

We are here told upon what terms the rest of the tribes stood with the Canaanites that remained.

I. Benjamin neglected to drive the Jebusites out of that part of the city of Jerusalem which fell to their lot, v. 21. Judah had set them a good example, and gained them great advantages by what they did, (v. 9.) but they did not follow the blow for want of resolution.

II. The house of Joseph bestirred themselves a little to get possession of Beth-el, v. 22. That city is mentioned in the tribe of Benjamin, Josh. 18. 22. Yet it is spoken of there, (v. 13.) as a city in the borders of that tribe, and, it should seem, the line went through it, so that one half of it only belonged to Benjamin, the other half to Ephraim; and perhaps the activity of the Ephraimites at this time, to recover it from the Canaanites, secured it entirely to them from henceforward, or at least the greatest part of it, for afterward we find it so much under the power of the ten tribes, (and Benjamin was none of them,) that Jeroboam set up one of his calves in it. In this account of the expedition of the Ephraimites against Beth-el, observe, 1. Their interest in the divine favour. The Lord was with them, and would have been with the tribes, if they would have exerted their strength. The Chaldee reads it here, as in many other places, The Word of the Lord was their Helper, namely, Christ himself, the Captain of the Lord's host, now that they acted separately, as well as when they were all in one body. 2. The prudent measures they took to gain the city. They sent spies to observe what part of the city was weakest, or which way they might make their attack with most advantage, v. 23. These spies got very good information from a man they providentially met with, who showed them a private way into the town, which was therefore left unguarded, because, being not generally known, no danger was suspected on that side. And here, (1.) He is not to be blamed for giving them this intelligence, if he did it from a conviction that the Lord was with them, and that by his donation the land was theirs of right, any more than Rahab was for entertaining those whom she knew to be enemies of her country, but friends to God. Nor, (2.) Are they to be blamed who showed him mercy, gave him and his family not only their lives, but liberty to go wherever they pleased: for one good turn requires another. But, it seems, he would not join himself to the people of Israel, he feared them rather than loved them, and therefore he removed after a colony of the Hittites, which, it should seem, was gone into Arabia, and settled there upon Joshua's invasion of the country; with them this man chose to dwell, and among them he built a city, a small one, we may suppose, such as planters use to build, and in the name of it preserved the ancient name of his native city, Luz, an almond-tree, preferring that before its new name which carried religion in it, Beth-el, the house of God. 3. Their success; the spies brought or sent notice of the intelligence they had gained to the army, which improved their advantages, surprised the city, and put them all to the sword, v. 25. But beside this achievement, it seems, the children of Joseph did nothing remarkable. (1.) Manasseh failed to drive out the Canaanites from several very considerable cities in their lot, and did not make any attempt upon them, v. 27. But the Canaanites being in possession, were resolved not to quit it, they would dwell in that land, and Manasseh had not resolution enough to offer to dispossess them; as if there were no meddling with them, unless they were willing to resign, which it was not to be expected they ever would be. Only as Israel got strength, they got ground, and served themselves, both by their contributions, and by their personal services, v. 28, 35. (2.) Ephraim likewise, though a powerful tribe, neglected Gezer, a considerable city, and suffered the Canaanites to dwell among them, (v. 29.) which, some think, intimates their allowing them a quiet settlement, and indulging them the privileges of an unconquered people, not so much as making them their tributaries.

III. Zebulun, perhaps inclining to the sea-trade, for it was foretold that it should be a haven for ships, neglected to reduce Kitron and Nahalol, (v. 30.) and only made the inhabitants of these places tributaries to them.

IV. Asher quitted itself worse than any of the tribes, (v. 31, 32.) not only in leaving more towns than any of them in the hands of the Canaanites, but in submitting to the Canaanites, instead of making them tributaries; for so the manner of expression intimates, that the Asherites dwelt among the Canaanites, as if the Canaanites were the more numerous, and the more powerful, would still be lords of the country, and the Israelites must be only upon sufferance among them.

V. Naphtali also permitted the Canaanites to live among them, (v. 33.) only by degrees they got them so far under as to exact contributions from them.

VI. Dan was so far from extending his conquests there where his lot lay, that, wanting spirit to make head against the Amorites, he was forced by them to retire into the mountains and inhabit the cities there, but durst not venture into the valley, where, it is probable, the chariots of iron were, v. 34. Nay, and some of the cities in the mountains were kept against them, v. 35. Thus were they straitened in their possessions, and forced to seek for more room at Laish, a great way off, ch. 18. 1, &c. In Jacob's blessing Judah is compared to a lion, Dan to a serpent; now observe how Judah with his lion-like courage prospered and prevailed, but Dan with all his serpentine subtilty could get no ground; craft and artful management do not always effect the wonders they pretend to. What Dan came short of doing, it seems his neighbours the Ephraimites in part did for him; they put the Amorites under tribute, v. 35.

Upon the whole matter, it appears that the people of Israel were generally very careless both of their duty and interest in this thing; they did not what they might have done to expel the Canaanites and make room for themselves. And, 1. It was owing to their slothfulness and cowardice; they would not be at the pains to complete their conquests; like the sluggard, that dreamed of a lion in the way, a lion in the streets, they fancied insuperable difficulties, and frightened themselves with winds and clouds from sowing and reaping. 2. It was owing to their covetousness; the Canaanites' labour and money would do them more good (they thought) than their blood, and therefore they were willing to let them live among them, that they might make a band of them. 3. They had not that dread and detestation of idolatry, which they ought to have had; they thought it pity to put these Canaanites to the sword, though the measure of their iniquity was full; thought it would be no harm to let them live among them, and that they should be in no danger from them. 4. The same thing that kept their fathers forty years out of Canaan, kept them now out of the full possession of it, and that was, unbelief. Distrust of the power and promise of God lost them their advantages, and ran them into a thousand mischiefs.

CHAP. II

In this chapter, we have, I. A particular message which God sent to Israel by an angel, and the impression it made upon them, v. 1..5. II. A general idea of the state of Israel during the government of the Judges. In which observe, 1. Their adherence to God while Joshua and the elders lived, v. 6..10. 2. Their revolt afterward to idolatry, v. 11..13. 3. God's displeasure against them, and his judgments upon them for it, v. 14, 15. 4. His pity toward them, showed in raising them up deliverers, v. 16, 18. 5. Their relapse into idolatry after the judgment was over, v. 17, 19. 6. The full stop God in anger put to their successes, v. 20..23. These are the contents, not only of this chapter, but of the whole book.

1. AND an angel of the LORD came up from Gilgal to Bochim, and said, I made you to go up out of Egypt, and have brought you unto the land which I swear unto your fathers; and I said, I will never break my covenant with you. 2. And ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down their altars: but ye have not obeyed my voice: why have ye done this? 3. Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and their gods shall be a snare unto you. 4. And it came to pass, when the angel of the LORD spake these words unto all the children of Israel, that the people lifted up their voice, and wept. 5. And they called the name of that place Bochim: and they sacrificed there unto the LORD.

It was the privilege of Israel, that they had not only a law in general sent them from heaven, once for all, to direct them into, and keep them in, the way to happiness, but that they had particular messages sent them from heaven, as there was occasion, for reproof, for correction, and for instruction in righteousness, when at any time they turned aside out of that way. Beside the written word which they had before them to read, they often heard a word behind them, saying, This is the way, Isa. 30. 21. Here begins that way of God's dealing with them. When they would not hear Moses, let it be tried whether they will hear the prophets. In these verses we have a very awakening sermon that was preached to them when they began to cool in their religion.

I. The preacher was an angel of the Lord, (v. 1.) not a prophet, not Phinehas, as the Jews conceit; gospel-ministers are indeed called angels of the churches, but the Old-Testament prophets are never called angels of the Lord; no doubt, this was a messenger from heaven. Such extraordinary messengers we sometimes find in this book, employed in the raising up of the Judges that delivered Israel, as Gideon and Samson, and now, to show how various the good offices are they do for God's Israel, here is one sent to preach to them, to prevent their falling into sin and trouble. This extraordinary messenger was sent to command, if possible, their great regard to the message, and to affect the minds of a people, whom nothing seemed to affect but what was sensible. The learned Bishop Patrick is clearly of opinion, that this was not a created angel, but the Angel of the covenant; the same that appeared to Joshua as Captain of the hosts of the Lord, who was God himself. Christ himself, says Dr. Lightfoot; who but God and Christ could say, I made you to go up out of Egypt? Joshua had lately admonished them to take heed of entangling themselves with the Canaanites, but they regarded not the words of a dying man; the same warning therefore is here brought them by the living God himself, the Son of God appearing as an angel. If they slight his servants, surely they will reverence his Son. This angel of the Lord is said to come up from Gilgal, perhaps not walking on the earth, but flying swiftly, as the angel Gabriel did to Daniel, in the open firmament of heaven; but whether walking or flying, he seemed to come from Gilgal, for a particular reason; Gilgal was long their head-quarters after they came into Canaan, many signal favours they had there received from God, and there the covenant of circumcision was renewed, (Mic. 6. 5.) of all which it was designed they should be reminded by his coming from Gilgal. The remembrance of what we have received and heard, will prepare us for a warning to hold fast, Rev. 3. 2, 3.

II. The persons to whom this sermon was preached, were all the children of Israel, v. 4. A great congregation for a great preacher! They were assembled either for war, each tribe sending in its forces for some great expedition, or rather for worship, and then the place of their meeting must be Shiloh, where the tabernacle was, at which they were all to come together, three times a year. When we attend upon God in instituted ordinances, we may expect to hear from him, and to receive his gifts at his own gates. The place is called Bochim, (v. 1.) because it gained that name upon this occasion. All Israel need the reproof and warning here given, and therefore it is spoken to them all.

III. The sermon itself is short, but very close. God here tells them plainly, 1. What he had done for them, v. 1. He had brought them out of Egypt, a land of slavery and toil, into Canaan, a land of rest, liberty, and plenty. The miseries of the one served as a foil to the felicities of the other. God had herein been kind to them, true to the oath sworn to their fathers, had given such proofs of his power as left them inexcusable if they distrusted it, and such engagements to his service as left them inexcusable if they deserted it. 2. What he had promised them; I said, I will never break my covenant with you. When he took them to be his peculiar people, it was not with any design to cast them off again, or to change them for another people at his pleasure; let them but be faithful to him, and they should find him unchangeably constant to them. He told them plainly that the covenant he entered into with them, should never break, unless it broke on their side. 3. What were his just and reasonable expectations from them, v. 2. That being taken into covenant with God, they should make no league with the Canaanites, who were both his enemies and theirs. That having set up his altar, they should throw down their altars, lest they should be a temptation to them to serve their gods. Could any thing be demanded more easy? 4. How they had in this very thing, which he had most insisted on, disobeyed him. "But ye have not in so small a matter obeyed my voice." In contempt of their covenant with God, and their confederacy with each other in that covenant, they made leagues of friendship with the idolatrous, devoted Canaanites, and connived at their altars, though they stood in competition with God's: "Why have ye done this? What account can you give of this perverseness of your's at the bar of right reason? What apology can you make for yourselves, or what excuse can you offer?" They that throw off their communion with God, and have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, know not what they do now, and will have nothing to say for themselves in the day of account shortly. 5. How they must expect to smart by and by for this their folly, v. 3. Their tolerating of the Canaanites among them would, (1.) Put a period to their victories; "You will not drive them out," says God, "and therefore I will not;" thus their sin was made their punishment. Thus they who indulge their lusts and corruptions, which they should mortify, forfeit the grace of God, and it is justly withdrawn from them. If we will not resist the devil, we cannot expect that God should read him under our feet. (2.) It would involve them in continual troubles. "They shall be thorns in your sides to gore you, which way soever you turn, always doing you one mischief or other." Those deceive themselves who expect advantage by friendship with those that are enemies to God. (3.) It would (which was worst of all) expose them to constant temptation, and draw them to sin. "Their gods" (their abominations, so the Chaldee) "will be a snare to you, you will find yourselves wretchedly entangled in an affection to them, and it will be your ruin;" so some read it. Those that approach sin are justly left to themselves to fall into sin, and to perish in it. God often makes men's sin their punishment; and thorns and snares are in the way of the froward, who will walk contrary to God.

IV. The good success of this sermon is very remarkable—the people lifted up their voice, and wept, v. 4. 1. The angel had told them of their sins, which they thus expressed their sorrow for; they lifted up their voice in confession of sin, crying out against their own folly and ingratitude, and wept, as those that were both ashamed of themselves, and angry at themselves, as having acted so directly contrary both to their reason and to their interest. 2. The angel had threatened them with the judgment of God, which they thus expressed their dread of; they lifted up their voice in prayer to God to turn away his wrath from them, and wept for fear of that wrath. They relented upon this alarm, and their hearts melted within them, and trembled at the word, and not without cause. This was good, and a sign that the word they heard made an impression upon them; it is a wonder sinners can ever read their Bibles with dry eyes: but this was not enough; they wept, but we do not find that they reformed, that they went home and destroyed all the remains of idolatry and idolaters among them. Many are melted under the word, that harden again, before they are cast into a new mould. However, this general weeping, (1.) Gave a new name to the place, (v. 5.) they called it Bochim, Weepers, a good name for our religious assemblies to answer. Had they kept close to God and their duty, no voice but that of singing had been heard in their congregation; but, by their sin and folly, they had made other work for themselves, and now nothing is to be heard but the voice of weeping. (2.) It gave occasion for a solemn sacrifice: they sacrificed there unto the Lord, being (as is supposed) met at Shiloh, where God's altar was. They offered sacrifice to turn away God's wrath, and to obtain his favour, and, in token of their dedication of themselves to him, and to him only, making a covenant by this sacrifice. The disease being thus taken in time, and the physic administered working so well, one would have hoped a cure might have been effected. But, by the sequel of the story, it appears to have been too deeply rooted to be wept out.

6. And when Joshua had let the people go, the children of Israel went every man unto his inheritance to possess the land. 7. And the people served the LORD all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that outlived Joshua, who had seen all the great works of the LORD, that he did for Israel. 8. And Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the LORD, died, being an hundred and ten years old. 9. And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-heres, in the mount of Ephraim, on the north side of the hill Gaash. 10. And also all that generation were gathered unto their fathers: and there arose another generation after them, which knew not the LORD, nor yet the works which he had done for Israel. 11. And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the LORD, and served Baalim: 12. And they forsook the LORD God of their fathers, which brought them out of the land of Egypt, and followed other gods, of the gods of the people that were round about them, and bowed themselves unto them, and provoked the LORD to anger. 13. And they forsook the LORD, and served Baal and Ashtaroth. 14. And the anger of the LORD was hot against Israel, and he delivered them into the hands of spoilers that spoiled them, and he sold them into the hands of their enemies round about, so that they could not any longer stand before their enemies. 15. Whithersoever they went out, the hand of the LORD was against them for evil, as the LORD had said, and as the LORD had sworn unto them: and they were greatly distressed. 16. Nevertheless the LORD raised up judges, which delivered them out of the hand of those that spoiled them. 17. And yet they would not hearken unto their judges, but they went a whoring after other gods, and bowed themselves unto them: they turned quickly out of the way which their fathers walked in, obeying the commandments of the LORD; but they did not so. 18. And when the LORD raised them up judges, then the LORD was with the judge, and delivered them out of the hand of their enemies all the days of the judge: for it repented the LORD because of their groanings by reason of them that oppressed them and vexed them. 19. And it came to pass, when the judge was dead, that they returned, and corrupted themselves more than their fathers, in following other gods to serve them, and to bow down unto them; they ceased not from their own doings, nor from their stubborn way. 20. And the anger of the LORD was hot against Israel; and he said, Because that this people hath transgressed my covenant which I commanded their fathers, and have not hearkened unto my voice; 21. I also will not henceforth drive out any from before them of the nations which Joshua left when he died: 22. That through them I may prove Israel, whether they will keep the way of the LORD to walk therein, as their fathers did keep it, or not. 23. Therefore the LORD left those nations, without driving them out hastily; neither delivered he them into the hand of Joshua.

The beginning of this paragraph is only a repetition of what account we had before of the people's good character, during the government of Joshua, and of his death and burial, Josh. 24. 29, 30. which comes in here again only to make way for the following account, which this chapter gives of their degeneracy and apostacy. The angel had foretold that the Canaanites and their idol would be a snare to Israel: now the historian undertakes to shew that they were so, and, that that may appear the more clear, he looks back a little, and takes notice, 1. Of their happy settlement in the land of Canaan. Joshua, having distributed this land among them, dismissed them to the quiet and comfortable possession of it, v. 6. He sent them away, not only every tribe, but every man to his inheritance, no doubt, giving them his blessing. 2. Of their continuance in the faith and fear of God's holy name as long as Joshua lived, v. 7. As they went to their possessions with good resolutions to cleave to God, so they persisted for some time in these good resolutions, as long as they had good rulers that set them good examples, gave them good instructions, and reprov'd and restrained the corruptions that crept in among them; and as long as they had in remembrance the great things God did for them when he brought them into Canaan: they that had seen these wonders had so much sense as to believe their own eyes, and so much reason as to serve that God who had appeared so gloriously on their behalf; but they that followed, because they had not seen, believed not. 3. Of the death and burial of Joshua, which gave a fatal stroke to the interests of religion among the people, v. 8, 9. Yet so much sense they had of their obligations to him, that they did him honour at his death, and buried him in Timnath-heres; so it is called here, not, as in Joshua, Timnath-serah. Heres signifies the sun; a representation of which, some think, was set upon his sepulchre, and gave name to it, in remembrance of the sun's standing still at his word. So divers of the Jewish writers say; but I much question whether an image of the sun would be allowed to the honour of Joshua, at that time, when, by reason of men's general proneness to worship the sun, it would be in danger of being abused to the dishonour of God. 4. Of the rising of a new generation, v. 10. All that generation in a few years wore off, their good instructions and examples died; and were buried with them, and there arose another generation of Israelites, who had so little sense of religion, and were in so little care about it, that, notwithstanding all the advantages of their education, one might truly say, that they knew not the Lord, knew him not aright, knew him not as he had revealed himself, else they would not have forsaken him. They were so entirely devoted to the world; so intent upon the business of it, and so indulgent of the flesh in ease and luxury, that they never minded the true God and his holy religion, and so were easily drawn aside to false gods and their abominable superstitions.

And so he comes to give us a general idea of the series of things in Israel, during the time of the Judges; the same repeated in the same order.

I. The people of Israel forsook the God of Israel, and gave that worship and honour to the dunghill-deities of the Canaanites, which was due to him alone. Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and wonder, O earth! Hath a notion, such a nation, so well fed, so well taught, changed its God, such a God, a God of infinite power, unspotted purity, inexhaustible goodness, and so very jealous of a competitor, for stocks and stones, that could do neither good nor evil? Jer. 2. 11, 12. Never was there such an instance of folly, ingratitude, and perfidiousness. Observe how it is described here, v. 11, 13. In general, they did evil, nothing could be more evil, that is, more provoking to God, nor more prejudicial to themselves; and it was in the sight of the Lord; all evil is before him, but he takes special notice of the sin of having any other god. In particular, 1. They forsook the Lord; (v. 12. and again, v. 13.) this was one of the great evils they were guilty of, Jer. 2. 13. They had been joined to the Lord in covenant, but now they forsook him, as a wife treacherously departeth from her husband. "They forsook the worship of the Lord," so the Chaldee: for they that forsake the worship of God do in effect forsake God himself. It aggravated this, that he was the God of their fathers, so that they were born in his house, and therefore bound to serve him; and that he brought them out of the land of Egypt, he loosed their bonds, and upon that account also they were obliged to serve him. 2. When they forsook the only true God, they did not turn atheists, nor were they such fools as to say, There is no God; but they followed other gods: so much remained of pure nature as to own a God, yet so much appeared of corrupt nature as to multiply gods, and to take up with any, and to follow the fashion, not the rule, in religious worship. Israel had the honour of being a peculiar people, and dignified above all others, and yet so false were they to their own privileges, that they were fond of the gods of the people that were round about them, Baal and Ashtaroth, he-gods and she-gods: they made their court to sun and moon, Jupiter and Juno. Baalim signifies lords, and Ashtaroth, blessed ones, both plural; for, when they forsook Jehovah, who is one, they had gods many, and lords many, as a luxuriant fancy pleased to multiply them. Whatever they took for their gods, they served them, and bowed down to them, gave honour to them, and begged favours from them.

II. The God of Israel was hereby provoked to anger, and delivered them up into the hand of their enemies, v. 14, 15. He was wroth with them, for he is a jealous God, and true to the honour of his own name; and the way he took to punish them for their apostacy, was, to make those their tormentors whom they yielded to as their tempters. They made themselves as mean and miserable, by forsaking God, as they would have been great and happy, if they had continued faithful to him. 1. The scale of victory turned against them. After they forsook God, whenever they took the sword in hand, they were as sure to be beaten as before they had been sure to conquer. Formerly, their enemies could not stand before them, but, wherever they went, the hand of the Lord was for them; when they began to cool in their religion, God suspended his favour, stopped the progress of their successes, and would not drive out their enemies any more, (v. 3.) only suffered them to keep their ground: but now, when they were quite revolted to idolatry, the war turned directly against them, and they could not any longer stand before their enemies. God would rather give the successes to those that had never known nor owned him. Wherever they went, they might perceive that God himself was turned to be their enemy, and fought against them, Isa. 63. 10. 2. The balance of power then turned against them of course. Whoever would, might spoil them; whoever would, might oppress them; God sold them into the hands of their enemies; not only he delivered them up freely, as we do that which we have sold, but he did it upon a valuable consideration, that he might get himself honour as a jealous God, who would not spare even his own peculiar people, when they provoked him. He sold them, as insolvent debtors are sold, (Matth. 18. 25.) by their sufferings to make some sort of reparation to his glory for the injury sustained by their apostacy. Observe how their punishment, (1.) Answered what they had done; they served the gods of the nations that were round about them, even the meanest, and God made them serve the princes of the nations that were round about them, even the meanest. He that is company for every fool, is justly made a fool of by every company. (2.) How it answered what God had spoken. The hand of heaven was thus turned against them, as the Lord had said, and as the Lord had sworn; (v. 15.) referring to the curse and death set before them in the covenant, with the blessing and life. Those that have found God true to his promises, may from thence infer that he will be as true to his threatenings.

III. The God of infinite mercy took pity on them, in their distresses, though they had brought themselves into them by their own sin and folly, and wrought deliverance for them. Nevertheless, though their trouble was the punishment of their sin, and the accomplishment of God's word, yet they were in process of time saved out of their troubles, v. 16, 18. Where observe, 1. The inducement of their deliverance. It came purely from God's pity and tender compassion, the reason was fetched from within himself. It is not said, It repented them because of their iniquities, (for it appears, v. 17. that many of them continued unreformed,) but, It repented the Lord because of their groanings; though it is not so much the burthen of sin, as the burthen of affliction, that they are said to groan under. It was true, they deserved to perish for ever under his curse, yet, this being the day of his patience and our probation, he does not stir up all his wrath. He might, in justice, have abandoned them, but he could not, for pity, do it. 2. The instruments of their deliverance; God did not send angels from heaven to do it, or bring in any foreign power for their rescue, but raised up judges from among themselves, as there was occasion, men to whom God gave extraordinary qualifications for, and calls to, that special service for which they were designed, which was to reform and deliver Israel, and whose great attempts he crowned with wonderful success; the Lord was with the judges when he raised them up, and so they became saviours. Observe, (1.) In the days of the greatest degeneracy and distress of the church, there shall be some whom God will either find or make fit to redress its grievances, and set things to rights. (2.) God must be acknowledged in the seasonable rising up of useful men for public service. He endues men with wisdom and courage, gives them hearts to act and venture. All that are in any way the blessings of their country, must be looked upon as the gifts of God. (3.) Whom God calls, he will own, and give them his presence; whom he rises up, he will be with. The judges of a land are its saviours.

IV. The degenerate Israelites were not effectually and thoroughly reformed, no not by their judges, v. 17. 19. 1. Even while their judges were with them, and active in the work of reformation, there were those that would not hearken to their judges, but at that very time went a whoring after other gods; so mad were they upon their idols, and so obstinately bent to backslide. They had been espoused to God, but broke the marriage-covenant, and went a whoring after false gods. Idolatry is spiritual adultery; so vile and base and perfidious a thing is it, and so hardly are those reclaimed that are addicted to it. 2. Those that in the times of reformation began to amend, yet turned quickly out of the way again, and became as bad as ever. The way they turned out of was that which their godly ancestors walked in, and set them out in; but they soon started from under the influence both of their fathers' good example, and of their own good education. The wicked children of godly parents do so, and will therefore have a great deal to answer for. 3. However, when the judge was dead, they looked upon the dam which checked the stream of their idolatry as removed, and then it flowed down again with so much the more fury, and the next age seemed to be rather the worse for the attempts that were made toward reformation; (v. 19.) They corrupted themselves more than their fathers; strove to outdo them in multiplying strange gods, and inventing profane and impious rites of worship, as it were in contradiction to their reformers. They ceased not from, or, as the word is, they would not let fall, any of their own doings; grew not ashamed of those idolatrous services that were most odious, nor weary of those that were most barbarous; would not so much as diminish one step of their hard and stubborn way. Thus they that have forsaken the good ways of God, which they have once known and professed, commonly grow most daring and desperate in sin, and have their hearts most hardened.

V. God's just resolution hereupon was, still to continue the rod over them. 1. Their sin was, sparing the Canaanites; and this, in contempt and violation of the covenant God had made with them, and the commands he had given them, v. 20. 2. Their punishment was, that the Canaanites were spared, and so they were beaten with their own rod. They were not all delivered into the hand of Joshua while he lived, v. 23. Our Lord Jesus, though he spoiled principalities and powers, yet did not complete his victory at first; we see not yet all things put under him; there are remains of Satan's interest in the church, as there were of the Canaanites in the land; but yet our Joshua lives for ever, and will in the great day perfect his conquests. After Joshua's death, little was done for a long time against the Canaanites; Israel indulged them, and grew familiar with them, and therefore God would not drive them out any more, v. 21. If they will have such inmates as these among them, let them take them, and see what will come of it. God chose their delusions, Isa. 66. 4. Thus men cherish and indulge their own corrupt appetites and passions, and, instead of mortifying them, make provision for them, and therefore God justly leaves them to themselves under the power of their sins, which will be their ruin: So shall their doom be, themselves have decided it. These remnants of the Canaanites were left to prove Israel, (v. 22.) whether they would keep the way of the Lord or not; not that God might know them, but that they might know themselves. It was to try, (1.) Whether they could resist the temptations to idolatry which the Canaanites would lay before them. God had told them they could not, (Deut. 7. 4.) but they thought they could; "Well," said God, "I will try you;" and, upon trial, it was found that the tempter's charms were quite too strong for them. God has told us how deceitful and desperately wicked our hearts are, but we are not willing to believe it, until, by making bold with temptation, we find it too true by sad experience. (2.) Whether they would make a good use of the vexations which the remaining natives would give them, and the many troubles they would occasion them, and would thereby be convinced of sin, and humbled for it, reformed, and driven to God and their duty; whether by continual alarms from them they would be kept in awe, and made afraid of provoking God.

CHAP. III.

In this chapter, I. A general account of Israel's enemies is premised, and of the mischief they did them, v. 1. 7. II. A particular account of the brave exploits done by the three first of the judges. 1. Othniel, whom God raised up to fight Israel's battles, and plead their cause against the king of Mesopotamia, v. 8. 11. 2. Ehud, who was employed in rescuing Israel out of the hands of the Moabites, and did it by stabbing the king of Moab, v. 12. 30. 3. Shongar, who signalled himself in an encounter with the Philistines, v. 31.

1. NOW these are the nations which the LORD left to prove Israel by them, even as many of Israel as had not known all the wars of Canaan; 2. Only that the generations of the children of Israel might know, to teach them war, at the least such as before knew nothing thereof; 3. Namely, five lords of the Philistines, and all the Canaanites, and the Sidonians, and the Hivites that dwelt in mount Lebanon, from mount Baalhermon unto the entering in of Hamath. 4. And they were to prove Israel by them, to know whether they would hearken unto the commandments of the LORD, which he commanded their fathers by the hand of Moses. 5. And the children of Israel dwelt among the Canaanites, Hittites, and Amorites, and Perizzites, and Hivites, and Jebusites: 6. And they took their daughters to be their wives, and gave their daughters to their sons, and served their gods. 7. And the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the LORD, and forgat the LORD their God, and served Baalim and the groves.

We are here told what remained of the old inhabitants of Canaan. 1. There were some of them that kept together in united bodies, unbroken; (v. 3.) The five lords of the Philistines, namely, Ashdod, Gaza, Askalon, Gath, and Ekron, 1 Sam. 6. 17. Three of these cities had been in part reduced, (ch. 1. 18.) but, it seems, the Philistines (probably, with the help of the other two, which strengthened their confederacy with each other from thenceforward) recovered the possession of them. These gave the greatest disturbance to Israel of any of the natives, especially in the latter times of the judges, and they were never quite reduced until David did it. There was a particular nation called Canaanites, that kept their ground, with the Sidonians, upon the coast of the great sea. And in the north the Hivites held much of mount Lebanon, it being a remote corner, in which perhaps they were supported by some of the neighbouring states. But, beside these, 2. There were every where, in all parts of the country, some scatterings of the nations; (v. 5.) Hittites, Amorites, &c. which, by Israel's foolish connivance and indulgence, were so many, so easy, and so insolent, that the children of Israel are said to dwell among them, as if the right had still remained in the Canaanites, and the Israelites had been taken in by their permission, and only as enants at will.

Now concerning these remnants of the natives, observe,

I. How wisely God permitted them to remain. It had been mentioned, in the close of the foregoing chapter, as an act of God's justice, that he let them remain for Israel's correction. But here another construction is put upon it, and it appears to have been an act of God's wisdom, that he let them remain for Israel's real advantage, that those who had not known the wars of Canaan might learn war, v. 1, 2. It was the will of God that the people of Israel should be inured to war, 1. Because their country was exceeding rich and fruitful, and abounded with dainties of all sorts, which, if they were not sometimes made to know hardship, would be in danger of sinking them into the utmost degree of luxury and effeminacy. They must sometimes wade in blood, and not always in milk and honey, lest even their men of war, by the long disuse of arms, should become as soft and as nice as the tender and delicate woman, that would not set so much as the sole of her foot to the ground for tenderness and delicacy; a temper as destructive to every thing that is good, as it is to every thing that is great, and therefore to be carefully watched against by all God's Israel. 2. Because their country lay very much in the midst of enemies, by whom they must expect to be insulted; for God's heritage was as a speckled bird, the birds round about were against her, Jer. 12. 9. It was therefore necessary they should be well disciplined, that they might defend their coasts when invaded, and might hereafter enlarge their coast, as God had promised them. The art of war is best learned by experience, which not only acquaints men with martial discipline, but (which is no less necessary) inspires them with a martial disposition. It was for the interest of Israel to breed soldiers, as it is the interest of an island to breed seamen, and therefore God left Canaanites among them, that, by the lesser difficulties and hardships they met with in encountering them, they might be prepared for greater; and, by running with the footmen, might learn to contend with horses, Jer. 12. 5. Israel was a figure of the church militant, that must fight its way to a triumphant state. The soldiers of Christ must endure hardness, 2 Tim. 2. 3. Corruption is therefore left remaining in the hearts even of good Christians, that they may learn war, may keep on the whole armour of God, and stand continually upon their guard. The learned Bishop Patrick offers another sense of v. 2. that they might know to teach them war, that is, they shall know what it is to be left to themselves. Their fathers fought by a divine power, God taught their hands to war, and their fingers to fight; but, now that they have forfeited his favour, let them learn what it is to fight, like other men.

II. How wickedly Israel mingled themselves with those that did remain. One thing God intended, in leaving them among them, was, to prove Israel, (v. 4.) that those who were faithful to the God of Israel might have the honour of resisting the Canaanites' allurements to idolatry, and that those who were false and insincere might be discovered, and might fall under the shame of yielding to those allurements. Thus, in the Christian churches, there must needs be heresies, that they which are perfect may be made manifest, 1 Cor. 11. 19. Israel, upon trial, proved bad. 1. They joined in marriage with the Canaanites, (v. 6.) though they could not advance either their honour or their estate by marrying with them. They would mar their blood instead of mending it, and sink their estates, instead of raising them, by such marriages. 2. Thus they were brought to join in worship with them; they served their gods, (v. 6.) Baalim and the groves; (v. 7.) that is, the images that were worshipped in groves of thick trees, which were a sort of natural temples. In such unequal matches there is more reason to fear that the bad will corrupt the good, than to hope that the good will reform the bad; as it is in laying two pears together, the one rotten, and the other sound. When they inclined to worship other gods, they forgot the Lord their God. In complaisance to their new relations, they talked of nothing but Baalim and the groves; so that by degrees they lost the remembrance of the true God, and forgot there was such a Being, and what obligations they lay under to him. In nothing is the corrupt memory of man more treacherous than in this, that it is apt to forget God; because, out of sight, he is out of mind; and here begins all the wickedness that is in the world; they have perverted their way, for they have forgotten the Lord their God.

8. Therefore the anger of the LORD was hot against Israel, and he sold them into the hand of Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia: and the children of Israel served Chushan-rishathaim eight years. 9. And when the children of Israel cried unto the LORD, the LORD raised up a deliverer to the children of Israel, who delivered them, even Othniel the son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. 10. And the Spirit of the LORD came upon him, and he judged Israel, and went out to war: and the LORD delivered Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia into his hand; and his hand prevailed against Chushan-rishathaim. 11. And the land had rest forty years. And Othniel the son of Kenaz died.

We now come to the records of the government of the particular judges, the first of which was Othniel, in whom the story of this book is knit to that of Joshua, for even in Joshua's time Othniel began to be famous; by which it appears that it was not long after Israel's settlement in Canaan, before their purity began to be corrupted, and their peace (by consequence) disturbed. And those who have taken pains to inquire into the sacred chronology are generally agreed, that the Danites' idolatry, and the war with the Benjamites for abusing the Levite's concubine, though related in the latter end of this book, happened about this time, under or before Othniel's government, who, though a judge, was not such a king in Israel as would keep men from doing what was right in their own eyes.

In this short narrative of Othniel's government, we have,

I. The distress that Israel was brought into for their sin, (v. 8.) God, being justly displeased with them for plucking up the hedge of their peculiarity, and laying themselves in common with the nations, plucked up the hedge of their protection, and laid them open to the nations; set them to sale as goods he would part with, and the first that laid hands on them was Chushan-rishathaim, king of that Syria which lay between the two great rivers of Tigris and Euphrates, thence called Mesopotamia, which signifies the midst of rivers. It is probable that this was a warlike prince, and, aiming to enlarge his dominions, invaded the two tribes first on the other side Jordan that lay next him, and afterward, perhaps by degrees, penetrated into the heart of the country, and, as far as he went, put them under contribution, exacting it with rigour, and perhaps quartering soldiers upon them. Laban was of this country, who oppressed Jacob with a hard service; but it lay at such a distance, that one could not have thought Israel's trouble should have come from such a far country, which shews so much the more of the hand of God in it.

II. Their return to God in this distress. When he slew them, then they sought him whom before they had slighted. The children of Israel, even the generality of them, cried unto the Lord, v. 9. At first, they made light of their trouble, and thought they could easily shake off the yoke of a prince at such a distance; but, when it continued eight years, they began to feel the smart of it, and then they cried under it, who before had laughed at it. They who in the day of their mirth had cried to Baalim and Ashtaroth, now that they are in trouble, cry to the Lord from whom they had revolted, whose justice brought them into this trouble, and whose power and favour alone could help them out of it. Affliction makes those cry to God with importunity, who before would scarcely speak to him.

III. God's return in mercy to them for their deliverance. Though need drove them to him, he did not therefore reject their prayers, but graciously raised up a deliverer, or saviour, as the word is. Observe, 1. Who the deliverer was; it was Othniel who married Caleb's daughter; one of the old stock that had seen the works of the Lord, and had himself, no question, kept his integrity, and secretly lamented the apostacy of his people, but waited for a divine call to appear publicly for the redress of their grievances. He was now, we may suppose, far advanced in years, when God raised him up to this honour; but the decays of age were no hinderance to his usefulness, when God had work for him to do. 2. Whence he had his commission, not of man, or by man; but the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, v. 10. The spirit of wisdom and courage to qualify him for the service, and a spirit of power to excite him to it, so as to give him and others full satisfaction that it was the will of God he should engage in it. The Chaldee says, The Spirit of prophecy remained on him. 3. What method he took; he first judged Israel, reproved them, called them to an account for their sins, and reformed them, and then went out to war; that was the right method. Let sin at home be conquered, that worst of enemies, and then enemies abroad will be the more easily dealt with. Thus let Christ be our Judge and Lawgiver, and then he will save us, and on no other terms, Isa. 33. 22. 4. What good success he had. He prevailed to break the yoke of the oppression, and, as it should seem, to break the neck of the oppressor; for it is said, The Lord delivered Chushan-rishathaim into his hand. Now was Judah, of which tribe Othniel was, as a lion's whelp gone up from the prey. 5. The happy consequence of Othniel's good services. The land, though not getting ground, yet had rest, and some fruits of the reformation, forty years; and it had been perpetual, if they had kept close to God and their duty.

12. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the LORD: and the LORD strengthened Eglon the king of Moab against Israel, because they had done evil in the sight of the LORD. 13. And he gathered unto him the children of Ammon and Amalek, and went and smote Israel, and possessed the city of palm-trees. 14. So the children of Israel served Eglon the king of Moab eighteen years. 15. But when the children of Israel cried unto the LORD, the LORD raised them up a deliverer, Ehud the son of Gera, a Benjamite, a man left-handed: and by him the children of Israel sent a present unto Eglon the king of Moab. 16. But Ehud made him a dagger which had two edges, of a cubit length; and he did gird it under his raiment upon his right thigh. 17. And he brought the present unto Eglon king of Moab: and Eglon was a very fat man. 18. And when he had made an end to offer the present, he sent away the people that bare the present. 19. But he himself turned again from the quarries that were by Gilgal, and said, I have a secret errand unto thee, O king: who said, Keep silence. And all that stood by him went out from him. 20. And Ehud came unto him; and he was sitting in a summer parlour, which he had for himself alone. And Ehud said, I have a message from God unto thee. And he arose out of his seat. 21. And Ehud put forth his left hand, and took the dagger from his right thigh, and thrust it into his belly: 22. And the haft also went in after the blade; and the fat closed upon the blade, so that he could not draw the dagger out of his belly; and the dirt came out. 23. Then Ehud went forth through the porch, and shut the doors of the parlour upon him, and locked them. 24. When he was gone out, his servants came; and when they saw that, behold, the doors of the parlour were locked, they said, Surely he covereth his feet in the summer chamber. 25. And they tarried till they were ashamed: and, behold, he opened not the doors of the parlour; therefore they took a key, and opened them: and behold, their lord was fallen down dead on the earth. 26. And Ehud escaped while they tarried, and passed beyond the quarries, and escaped unto Seirath. 27. And it came to pass, when he was come, that he blew a trumpet in the mountain of Ephraim, and the children of Israel went down with him from the mount, and he before them. 28. And he said unto them, Follow after me: for the LORD had delivered your enemies the Moabites into your hand. And they went down after him, and took the fords of Jordan toward Moab, and suffered not a man to pass over. 29. And they slew of Moab at that time about ten thousand men, all lusty, and all men of valour; and there escaped not a man. 30. So Moab was subdued that day under the hand of Israel. And the land had rest fourscore years.

Ehud is the next of the judges whose achievements are related in this history, and here is an account of his actions.

1. When Israel sins again, God raises up a new oppressor, v. 12. 14. It was an aggravation of their wickedness, that they did evil again, after they had smarted so long for their former iniquities, promised so fair when Othniel judged them, and received so much mercy from God in their deliverance. What, and after all this, again to break his commandments! Was the disease obstinate to all the methods of cure, both corrosives and lenitives? It seems it was. Perhaps they thought they might make the more bold with their old sins, because they saw themselves in no danger from their old oppressor, the powers of that kingdom were weakened and brought low; but God made them know that he had variety of rods wherewith to chastise them, he strengthened Eglon king of Moab against them. This oppressor lay nearer them than the former, and therefore would be the more mischievous to them; God's judgments thus approached them gradually, to bring them to repentance. When Israel dwelt in tents, but kept their integrity, Balak king of Moab, that would have strengthened himself against them, was baffled; but now that they had forsaken God, and worshipped the gods of the nations round about them, (and perhaps those of the Moabites among the rest,) here was another king of Moab whom God strengthened against them, put power into his hands, though a wicked man, that he might be a scourge to Israel; the staff in his hand with which he beat Israel, was, God's indignation; howbeit he meant not so, neither did his heart think so, Isa. 10. 6, 7. Israelites did ill, and, we may suppose, Moabites did worse, yet, because God punishes the sins of his own people in this world, that, the flesh being destroyed, the spirit may be saved, Israel is weakened, and Moab strengthened.

against them. God would not suffer the Israelites, when they were the stronger, to distress the Moabites, nor give them any disturbance, though they were idolaters; (Deut. 2. 9.) yet now he suffered the Moabites to distress Israel, and strengthened them on purpose that they might: Thy judgments, O God, are a great deep. The king of Moab took to his assistance the Ammonites and Amalekites, (v. 13.) and that strengthened him; and we are here told how they prevailed.

1. They beat them in the field, they went and smote Israel; (v. 13.) not only those tribes that lay next them on the other side Jordan, who, though first settled, being frontier tribes, were most disturbed; but those also within Jordan, for they made themselves masters of the city of palm-trees, which, it is probable, was a strong-hold erected near the place where Jericho had stood, for that was so called, (Deut. 34. 3.) into which the Moabites put a garrison, to be a bridle upon Israel, and to secure the passes of Jordan, for the preservation of the communication with their own country. It was well for the Kenites that they had left this city, (ch. 1. 16.) before it fell into the hands of the enemy. See how quickly the Israelites lost that, by their own sin, which they had gained by miracles of divine mercy.

2. They made them to serve, (v. 14.) that is, exacted tribute from them, either the fruits of the earth in kind, or money in lieu of them. They neglected the service of God, and did not pay him his tribute; thus therefore did God recover from them that wine and oil, that silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal, Hos. 2. 8. What should have been paid to the divine grace, and was not, was distrained for, and paid to the divine justice. The former servitude (v. 8.) lasted but eight years, this eighteen; for, if lesser troubles do not do the work, God will send greater.

11. When Israel prays again, God raises up a new deliverer, (v. 15.) his name Ehud. We are here told, 1. It was a Benjamite. The city of palm-trees lay within the lot of this tribe, by which, it is probable, they suffered the most, and therefore stirred first to shake off the yoke. It is supposed, by the chronologers, that the Israelites' war with Benjamin for the wickedness of Gibeah, by which that whole tribe was reduced to six hundred men, happened before this, so that we may well think that tribe to be now the weakest of all the tribes; yet out of it God raised up this deliverer, in token of his being perfectly reconciled to them, to manifest his own power in ordaining strength out of weakness, and that he might bestow more abundant honour upon that part which lacked, 1 Cor. 12. 24. 2. That he was left-handed, as, it seems, many of that tribe were, ch. 20. 16. Benjamin signifies the son of the right-hand, and yet multitudes of them were left-handed; for men's natures do not always answer their names. The LXX say, he was an ambi-dexter, one that could use both hands alike, supposing that that was an advantage to him in the action he was called to; but the Hebrew phrase, that he was shut of his right hand, intimates, that, either through disease or disuse, he made little or no use of that. but of his left-hand only, and so was the less fit for war, because he must needs handle his sword but awkwardly; yet God chose this left-handed man to be the man of his right hand, whom he would make strong for himself, Ps. 80. 17. It was God's right hand that gained Israel the victory, (Ps. 44. 3.) not the right hand of the instruments he employed.

We are here told what Ehud did for the deliverance of Israel out of the hands of the Moabites. He saved the oppressed by destroying the oppressors, when the measure of their iniquity was full, and the set time to favour Israel was come.

(1.) He put to death Eglon the king of Moab; I say, put him to death; not he murdered or assassinated him, but, as a judge, or minister of divine justice, executed the judgments of God upon him, as an implacable enemy to God and Israel. This story is particularly related.

[1.] He had a fair occasion of access to him; being an ingenious active man, and fit to stand before kings, his people chose him to carry a present in the name of all Israel, over and above their tribute, to their great lord the king of Moab, that they might find favour in his eyes, v. 15. The present is called mincha in the original, which is the word used in the law for the offerings that were presented to God, to obtain his favour; these the children of Israel had not offered, in their season, to the God that loved them; and now, to punish them for their neglect, they are laid under a necessity of bringing their offerings to a heathen prince that hated them. Ehud went on his errand to Eglon, offered his present with the usual ceremony, and expressions of dutiful respect, the better to colour what he intended, and to prevent suspicion.

[2.] It should seem, from the first, he designed to be the death of him, God putting it into his heart, and letting him know also that the motion was from himself, by the Spirit that came upon him, the impulses of which carried with them their own evidence, and so gave him full satisfaction both as to the lawfulness and the success of this daring attempt, of both which he would have had reason enough to doubt. If he be sure that God bids him do it, he is sure both that he may do it, and that he shall do it; for a command from God is sufficient to bear us out, and bring us off, both against our consciences, and against all the world. That he compassed and imagined the death of this tyrant, appears by the preparation he made of a weapon for the purpose; a short dagger, but half a yard long, like a bayonet, which might easily be concealed under his clothes, (v. 10.) perhaps, because none were suffered to come near the king with their swords by their sides. This he wore on his right thigh, that it might be the more ready to his left hand, and might be the less suspected.

[3.] He contrived how to be alone with him; which he might the more easily be, now that he had not only made himself known to him, but ingratiated himself by the present, and the compliments, which, perhaps, on that occasion, he had passed upon him. Observe how he laid his plot. First, He concealed his design even from his own attendants; brought them part of the way, and then ordered them to go forward towards home, while he himself, as if he had forgot something behind him, went back to the king of Moab's court, v. 13. There needed but one hand to do the execution; had more been engaged, they could not so safely have kept counsel, nor so easily have made an escape. Secondly, He returned from the quarries by Gilgal, (v. 19.) from the graven images (so it is in the margin) which were with Gilgal; set up perhaps by the Moabites with the twelve stones which Joshua had set up there. Some suggest that the sight of these idols stirred up in him such an indignation against the king of Moab, as put him upon the execution of that design, which otherwise he had thought to have let fall for the present. Or, perhaps, he came so far as to these images, that, telling from what place he returned, the king of Moab might be the more apt to believe he had a message from God. Thirdly, He begged a private audience, and obtained it in a withdrawing room, here called a summer parlour. He told the king he had a secret errand to him, who, thereupon, ordered all his attendants to withdraw, v. 19. Whether he expected to receive some private instructions from an oracle, or some private information concerning the present state of Israel, as if Ehud would betray his country, it was a very unwise thing for him to be all alone with a stranger, and whom he had reason to look upon as an enemy; but those that are marked for ruin are infatuated, and their hearts hid from understanding; God deprives them of discretion.

[4.] When he had him alone, he soon despatched him. His summer parlour, where he used to indulge himself in ease and luxury, was the place of his execution. First, Ehud demands his attention to a message from God, (v. 20.) and that message was a dagger: God sends to us by the judgments of his hand, as well as by the judgments of his mouth. Secondly, Eglon pays respect to a message from God. Though a king, though a heathen king; though rich and powerful; though now tyrannizing over the people of God; though a fat unwieldy man, that could not easily rise, nor stand long; though in private, and what he did not under observation; yet, when he expected to receive orders from heaven, he rose out of his seat; whether it was low and easy, or whether it was high and stately, he quitted it, and stood up when God was about to speak to him, thereby owning God his Superior. This shames the irreverence of many who are called Christians, and yet whose power and favour alone could help them out of it. Affliction makes those cry to God with importunity, who before would scarcely speak to him.

III. God's return in mercy to them for their deliverance. Though need drove them to him, he did not therefore reject their prayers, but graciously raised up a deliverer, or saviour, as the word is. Observe, 1. Whence he had his commission, not of man, or by man; but the Spirit of the Lord came upon him, v. 10. The spirit of wisdom and courage to qualify him for the service, and a spirit of power to excite him to it, so as to give him and others full satisfaction that it was the will of God he should engage in it. The LXX say, he was an ambi-dexter, one that could use both hands alike, supposing that that was an advantage to him in the action he was called to; but the Hebrew phrase, that he was shut of his right hand, intimates, that, either through disease or disuse, he made little or no use of that. but of his left-hand only, and so was the less fit for war, because he must needs handle his sword but awkwardly; yet God chose this left-handed man to be the man of his right hand, whom he would make strong for himself, Ps. 80. 17. It was God's right hand that gained Israel the victory, (Ps. 44. 3.) not the right hand of the instruments he employed.

We are here told what Ehud did for the deliverance of Israel out of the hands of the Moabites. He saved the oppressed by destroying the oppressors, when the measure of their iniquity was full, and the set time to favour Israel was come.

(1.) He put to death Eglon the king of Moab; I say, put him to death; not he murdered or assassinated him, but, as a judge, or minister of divine justice, executed the judgments of God upon him, as an implacable enemy to God and Israel. This story is particularly related.

[1.] He had a fair occasion of access to him; being an ingenious active man, and fit to stand before kings, his people chose him to carry a present in the name of all Israel, over and above their tribute, to their great lord the king of Moab, that they might find favour in his eyes, v. 15. The present is called mincha in the original, which is the word used in the law for the offerings that were presented to God, to obtain his favour; these the children of Israel had not offered, in their season, to the God that loved them; and now, to punish them for their neglect, they are laid under a necessity of bringing their offerings to a heathen prince that hated them. Ehud went on his errand to Eglon, offered his present with the usual ceremony, and expressions of dutiful respect, the better to colour what he intended, and to prevent suspicion.

[2.] It should seem, from the first, he designed to be the death of him, God putting it into his heart, and letting him know also that the motion was from himself, by the Spirit that came upon him, the impulses of which carried with them their own evidence, and so gave him full satisfaction both as to the lawfulness and the success of this daring attempt, of both which he would have had reason enough to doubt. If he be sure that God bids him do it, he is sure both that he may do it, and that he shall do it; for a command from God is sufficient to bear us out, and bring us off, both against our consciences, and against all the world. That he compassed and imagined the death of this tyrant, appears by the preparation he made of a weapon for the purpose; a short dagger, but half a yard long, like a bayonet, which might easily be concealed under his clothes, (v. 10.) perhaps, because none were suffered to come near the king with their swords by their sides. This he wore on his right thigh, that it might be the more ready to his left hand, and might be the less suspected.

[3.] He contrived how to be alone with him; which he might the more easily be, now that he had not only made himself known to him, but ingratiated himself by the present, and the compliments, which, perhaps, on that occasion, he had passed upon him. Observe how he laid his plot. First, He concealed his design even from his own attendants; brought them part of the way, and then ordered them to go forward towards home, while he himself, as if he had forgot something behind him, went back to the king of Moab's court, v. 18. There needed but one hand to do the execution; had more been engaged, they could not so safely have kept counsel, nor so easily have made an escape. Secondly, He returned from the quarries by Gilgal, (v. 19.) from the graven images (so it is in the margin) which were with Gilgal; set up perhaps by the Moabites with the twelve stones which Joshua had set up there. Some suggest that the sight of these idols stirred up in him such an indignation against the king of Moab, as put him upon the execution of that design, which otherwise he had thought to have let fall for the present. Or, perhaps, he came so far as to these images, that, telling from what place he returned, the king of Moab might be the more apt to believe he had a message from God. Thirdly, He begged a private audience, and obtained it in a withdrawing room, here called a summer parlour. He told the king he had a secret errand to him, who, thereupon, ordered all his attendants to withdraw, v. 19. Whether he expected to receive some private instructions from an oracle, or some private information concerning the present state of Israel, as if Ehud would betray his country, it was a very unwise thing for him to be all alone with a stranger, and whom he had reason to look upon as an enemy; but those that are marked for ruin are infatuated, and their hearts hid from understanding; God deprives them of discretion.

[4.] When he had him alone, he soon despatched him. His summer parlour, where he used to indulge himself in ease and luxury, was the place of his execution. First, Ehud demands his attention to a message from God, (v. 20.) and that message was a dagger: God sends to us by the judgments of his hand, as well as by the judgments of his mouth. Secondly, Eglon pays respect to a message from God. Though a king, though a heathen king; though rich and powerful; though now tyrannizing over the people of God; though a fat unwieldy man, that could not easily rise, nor stand long; though in private, and what he did not under observation; yet, when he expected to receive orders from heaven, he rose out of his seat; whether it was low and easy, or whether it was high and stately, he quitted it, and stood up when God was about to speak to him, thereby owning God his Superior. This shames the irreverence of many who are called Christians, and yet when a message from God is delivered to them, study to shew, by all the marks of carelessness, how little they regard it. Ehud, in calling what he had to do a message from God, plainly avouches a divine commission for it; and God's inclining Eglon to stand up to it, did both confirm the commission, and facilitate the execution. Thirdly, The message was delivered, not to his ear, but immediately, and literally, to his heart, into which the fatal knife was thrust, and was left there, v. 21, 22. His extreme fatness made him unable to resist, or to help himself; probably, it was the effect of his luxury and excess; and when the fat closed up the blade, God would by that circumstance shew how those that pamper the body do but prepare for their own misery. However, it was an emblem of his carnal security and senselessness. His heart was as fat as grease, and in that he thought himself enclosed. See Ps. 119. 70.—17. 10. Eglon signifies a calves, and he fell like a fated calf, by the knife, an acceptable sacrifice to divine justice. Notice is taken of the coming out of the dirt, or dung, that the death of this proud tyrant may appear the more ignominious and shameful. He that had been so very nice and curious about his own body, to keep it easy and clean, shall now be found wallowing in his own blood and excrements. Thus does God pour contempt upon princes. Now this act of Ehud's, 1. May justify itself, because he had special direction from God to do it, and it was agreeable to the usual method, which, under that dispensation, God took to avenge his people of their enemies, and to manifest to the world his own justice. But, 2. It will by no means justify any now in doing the like. No such commissions are now given, and to pretend to them is to blaspheme God, and make him patronise the worst of villainies. Christ bid Peter sheathe the sword, and we find not that he bid him draw it again.

[5.] Providence wonderfully favoured his escape, when he had done the execution. First, The tyrant fell silently, without any shriek or outcry, which might have been overheard by his servants at a distance. How silently does he go down to the pit, choked up, it may be, with his own fat, which stifled his dying groans, though he had made so great a noise in the world, and had been the terror of the mighty in the land of the living. Secondly, The heroic executioner of this vengeance, with such a presence of mind, as discovered not only no consciousness of guilt, but a strong confidence in the divine protection, shut the doors after him, took the key with him, and passed through the guards with such an air of innocence, and boldness, and unconcernedness, as made them not at all to suspect his having done any thing amiss. Thirdly, The servants that attended in the antechamber, coming to the door of the inner parlour, when Ehud was gone, to know their master's pleasure, and finding it locked, and all quiet, they concluded he was lain down to sleep, had covered his feet upon his couch, and was gone to consult his pillow about the message he had received, and to dream upon it, (v. 24.) and therefore would not offer to open the door. Thus, by their care not to disturb his sleep, they lost the opportunity of revenging his death. See what comes of men's taking state too much, and obliging those about them to keep their distance; some time or other, it may come against them more than they think of. Fourthly, The servants at length opened the door, and found their master had slept indeed his long sleep, v. 25. The horror of this tragical spectacle, and the confusion it must needs put them into, to reflect upon their own inconsideration in not opening the door sooner, quite put by the thoughts of sending pursuers after him that had done it, whom now they despaired of overtaking. Lastly, Ehud by this means made his escape to Sierath, a thick wood; so some, v. 26. It is not said, any where in this story, what was the place in which Eglon lived now; but there being no mention of Ehud's passing and repassing Jordan, I am inclined to think that Eglon had left his own country of Moab, on the other side Jordan, and made his principal residence at this time in the city of palm-trees, within the land of Canaan, a richer country than his own, and that there he was slain, and then the quarries by Gilgal were not far off him. There where he had settled himself, and thought he had sufficiently fortified himself to lord it over the people of God, there he was cut

(2.) Ehud, having slain the king of Moab, gave a total rout to the forces of the Moabites that were among them, and so effectually shook off the yoke of their oppression. [1.] He raised an army immediately in mount Ephraim, at some distance from the head-quarters of the Moabites, and headed them himself, v. 27. The trumpet he blew was indeed a jubilee-trumpet, proclaiming liberty, and a joyful sound it was to the oppressed Israelites, who for a long time had heard no other trumpets than those of their enemies. [2.] Like a pious man, and as one that did all this in faith, he took encouragement himself, and gave encouragement to his soldiers. from the power of God engaged for them; (v. 28.) "Follow me, for the Lord hath delivered your enemies into your hands; we are sure to have God with us, and therefore may go on boldly, and shall go on triumphantly." [3.] Like a politic general, he first secured the fords of Jordan, set strong guards upon all those passes, to cut off communications between the Moabites that were in the land of Israel, (for upon them only his design was,) and their own country on the other side Jordan; that if, upon the alarm given them, they resolved to fly, they might not escape thither, and if they resolved to fight, they might not have assistance thence. Thus he shut them up in that land as their prison, in which they were pleasing themselves as their palace and paradise. [4.] He then fell upon them, and put them all to the sword, ten thousand of them, which, it seems, was the number appointed to keep Israel in subjection; (v. 29.) There escaped not a man of them. And they were the best and choicest of all the king of Moab's forces; all lusty men, men of bulk and stature, and not only able bodied, but high spirited too, and men of valour, v. 29. But neither their strength nor their courage stood them in any stead, when the set time was come for God to deliver them into the hand of Israel. [5.] The consequence of this victory was, that the power of the Moabites was wholly broken in the land of Israel; the country was cleared of these oppressors, and the land had rest eighty years, v. 30. We may hope that there was likewise a reformation among them, and a check given to idolatry, by the influence of Ehud, which continued a good part of this time. It was a great while for the land to rest, fourscore years; yet what is that to the saints' everlasting rest in the heavenly Canaan?

31. And after him was Shamgar the son of Anath, which slew of the Philistines six hundred men with an ox-goad: and he also delivered Israel.

When it was said the land had rest eighty years, some think it is meant chiefly of that part of the land which lay eastward on the banks of Jordan, which had been oppressed by the Moabites; but it seems, by this passage here, that the other side of the country, which lay south-west, was in that time infested by the Philistines, against whom Shamgar made head.

1. It seems Israel needed deliverance, for he delivered Israel; how great the distress was, Deborah afterward related in her song, (ch. 5. 6.) that in the days of Shamgar the highways were unoccupied, &c. That part of the country which lay next to the Philistines was so infested with plunderers, that people could not travel the roads in safety, but were in danger of being set upon and robbed; nor durst they dwell in the unguarded villages, but were forced to take shelter in the fortified cities.

2. God raised them up to deliver them, as it should seem, while Ehud was yet living, but superannuated. So inconsiderable were the enemies for number, that it seems the killing of six hundred of them amounted to a deliverance of Israel, and so many he slew with an ox-goad, or, as some read it, a plough-share. It is probable that he was himself following the plough, when the Philistines made an inroad upon the country to ravage it, and God put it into his heart to oppose them: the impulse being sudden and strong, and having neither sword nor spear to do execution with, he took the instrument that was next at hand, some of the tools of his plough, and with that killed so many hundred men, and came off unhurt. See here, (1.) That God can make those eminently serviceable to his glory and his church's good, whose extraction, education, and employment, are very mean and obscure. He that has the residue of the Spirit, could, when he pleased, make ploughmen judges and generals, and fishermen apostles. (2.) It is no matter how weak the weapon is, if God direct and strengthen the arm. An ox-goad, when God pleases, shall do more than Goliath's sword. And sometimes he chooses to work by such unlikely means, that the excellency of the power may appear to be of God.

CHAP. IV.

The method of the history of Deborah and Barak, (the heroes in this chapter,) is the same with that before. Here is, I. Israel revolted from God, v. 1. II. Israel oppressed by Jabin, v. 2, 3. III. Israel judged by Deborah, v. 4, 5. IV. Israel rescued out of the hands of Jabin. 1. Their deliverance is concerted between Deborah and Barak, v. 6..9. 2. It is accomplished by their joint agency. Barak takes the field; (v. 10.) Sisera, Jabin's general, meets him; (v. 12, 13.) Deborah encourages him, (v. 14.) and God gives him a complete victory. The army routed, v. 15, 16. The general forced to flee; (v. 17.) and there, where he expected shelter, had his life stolen from him by Jael while he was asleep, (v. 18..21.) which completes Barak's triumph, (v. 22.) and Israel's deliverance, v. 23, 24.

1. AND the children of Israel again did evil in the sight of the LORD, when Ehud was dead. 2. And the LORD sold them into the hand of Jabin king of Canaan, that reigned in Hazor; the captain of whose host was Sisera, which dwelt in Harosheth of the Gentiles. 3. And the children of Israel cried unto the LORD: for he had nine hundred chariots of iron; and twenty years he mightily oppressed the children of Israel.

Here is,

I. Israel backsliding from God; They again did evil in his sight, forsook his service, and worshipped idols; for that was the sin which now most easily beset them, v. 1. See in this, 1. The strange strength of corruption, which hurries men into sin, notwithstanding the most frequent instances of its fatal consequences. The bent to backslide is very hardly restrained. 2. The common ill effects of a long peace. The land had rest eighty years, which should have confirmed them in their religion; but, on the contrary, it made them secure and wanton, and indulgent of those lusts which the worship of the false gods was calculated for the gratification of. Thus the prosperity of fools destroys them. Jeshurun waxeth fat and kicketh. 3. The great loss which the people sustain by the death of good governors. They did evil, because Ehud was dead. So it may be read. He kept a strict eye upon them, restrained and punished every thing that looked towards idolatry, and kept them close to God's service. But when he was gone, they revolted, fearing him more than God.

II. Israel oppressed by their enemies. When they forsook God, he forsook them; and then they became an easy prey to every spoiler. They alienated themselves from God, as if he were none of their's; and then God alienated them as none of his. They that threw themselves out of God's service, threw themselves out of his protection. What has my beloved to do in my house, when she has thus played the harlot? Jer. 11. 15. He sold them into the hands of Jabin, v. 2. This Jabin reigned in Hazor, as another of the same name, and perhaps his ancestor, had done before him, whom Joshua routed, slew, and burnt his city, Josh. 11. 1, 10. But it seems, in process of time, the city was rebuilt, the power regained, the loss retrieved, and, by degrees, the king of Hazor becomes able to tyrannize over Israel, who by sin had lost all their advantage against the Canaanites. This servitude was longer than either of the former, and much more grievous. Jabin, and his general Sisera, did mightily oppress Israel. That which aggravated the oppression, was, 1. That this enemy was nearer them than any of the former, in their borders, in their bowels; and, by that means, had the more opportunity to do them a mischief. 2. That they were the natives of the country, who bore an implacable enmity to them, for invading and dispossessing them; and when they had them in their power, would be so much the more cruel and mischievous toward them, in revenge of the old quarrel. 3. That these Canaanites had, when time was, been conquered and subdued by Israel, were of old sentenced to be their servants, (Gen. 9. 25.) and might now have been under their feet, and utterly incapable of giving them any disturbance, if their own slothfulness, cowardice, and unbelief, had not suffered them thus to get head. To be oppressed by those whom their fathers had conquered, and whom they themselves had foolishly spared, could not but be very grievous.

III. Israel returning to their God; They cried unto the Lord, when distress drove them to him; and they saw no other way of relief. Those that slight God in their prosperity, will find themselves under a necessity of seeking him when they are in trouble.

4. And Deborah, a prophetess, the wife of Lapidoth, she judged Israel at that time. 5. And she dwelt under the palm-tree of Deborah between Ramah and Beth-el in mount Ephraim: and the children of Israel came up to her for judgment. 6. And she sent and called Barak the son of Abinoam, out of Kedesh-naphtali, and said unto him, Hath not the LORD God of Israel commanded, saying, Go and draw toward mount Tabor, and take with thee ten thousand men of the children of Naphtali, and of the children of Zebulun? 7. And I will draw unto thee to the river Kishon, Sisera the captain of Jabin's army, with his chariots, and his multitude; and I will deliver him into thine hand. 8. And Barak said unto her, If thou wilt go with me, then I will go; but if thou wilt not go with me, then I will not go. 9. And she said, I will surely go with thee: notwithstanding, the journey that thou takest shall not be for thine honour; for the LORD shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman. And Deborah arose and went with Barak to Kedesh.

The year of the redemption is at length come, when Israel was to be delivered out of the hands of Jabin, and restored again to their liberty; which, we may suppose, the northern tribes, that lay nearest the oppressor, and felt most the effects of his fury, did in a particular manner cry to God for. For the oppression of the poor, and the sighing of the needy, now will God arise. Now here we have,

I. The preparation of the people for their deliverance, by the prophetic conduct and government of Deborah, v. 4, 5. Her name signifies a bee; and she answered her name by her industry, sagacity, and great usefulness to the public, her sweetness to her friends, and sharpness to her enemies. She is said to be the wife of Lapidoth: the termination is not commonly found in the name of a man; therefore some make it the name of a place, she was a woman of Lapidoth. Others take it appellatively; Lapidoth signifies lamps. The rabbins say, she had employed herself in making wicks for the lamps of the tabernacle; and, having stooped to that mean office for God, she was afterwards thus preferred. Or, she was a woman of illuminations, or of splendours: one that was extraordinarily knowing and wise, and so one to be very eminent and illustrious. Concerning her we are here told, 1. That she was intimately acquainted with God: she was a prophetess; one that was instructed in divine knowledge by the immediate inspiration of the Spirit of God, and the gifts of wisdom, which she attained to not in an ordinary way; she heard the words of God, and probably saw the visions of the Almighty. 2. That she was entirely devoted to the services of Israel. She judged Israel at the time that Jabin oppressed them; and, perhaps, for being a woman, she was the more easily permitted by the oppressor to do it. She judged, not as a princess, by any civil authority conferred upon her, but as a prophetess, and as God's mouth to them, correcting abuses, and redressing grievances, especially those which related to the worship of God. The children of Israel came up to her from all parts for judgment, not so much for the deciding of controversies between man and man, as for advice in the reformation of what was amiss in things pertaining to God. Those among them, who before had secretly lamented the impieties and idolatries of their neighbours, but knew not where to apply themselves for the restraining of them, now made their complaints to Deborah; who, by the sword of the Spirit, shewing them the judgment of God, reduced and reclaimed many, and excited and animated the magistrates in their respective districts to put the laws in execution. It is said she dwelt, or, as some read it, sat under a palm-tree, called ever after, from her, the palm-tree of Deborah. Either she had her house under a tree, a mean habitation which would couch under a tree; or she had her judgment-seat in the open air, under the shadow of that tree; which was an emblem of the justice she sat there to administer, which will thrive and grow against opposition, as palms under pressures. Josephus says, that the children of Israel came to Deborah to desire her to pray to God for them, that they might be delivered out of the hand of Jabin; and Samuel is said at one particular time to judge Israel in Mizpeh, that is, bring them back again to God, when they made the same address to him upon a like occasion, 1 Sam. 7. 6, 8.

II. The project laid for their deliverance. When the children of Israel came to her for judgment, with her they found salvation. So they that seek to God for grace shall have grace and peace; grace and comfort, grace and glory. She was not herself fit to command an army in person, being a woman; but she nominates one that was fit, Barak of Naphtali, who, it is probable, had already signalized himself in some rencounters with the forces of the oppressor, living near him, (for Hazor and Harosheth lay within the lot of that tribe,) and thereby had gained a reputation and interest among his people. Some struggles, we may suppose, that brave man had used toward the shaking off of the yoke, but could not effect it till he had his commission and instructions from Deborah. He could do nothing without her head, nor she without his hands; but both together made a complete deliverer, and effected a complete deliverance. The greatest and best are not self-sufficient, but need one another.

1. By God's direction, she orders Barak to raise an army, and engage Jabin's forces, that were under Sisera's command, v. 6, 7. Barak, it may be, had been meditating some great attempt against the common enemy; a spark of generous fire was glowing in his breast, and fain he would do something to the purpose for his people, and for the cities of his God. But two things discouraged him; (1.) He wanted a commission to levy forces; that therefore Deborah here gives him under the broad seal of heaven; which, as a prophetess, she had a warrant to affix to it. "Hath not the Lord God of Israel commanded it? Yes, certainly he has, take my word for it." Some think she intends this as an appeal to Barak's own heart: "Has not God, by a secret whisper to thyself, given thee some intimation of his purpose, to make use of thee as an instrument in his hand to save Israel? Hast not thou felt some impulse of this kind upon thine own spirit?" If so, the spirit of prophecy in Deborah confirms the spirit of a soldier in Barak; Go and draw toward mount Tabor. [1.] She directs him what number of men to raise, ten thousand; and let him not fear that those will be too few, when God hath said, he will by them save Israel. [2.] Whence he should raise them; only out of his own tribe, and that of Zebulun next adjoining; those two counties should furnish him with an army sufficient, he need not stay to go further. And, lastly, She orders him where to make his rendezvous; at mount Tabor, in his own neighbourhood. (2.) When he had an army raised, he knew not how he should have an opportunity of engaging the enemy, who, perhaps, declined fighting, having heard that Israel, if they had but courage enough to make head against the enemy, seldom failed of success. "Well, says Deborah, "in the name of God, I will draw unto thee Sisera and his army." She assures him that the matter should be determined by one pitched battle, and should not be long in the doing. [1.] In mentioning the power of the enemy, Sisera, a celebrated general, bold and experienced, his chariots, his iron chariots, and his multitude of soldiers, she obliges Barak to fortify himself with the utmost degree of resolution; for the enemy he was to engage was a very formidable one. It is good to know the worst, that we may provide accordingly. But, [2.] In fixing the very place to which Sisera would draw his army, she gave him a sign, which might help to confirm his faith when he came to engage. It was a contingent thing, and depended upon Sisera's own will: but when afterward he should see that falling out just as Deborah had foretold, he might from thence infer, that certainly, in the rest she said, she spake under a divine direction, which would be a great encouragement to him; especially because with this, [3.] She gave him an express promise of success; I will (that is, God will, in whose name I speak) deliver them into thy hand. So when he saw them draw up against him, according to Deborah's word, he might be confident, that, according to her word, he should soon see them fallen before him. Observe, God draws them to him only that he might deliver them into his hand. When Sisera drew his forces together, he designed the destruction of Israel; but God gathered them as sheaves into the floor, for their own destruction, Mic. 4. 11, 12. Assemble yourselves, and ye shall be broken to pieces, Isa. 8. 9. See Rev. 19. 17, 18.

2. At Barak's request, she promises to go along with him to the field of battle. (1.) Barak insists much upon the necessity of her presence, which would be better to him than a council of war; (v. 8.) "If thou wilt go with me to direct and advise me, and in every difficult case to let me know God's mind, then I will go with all my heart, and not fear the chariots of iron;" otherwise not. Some make this to be the language of a weak faith; he could not take her word, unless he had her with him in pawn, as it were, for performance. It seems rather to arise from a conviction of the necessity of God's presence and continual conduct, a pledge and earnest of which he would reckon Deborah's presence to be; and therefore begged thus earnestly for it. "If thou go not up with me, in token of God's going with me, carry me not up hence." Nothing would be a greater satisfaction to him, than to have the prophetess with him to animate the soldiers, and to be consulted as an oracle upon all occasions. (2.) Deborah promised to go with him, v. 9. No toil nor peril shall discourage her from doing the utmost that becomes her to do for the service of her country. She would not send him where she would not go herself. Those that in God's name call others to their duty, should be very ready to assist them in it. Deborah was the weaker vessel, yet had the stronger faith. But though she agrees to go with Barak, if he insist upon it, she gives him a hint proper enough to move a soldier not to insist upon it. The journey thou undertakest (so confident was she of the success, that she calls his engaging in war but the undertaking of a journey) shall not be for thine honour: not so much for thine honour as if thou hadst gone thyself; for the Lord shall sell Sisera (now his turn comes to be sold as Israel was, v. 2. by way of reprisal) into the hands of a woman; that is, [1.] The world would ascribe the victory to the hand of Deborah; this he might himself foresee. [2.] God (to correct his weakness) would complete the victory by the hand of Jael; which would be some eclipse to his glory. But Barak values the satisfaction of his mind, and the good success of his enterprise, more than his honour; and therefore will by no means drop his request. He dares not fight, unless he have Deborah with him to direct him, and pray for him. She therefore stood to her word with a masculine courage; this noble heroine arose and went with Barak.

10. And Barak called Zebulun and Naphtali to Kedesh; and he went up with ten thousand men at his feet; and Deborah went up with him.

11. Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab the father-in-law of Moses, had severed himself from the Kenites, and pitched his tent unto the plain of Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh.

12. And they shewed Sisera that Barak the son of Abinoam was gone up to mount Tabor. 13. And Sisera gathered together all his chariots, even nine hundred chariots of iron, and all the people that were with him, from Harosheth of the Gentiles unto the river of Kishon. 14. And Deborah said unto Barak, Up; for this is the day in which the LORD hath delivered Sisera into thine hand: is not the LORD gone out before thee? So Barak went down from mount Tabor, and ten thousand men after him. 15. And the LORD discomfited Sisera, and all his chariots, and all his host, with the edge of the sword, before Barak; so that Sisera lighted down off his chariot, and fled away on his feet. 16. But Barak pursued after the chariots, and after the host, unto Harosheth of the Gentiles: and all the host of Sisera fell upon the edge of the sword; and there was not a man left.

Here,

I. Barak beats up for volunteers, and soon has his quota of men ready, v. 10. Deborah had appointed him to raise an army of ten thousand men, (v. 6.) and so many he has presently at his feet, following him, and subject to his command. God is said to call us to his feet, (Isa. 41. 2.) that is, into obedience to him. Some think it intimates that they were all footmen, and so the armies of the Jews generally were; which made the disproportion of strength between them and the enemy (who had horses and chariots) very great, and the victory the more illustrious: but the presence of God and his prophetess was abundantly sufficient to balance that disproportion. Barak had his men at his feet, which intimates their cheerfulness, and readiness to attend him, whithersoever he went, Rev. 14. 4. Though the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali were chiefly depended on, yet it appears, by Deborah's song, that there were some come in to him from other tribes, Manasseh and Issachar; and more expected, that came not, from Reuben, Dan, and Asher, ch. 5. 14. 17. But these are overlooked here; and we are only told, that, to make his ten thousand effective men indeed, Deborah went up with him. The 11th verse, concerning the remove of Heber, one of the families of the Kenites, out of the wilderness of Judah, in the south, where those families had fixed themselves, (ch. 1. 16.) into the northern country, comes in for the sake of what was to follow concerning the exploit of Jael, a wife of that family.

II. Sisera, upon notice of Barak's motions, takes the field with a very numerous and powerful army, v. 12, 13. They shewed Sisera, that is, it was shewed him. Yet some think it refers to the Kenites, mentioned immediately before, v. 11. They gave Sisera notice of Barak's rendezvous, there being peace at this time between Jabin and that family, v. 17. Whether they intended as a kindness to him or no, it served to accomplish what God had said by Deborah, (v. 7.) I will draw unto thee Sisera. Sisera's confidence was chiefly in his chariots; therefore particular notice is taken of them, nine hundred chariots of iron, which, with the scythes fastened to their axle-trees, when they were driven into an army of footmen, did terrible execution. So ingenious have men been in inventing methods of destroying one another, to gratify those lusts from which come wars and fightings.

III. Deborah gives orders to engage the enemy, v. 14. Josephus says, that when Barak saw Sisera's army drawn up, and attempting to surround the mountain, on the top of which he and his forces lay encamped, his heart quite failed him, and he determined to retire to a place of greater safety; but Deborah animated him to make a descent upon Sisera, assuring him that this was the day marked out in the divine counsels for his defeat. Now they appear most threatening, they are ripe for ruin. The thing is as sure to be done as if it were done already; The Lord hath delivered Sisera into thy hand. See how the work and honour of this great action are divided between Deborah and Barak; she, as the head, gives the word, he, as the hand, doeth the work. Thus doth God dispense his gifts variously, 1 Cor. 12. 4, &c. But though ordinarily the head of the woman is the man, (1 Cor. 11. 2.) he that has the residue of the Spirit was pleased to cross hands, and to put the head upon the woman's shoulders, choosing the weak things of the world to shame the mighty, that no flesh might glory in his presence. It was well for Barak that he had Deborah with him; for she made up what was defective, 1. In his conduct, by telling him, This is the day. 2. In his courage, by assuring him of God's presence; "Is not the Lord gone out before thee? Darest not thou follow, when thou hast God himself for thy Leader?" Note, (1.) In every undertaking, it is good to be satisfied that God goes before us, that we are in the way of our duty, and under his direction. (2.) If we have ground to hope that God goes before us, we ought to go on with courage and cheerfulness. "Be not dismayed at the difficulties thou meetest with in resisting Satan, in serving God, or suffering for him; for, is not the Lord gone out before thee? Follow him fully then."

IV. God himself routs the enemy's army, v. 15. Barak, in obedience to Deborah's orders, went down into the valley, though there, upon the plain, the iron chariots would have so much the more advantage against him, quitting his fastness upon the mountain in dependence upon the divine power; for in vain is salvation hoped for from hills and mountains; in the Lord alone is the salvation of his people, Jer. 3. 23. And he was not deceived in his confidence; The Lord discomfited Sisera. It was not so much the bold and surprising alarm which Barak gave their camp, that dispirited and dispersed them, but God's terror seized their spirits, and put them into an unaccountable confusion. The stars, it seems, fought against them, ch. 5. 20. Josephus says, that a violent storm of hail, which beat in their faces, gave them this rout, disabled them, and drove them back; so that they became a very easy prey to the army of Israel: and Deborah's words were made good; "The Lord has delivered them into thy hand; it is now in thy power to do what thou wilt with them."

V. Barak bravely improves his advantage, follows the blow with an undaunted resolution and an unwearied diligence, prosecutes the victory, and pursues the scattered forces, even to their general's head-quarters at Harosheth, (v. 16.) and spares none whom God had delivered into his hand to be destroyed; There was not a man left. When God goes before us in our spiritual conflicts, we must bestir ourselves; and when by his grace he gives us some success against the enemies of our souls, we must improve it by watchfulness and resolution, and carry on the holy war with vigour.

17. Howbeit Sisera fled away on his feet to the tent of Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite: for there was peace between Jabin the king of Hazor, and the house of Heber the Kenite. 18. And Jael went out to meet Sisera, and said unto him, Turn in, my lord, turn in to me; fear not. And when he had turned in unto her into the tent, she covered him with a mantle. 19. And he said unto her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water to drink; for I am thirsty. And she opened a bottle of milk, and gave him drink, and covered him. 20. Again he said unto her, Stand in the door of the tent, and it shall be, when any man doth come and inquire of thee, and say, Is there any man here? that thou shalt say, No. 21. Then Jael Heber's wife took a nail of the tent, and took an hammer in her hand, and went softly unto him, and smote the nail into his temples, and fastened it into the ground; for he was fast asleep and weary. So he died. 22. And, behold, as Barak pursued Sisera, Jael came out to meet him, and said unto him, Come, and I will shew thee the man whom thou seekest. And when he came into her tent, behold Sisera lay dead, and the nail was in his temples. 23. So God subdued on that day Jabin the king of Canaan before the children of Israel. 24. And the hand of the children of Israel prospered, and prevailed against Jabin the king of Canaan, until they had destroyed Jabin king of Canaan.

We have seen the army of the Canaanites totally routed. It is said, Ps. 83. 9, 10. (where the defeat of this army is pleaded as a precedent for God's doing the like in after times,) that they became as dung for the earth. Now here we have,

1. The fall of their general, Sisera, captain of the host, in whom, it is likely, Jabin their king put an entire confidence, and therefore was not himself present in the action. Let us trace the steps of this mighty man's fall.

1. He quitted his chariot, and took to his feet, v. 15, 17. His chariots had been his pride and his confidence; and we may suppose he had therefore despised and defied the armies of the living God, because they were all on foot, and had neither chariot nor horse, as he had; justly therefore is he thus made ashamed of his confidence, and forced to quit it, and thinks himself then most safe and easy, when he is got clear of his chariot, though we may well suppose it the best made, and best drawn, of any of them. Thus are they disappointed who rest on the creature; like a broken reed, it not only breaks under them, but runs into their hand, and pierces them with many sorrows. The idol may quickly become a burthen; (Isa. 46. 1.) and what we were sick for, God can make us sick of. How sneakingly doth Sisera look, now he is dismounted! It is hard to say whether he blushes or trembles more. Put not your trust in princes, if they may so soon be brought to this; if he who but lately trusted to his arms, with so much assurance, must now trust to his heels only, with so little.

2. He fled for shelter to the tents of the Kenites, having no strong hold, nor any place of his own in reach to retire to. The mean and solitary way of the Kenites' living, perhaps, he had formerly despised and ridiculed, and the more, because religion was kept up among them; yet now he is glad to put himself under the protection of one of these tents: and he chooses the wife's tent or apartment, either because less suspected, or because it happened to be next to him, and the first he came to, v. 17. And that which encouraged him to go thither, was, that at this time there was peace between his master and the house of Heber: not that there was any league offensive and defensive between them, only at present there were no indications of hostility. Jabin did them no harm, did not oppress them as he did the Israelites; their plain, quiet, harmless way of living, making them not suspected or feared.

and perhaps God so ordering it, as a recompence for their constant adherence to the true religion. Sisera thought he might therefore be safe among them; not considering, that, though they themselves suffered not by Jabin's power, they heartily sympathized with the Israel of God that did.

3. Jael invited him in, and bid him very welcome. Probably she stood at the tent door, to inquire what news from the army, and what the success of the battle was, which was fought not far off. (1.) She invited him in. Perhaps she stood waiting for an opportunity to shew kindness to any distressed Israelite, if there should have been occasion for it; but seeing Sisera come in great haste, panting, and out of breath, she invited him to come and repose himself in her tent; in which, while she seemed to design the relieving of his fatigue, perhaps she really intended the retarding of his flight, that he might fall into the hands of Barak, who was now in a hot chase of him; (v. 18.) and it may well be questioned, whether she had at first any thought of taking away his life, but rather God afterwards put it into her heart. (2.) She made very much of him, and seemed mighty careful to have him easy, as her invited guest. Was he weary? she finds him a very convenient place to repose himself in, and recruit his strength. Was he thirsty? well he might. Did he want a little water to cool his tongue? the best liquor her tent afforded was at his service, and that was milk, (v. 19.) which, we may suppose, he drank heartily of; and, being refreshed with it, was the better disposed to sleep. Was he cold, or afraid of catching cold, or did he desire to be hid from the pursuers, if they should search that tent? she covered him with a mantle, v. 18.—all expressions of care for his safety. Only, when he desired her to tell a lie for him, and to say he was not there, she declined making any such promise, v. 20. We must not sin against God, no, not to oblige those we would shew ourselves most observant of. Lastly, We must suppose she kept her tent as quiet as she could, and free from noise, that he might sleep the sooner and the faster. And now was Sisera least safe, when he was most secure. How uncertain and precarious is human life! and what assurance can we have of it, when it may so easily be betrayed by those with whom it is trusted; and they may prove its destroyers, who we hoped would have been its protectors? It is best making God our Friend, for he will not deceive us.

4. When he lay fast asleep, she drove a long nail through his temples; so fastened his head to the ground, and killed him, v. 21. And though this was enough to do his business, yet, to make sure work, (if we translate it right, ch. 5. 26.) she cut off his head, and left it nailed there. Whether she designed this or no, when she invited him into her tent, does not appear; probably the thought was darted into her mind when she saw him lie so fair to receive such a fatal blow; and, doubtless, the thought brought with it evidence sufficient that it came not from Satan, as a murderer and destroyer, but from God, as righteous Judge and Avenger; so much of brightness and heavenly light did she perceive in the inducements to it that offered themselves, the honour of God, and the deliverance of Israel, and nothing of the blackness of malice, hatred, or personal revenge. (1.) It was a divine power that enabled her to do it, and inspired her with a more than manly courage. What if her hand should shake, and she should miss her blow? What if he should awake when she was attempting it? Or, suppose some of his own attendants should follow him, and surprise her in the fact, how dearly would she and all her's be made to pay for it! Yet, obtaining help of God, she does it effectually. (2.) It was a divine warrant that justified her in the doing of it; and therefore, since no such extraordinary commissions can now be pretended, it ought not in any case to be imitated. The law of friendship and hospitality must be religiously observed, and we must abhor the thought of betraying any whom we have invited and encouraged to put a confidence in us. And as to this act of Jael's, (like that of Ehud's in the chapter before,) we have reason to think she was conscious of such a divine impulse upon her spirit to do it, as did abundantly satisfy herself (and it ought therefore to satisfy us) that it was well done. God's judgments are a great deep. The instrument of this execution was a nail of the tent, that is, one of the great pins with which the tent, or the stakes of it, were fastened. They often removed their tents; she had been used to drive these nails, and therefore knew how to do it the more dexterously on this great occasion. He, that had thought to have destroyed Israel with his many iron chariots, is himself destroyed with one iron nail. Thus do the weak things of the world confound the mighty. See here Jael's glory, and Sisera's shame. The great commander dies, [1.] In his sleep, fast asleep, and weary. It comes in as a reason why he stirred not to make any resistance. So fettered was he in the chains of sleep, that he could not find his hands. Thus the stout-hearted are spoiled at thy rebuke, O God of Jacob; they are cast into a deep sleep, and so are made to sleep their last, Ps. 76. 5, 6. Let not the strong man then glory in his strength; for, when he sleeps, where is it? It is weak, and he can do nothing; a child may insult him then, and steal his life from him; and yet, if he sleep not, he is soon spent and weary, and can do nothing neither. These words which we here put in a parenthesis, (for he was weary,) all the ancient versions read otherwise: he struggled, (or started, as we say,) and died; so the Syriac and Arabic, Exagitans sese mortuus est—He fainted and died; so the Chaldee. He was darkened and died; so the LXX. Consoviens morte soporem, so the vulgar Latin, joining sleep and death together, seeing they are so near akin. He fainted and died. He dies, [2.] With his head nailed to the ground, an emblem of his earthly-mindedness. O curve in terram animæ! His ear (says Bishop Hall) was fastened so close to the earth, as if his body had been listening what was become of his soul. He dies, [3.] By the hand of a woman. This added to the shame of his death before men; and, had he but known it as Abimelech did, (ch. 9. 54.) we may well imagine how much it would have added to the vexation of his own heart.

II. Here is the glory and joy of Israel hereupon.

1. Barak their leader finds his enemy dead; (v. 22.) and very well pleased, no doubt, he was, to find his work done so well to his hand, and so much to the glory of God, and the confusion of his enemies. Had he stood too nice upon a point of honour, he would have resented it as an affront to have the general slain by any hand but his; but now he remembered, that this diminution of his honour he was sentenced to undergo, for insisting upon Deborah's going with him; The Lord shall sell Sisera into the hand of a woman; though then it was little thought the prediction would have been fulfilled in such a way as this.

2. Israel is completely delivered out of the hands of Jabin king of Canaan, v. 23, 24. They not only shook off his yoke by this day's victory, but they afterwards prosecuted the war against him, till they had destroyed him, he and his nation being by the divine appointment devoted to ruin, and not to be spared. The Israelites, having soundly smarted for their foolish pity in not doing it before, resolve, now it is in their power, to indulge them no longer, but to make a thorough riddance of them, as a people to whom to shew mercy was as contrary to their own interest as it was to God's command; and probably it was with an eye to the sentence they were under, that this enemy is named three times here in the two last verses, and called king of Canaan; for as such he was to be destroyed; and so thoroughly was he destroyed, that I do not remember to read of the kings of Canaan any more after this. The children of Israel had prevented a great deal of mischief, if they had sooner destroyed these Canaanites, as God had both commanded and enabled them; but better be wise late, and buy it by experience, than never wise.

CHAP. V.

This chapter is the triumphant song which was composed and sung upon occasion of that glorious victory which Israel obtained over the forces of Jabin king of Canaan, and the happy consequences of that victory. Probably it was usual then to publish poems upon such occasions, as now; but this only is preserved of all the poems of that age of the Judges, because dictated by Deborah a prophetess, designed for a psalm of praise then, and a pattern of praise to after-ages; and it gives a great deal of light to the history of these times. I. It begins with praise to God, v. 2, 3. II. The substance of this song transmits the memory of this great achievement. 1. Comparing God's appearances to them on this occasion, with his appearances to them on mount Sinai, v. 4, 5. 2. Magnifying their deliverance, from the consideration of the calamitous condition they had been in, v. 6, 8. 3. Calling those to join in praise that shared in the benefits of the success, v. 9, 13. 4. Reflecting honour upon those tribes that were forward and active in that war, and disgrace on those that declined the service, v. 14, 19, 23. 5. Taking notice how God himself fought for them, v. 20, 22. 6. Celebrating particularly the honour of Jael, that slew Sisera; on which head the song is very large, v. 24, 30. It concludes with a prayer to God, v. 31.

1. THEN sang Deborah, and Barak the son of Abinoam, on that day, saying, 2. Praise ye the LORD for the avenging of Israel, when the people willingly offered themselves. 3. Hear, O ye kings; give ear, O ye princes; I, even I, will sing praise to the LORD God of Israel. 4. LORD, when thou wentest out of Seir, when thou marchedst out of the field of Edom, the earth trembled, and the heavens dropped, the clouds also dropped water. 5. The mountains melted from before the LORD, even that Sinai from before the LORD God of Israel.

The former chapter let us know what great things God had done for Israel; in this we have the thankful returns they made to God, that all ages of the church might learn (that work of heaven) to praise God.

I. God is praised by a song. Which is, 1. A very natural expression of rejoicing: Is any merry? Let him sing; and holy joy is the very soul and root of praise and thanksgiving. God is pleased to reckon himself glorified by our joy in him, and in his wondrous works. His servants' joy is his delight, and their songs melody to him. 2. A very proper expedient for spreading the knowledge, and perpetuating the remembrance, of great events. Neighbours would learn this song one of another, and children of their parents; and, by that means, they who had not books, or could not read, yet would be made acquainted with these works of God; and one generation would thus praise God's works to another, and declare his mighty acts, Ps. 145. 4, &c.

II. Deborah herself penned this song, as appears by v. 7. Till I Deborah arose. And the first words should be rendered, Then she sang, even Deborah. She used her gifts as a prophetess in composing the song; and the strain throughout is very fine and lofty, the images lively, the expressions elegant, and an admirable mixture there is in it of sweetness and majesty. No poetry is comparable to the sacred poetry. And we may suppose she used her power as a princess, in obliging the conquering army of Israel to learn and sing this song. She expects not that they should, by their poems, celebrate her praises, and magnify her; but requires, that in this poem they should join with her in celebrating God's praises, and magnifying him. She had been the first wheel in the action, and now is so in the thanksgiving.

III. It was sung on that day, not the very day that the fight was, but on that occasion, and soon after, as soon as a thanksgiving day could conveniently be appointed. When we have received mercy from God, we ought to be speedy in our returns of praise, while the impressions of the mercy are fresh. It is rent to be paid at the day.

1. She begins with a general Hallelujah: Praise (or bless, for that is the word) ye the Lord, v. 2. The design of the song is to give glory to God; that therefore is put first, to explain and direct all that follows, like the first petition of the Lord's prayer, Hallowed be thy name. Two things God is here praised for; (1.) The vengeance he took on Israel's enemies, for the avenging of Israel upon their proud and cruel oppressors, recompensing into their bosoms all the injuries they had done to his people. The Lord is known as a righteous God, and the God to whom vengeance belongs, by the judgments which he executeth. (2.) The grace he gave to Israel's friends; when the people willingly offered themselves to serve in this war. God is to have the glory of all the good offices that are at any time done us; and the more willingly they are done, the more is to be observed of that grace, which gives both to will and to do. For these two things she resolves to leave this song upon record, to the honour of the everlasting God; (v. 3.) I, even I, will sing unto the Lord, Jehovah, that God of incontestable sovereignty and irresistible power, even to the Lord God of Israel, who governs all for the good of the church.

2. She calls to the great ones of the world, that sit at the upper end of its table, to attend to her song, and take notice of the subject of it: Hear, O ye kings, give ear, O ye princes. (1.) She would have them know, that, as great and as high as they were, there is One above them with whom it is folly to contend, and to whom it is their interest to submit; that horses and chariots are vain things for safety. (2.) She would have them to join with her in praising the God of Israel, and no longer to praise their counterfeit deities, as Belshazzar did; (Dan. 5. 4.) He praised the gods of gold and silver. She bespeaks them as the psalmist, (Ps. 2. 10, 11.) Be wise, now therefore, O ye kings, serve the Lord with fear. (3.) She would have them take warning by Sisera's fate, and not dare to offer any injury to the people of God, whose cause, sooner or later, God will plead with jealousy.

3. She looks back upon God's former appearances, and compares this with them, the more to magnify the glorious Author of this great salvation. What God is doing, should bring to our mind what he has done; for he is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever; (v. 4.) Lord, when thou wentest out of Seir. This may be understood, either, (1.) Of the appearances of God's power and justice against the enemies of Israel to subdue and conquer them; and so Hab. 3. 3, 4, &c. is parallel to it, where the destruction of the church's enemies is thus described. When God had led his people Israel from the country of Edom, he brought down under their feet Sihon and Og, striking them and their armies with such terror and amazement, that they seemed apprehensive that heaven and earth were coming together. Their hearts melted, as if all the world had been melting round about them. Or it denotes the glorious displays of the Divine Majesty, and the surprising efforts of the divine power, enough to make the earth tremble, the heavens drop like snow before the sun, and the mountains to melt. Compare Ps. 18. 7. God's counsels are so far from being hindered by any creature, that, when the time of their accomplishment comes, that which seemed to stand in their way will not only yield before them, but be made to serve them. See Isa. 64. 1, 2. Or, (2.) It is meant of the appearances of God's glory and majesty in Israel, when he gave them his law at mount Sinai. It was then literally true, the earth trembled, and the heavens dropped, &c. Compare Dent. 33. 2. Ps. 68. 7, 8. Let all the kings and princes know that this is the God whom Deborah praises, and not such mean and impotent deities as they paid their homage to. The Chaldee paraphrase applies it to the giving of the law, but has a strange descant on those words, The mountains melted. Tabor, Hermon, and Carmel, contended among themselves: one said, Let the Divine Majesty dwell upon me; the other said, Let it dwell upon me; but God made it to dwell upon mount Sinai, the meanest and least of all the mountains. I suppose it means the least valuable, because barren and rocky.

6. In the days of Shamgar the son of Anath, in the days of Jael, the high-ways were unoccupied, and the travellers walked through by-ways. 7. The inhabitants of the villages ceased, they ceased in Israel, until that I Deborah arose, that I arose a mother in Israel. 8. They chose new gods; then was war in the gates: was there a shield or spear seen among forty thousand in Israel? 9. My heart is toward the governors of Israel, that offered themselves willingly among the people. Bless ye the LORD. 10. Speak, ye that ride on white asses, ye that sit in judgment, and walk by the way. 11. They that are delivered from the noise of archers in the places of drawing water, there shall they rehearse the righteous acts of the LORD, even the righteous acts toward the inhabitants of his villages in Israel: then shall the people of the LORD go down to the gates.

Here,

I. Deborah describes the distressed state of Israel under the tyranny of Jabin, that the greatness of their trouble might make their salvation appear the more illustrious, and the more gracious, v. 6. "From the days of Shamgar, who did something toward the deliverance of Israel from the Philistines, to the days of Jael, the present day, in which Jael has so signalized herself, the country has been in a manner desolate." 1. No trade. For want of soldiers to protect men of business in their business from the incursions of the enemy, and for want of magistrates to restrain and punish thieves and robbers among them, (men of broken fortunes and desperate spirits, that, having no employment, took to rob on the high-road,) all commerce ceased, and the highways were unoccupied; no caravans of merchants, as formerly. 2. No travelling. Whereas in times when there was some order and government, the travellers might be safe in the open roads, and the robbers were forced to lurk in the by-ways; now, on the contrary, the robbers insulted on the open roads without check, and the honest travellers were obliged to skulk, and walk through by-ways, in continual frights. 3. No tillage. The fields must needs be laid waste and unoccupied, when the inhabitants of the villages, the country farmers, ceased from their employment, quitted their houses, which were continually alarmed and plundered, and were obliged to take shelter for themselves and their families in walled and fenced cities. 4. No administration of justice. There was war in the gates where their courts were kept, v. 8. So that it was not till this salvation was wrought, that the people of the Lord durst go down to the gates, v. 11. The continual incursions of the enemy deprived the magistrates of the dignity, and the people of the benefit, of their government. 5. No peace to him that went out, or to him that came in. The gates, through which they passed and repassed, were infested by the enemy; nay, the places of drawing water were alarmed by the archers—a mighty achievement, to terrify the drawers of water. 6. Neither arms nor spirit to help themselves with, not a shield nor spear seen among forty thousand, v. 8. Either they were disarmed by their oppressors, or they themselves neglected the art of war; so that though they had spears and shields, they were not to be seen, but were thrown by and suffered to rust, they having neither skill nor will to use them.

II. She shews in one word what it was that brought all this misery upon them; They chose new gods, v. 8. It was their idolatry that provoked God to give them up thus into the hands of their enemies. The Lord their God was one Lord, but that would not content them, they must have more, many more, still more. Their God was the Ancient of days, still the same, and therefore they grew weary of him, and must have new gods, which they were as fond of as children of new clothes; names newly invented, heroes newly canonized. Their fathers, when put to their choice, chose the Lord for their God, (Josh. 24. 21.) but they would not abide by that choice, they must have gods of their own choosing.

III. She takes notice of God's great goodness to Israel, in raising up such as should redress their grievances. Herself first; (v. 7) Till that I Deborah arose, to restrain and punish those who disturbed the public peace, and protect men in their business; and then the face of things was changed for the better quickly; those beasts of prey retired upon the breaking forth of this joyful light, and man went forth again to his work and labour, Ps. 104. 22, 23. Thus she became a mother in Israel, a nursing mother, such was the affection she bore to her people, and such the care and pains she took for the public welfare. Under her there were other governors of Israel, (v. 9.) who, like her, had done their part as governors to reform the people, and then, like her, offered themselves willingly to serve in the war, not insisting upon the exemption which their dignity and office entitled them to, when they had so fair an opportunity of appearing in their country's cause: and, no doubt, the example of the governors influenced the people in like manner, willing to offer themselves, v. 2. Of these governors she says, My heart is toward them; that is, "I truly love and honour them, they have won my heart for ever, I shall never forget them." Note, Those are worthy of double honour that recede voluntarily from the demands of their honour, to serve God and his church.

IV. She calls upon those who had a particular share in the advantages of this great salvation, to offer up particular thanks to God for it, v. 10, 11. Let every man speak as he found of the goodness of God in this happy change of the posture of public affairs. 1. Ye that ride on white asses, that is, the nobility and gentry. Horses were little used in that country, they had, it is probable, a much better breed of asses than we have; but persons of quality, it seems, were distinguished by the colour of the asses they rode on, the white, being more rare, were therefore more valued. Notice is taken of Abdon's sons and grandsons riding on ass-colts, as indicating them to be men of distinction, ch. 12. 14. Let such as are by this salvation restored, not only to their liberty as other Israelites, but to their dignity, speak God's praises. 2. Let them that sit in judgment be sensible of it, and thankful for it, as a very great mercy, that they may sit safely there; that the sword of justice is not struck out of their hand by the sword of war. 3. Let them that walk by the way, and meet with none there to make them afraid, speak to themselves in pious meditations, and to their fellow travellers in religious discourses, of the goodness of God in ridding the roads of those banditti that had so long infested them. 4. Let them that draw water in peace, and have not their well taken from them, or stopped up, nor are in danger of being caught by the enemy when they go forth to draw there where they find themselves so much more safe and easy than they have been, there let them rehearse the acts of the Lord; not Deborah's acts, or Barak's, but the Lord's, taking notice of his hand making peace in our borders, and creating a defence upon all the glory. This is the Lord's doing. Observe in these acts of his, (1.) Justice executed on his daring enemies. They are the righteous acts of the Lord. See him pleading a righteous cause, and sitting in the throne judging aright, and give him glory as the Judge of all the earth. (2.) Kindness shewed to his trembling people; the inhabitants of the villages, who lay most open to the enemy, had suffered most, and were in most danger, Ezek. 38. 11. It is the glory of God to protect those that are most exposed, and to help the weakest. Let us all take notice of the share we in particular have in the public peace and tranquillity, the inhabitants of the villages especially, and give God the praise of it.

12. Awake, awake, Deborah: awake, awake, utter a song: arise, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam. 13. Then he made him that remaineth have dominion over the nobles among the people: the LORD made me have dominion over the mighty. 14. Out of Ephraim was there a root of them against Amalek; after thee, Benjamin, among thy people; out of Machir came down governors, and out of Zebulun they that handle the pen of the writer. 15. And the princes of Issachar were with Deborah; even Issachar, and also Barak: he was sent on foot into the valley. For the divisions of Reuben there were great thoughts of heart. 16. Why abodest thou among the sheep-folds, to hear the bleatings of the flocks? For the divisions of Reuben there were great searchings of heart. 17. Gilead abode beyond Jordan: and why did Dan remain in ships? Asher continued on the sea-shore, and abode in his breaches. 18. Zebulun and Naphtali were a people that jeoparded their lives unto the death in the high places of the field. 19. The kings came and fought, then fought the kings of Canaan in Taanach by the waters of Megiddo; they took no gain of money. 20. They fought from heaven; the stars in their courses fought against Sisera. 21. The river of Kishon swept them away, that ancient river, the river Kishon. O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength. 22. Then were the horse-hoofs broken by the means of the pransings, the pransings of their mighty ones. 23. Curse ye Meroz, said the angel of the LORD, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; because they came not to the help of the LORD, to the help of the LORD against the mighty.

Here,

1. Deborah stirs up herself and Barak to celebrate this victory in the most solemn manner, to the glory of God and the honour of Israel, for the encouragement of their friends and the greater confusion of their enemies, v. 12. 1. Deborah, as a prophetess, must do it by a song, to compose and sing which, she excites herself, Awake, awake; and again, Awake, awake. Which intimates the sense she had of the excellency and difficulty of the work; it needed and well deserved the utmost liveliness and vigour of soul in the performance of it; all the powers and faculties of the soul, in their closest attention and application, ought to be employed in it. Thus too she expresses the sense she had of her own infirmity, and aptness to flag, and remit in her zeal in this work. Note, Praising God is work that we should awake to, and awake ourselves to, Ps. 108. 2. 2. Barak, as a general, must do it by a triumph; Lead thy captivity captive. Though the army of Sisera was cut off in the field, and no quarter given, yet we may suppose, in the prosecution of the victory, when the war was carried into the enemy's country, many not found in arms were seized and made prisoners of war; these she would have led in chains after Barak, when he made his public entry into his own city, to grace his triumphs; not as if it should be any pleasure to him to trample upon his fellow creatures, but thus he must give glory to God, and serve that good purpose of his government, which is to look upon those that are proud, and to abase them.

II. She gives good reason for this praise and triumph, v. 13. This glorious victory had made the remnant of Israel, and Deborah in particular, look very great; a circumstance which they owed entirely to God. 1. The Israelites were become few and inconsiderable, and yet to them God gave dominion over nobles. Many of them were cut off by the enemy, many died of grief, and perhaps some had removed their families and effects into foreign parts; yet those few that remained, by divine assistance, with one brave and generous effort, not only shook off the yoke of oppression from their own neck, but got power over their oppressors. As long as any of God's Israel remain, (and a remnant God will have in the worst of times,) there is hope, be it ever so small a remnant, for God can make him that remains, though it should be but one single person, triumph over the most proud and potent. 2. Deborah was herself of the weaker sex, and the sex that from the fall had been sentenced to subjection, and yet the Lord, that is himself higher than the highest, authorized her to rule over the mighty men of Israel, who willingly submitted to her conduct; and enabled her to triumph over the mighty men of Canaan, who fell before the army she commanded; so wonderfully did he advance the low estate of his handmaid. "The Lord made me, a woman, have dominion over mighty men." A despised stone is made head of the corner. This is indeed the Lord's doing, and marvellous in our eyes.

III. She makes particular remarks on the several parties concerned in this great action, taking notice who fought against them, who fought for them, and who stood neuter.

1. Who fought against them. The power of the enemy must be taken notice of, that the victory may appear the more glorious. Jabin and Sisera had been mentioned in the history, but here it appears, further, (1.) That Amalek was in league with Jabin, and sent him in assistance, or endeavoured to do it. Ephraim is here said to act against Amalek, (v. 14.) probably intercepting and cutting off some forces of the Amalekites that were upon their march to join Sisera. Amalek had helped Moab to oppress Israel, (ch. 3. 13.) and now had helped Jabin; they were inveterate enemies to God's people, whose hand had always been against the throne of the Lord, (Exod. 17. 16.) and therefore the more dangerous. (2.) That others of the kings of Canaan, who had somewhat recovered themselves since their defeat by Joshua, joined with Jabin, and strengthened his army with their forces, having the same implacable enmity to Israel that he had, and those kingdoms, when they were in their strength, having been subject to that of Hazor, Josh. 11. 10. These kings came and fought, v. 19. Israel had no king, their enemies had many, whose power and influence, especially acting in confederacy, made them very formidable; and yet Israel, having the Lord for their King, was too hard for them all. It is said of these kings, They took no gain of money; they were not mercenary troops hired into the service of Jabin, (such often fail in an extremity,) but they were volunteers, and hearty in the cause against Israel: they desired not the riches of silver, so the Chaldee, but only the satisfaction of helping to ruin Israel. Acting upon this principle, they were the more formidable, and would be the more cruel.

2. Who fought for them. The several tribes that assisted in this great exploit are here spoken of with honour: for though God is chiefly to be glorified, instruments must have their due praise, for the encouragement of others: but, after all, it was heaven that turned the scale.

(1.) Ephraim and Benjamin, those tribes among whom Deborah herself lived, bestirred themselves, and did bravely, by her influence upon them; for her palm-tree was in the tribe of Ephraim, and very near to that of Benjamin, v. 14. Out of Ephraim was there a root, and life in the root, against Amalek. There was in Ephraim a mountain called the mount of Amalek, (mentioned ch. 12. 15.) which, some think, is here meant, and some read it, There was a root in Amalek; that is, in that mountain; a strong resolution in the minds of that people to make head against the oppressors, which was the root of the matter. Herein Benjamin had set them a good example among his people; Ephraim moved after thee, Benjamin. Though Benjamin was the junior tribe, and much inferior, especially at this time, to Ephraim, both in number and wealth, yet when they led, Ephraim followed, in appearing for the common cause. If we be not so bold as to lead, yet we must not be so proud and sullen as not to follow even our inferiors in a good work. Ephraim was at a distance from the place of action, and therefore could not send forth many of its boughs to the service; but Deborah, who was one of them, knew there was a root of them, that they were hearty well-wishers to the cause. Dr. Lightfoot gives quite another sense of this; Joshua, of Ephraim, had been a root of such victories against Amalek, (Exod. 17.) and Ehud, of Benjamin, lately against Amalek and Moab.

(2.) The ice being broken by Ephraim and Benjamin; Machir (the half-tribe of Manasseh beyond Jordan) and Zebulun sent in men that were very serviceable to this great design. When an army is to be raised, especially under such disadvantages as were occasioned by the long disuse of arms, and the dispiritedness of the people, it is of great consequence to be furnished, [1.] With men of courage for officers, and such the family of Machir furnished them with, for thence came down governors. The children of Machir were particularly famous for their valour in Moses's time, (Numb. 32. 39.) and, it seems, it continued in their family, the more because they were seated in the frontiers. [2.] With men of learning and ingenuity, for secretaries of war, and with such they were supplied out of Zebulun; thence came men that handle the pen of the writer, clerks that issued out orders, wrote circular letters, drew commissions, mustered their men, and kept their accounts. Thus must every man, according as he has received the gift, minister the same, for the public good, 1 Pet. 4. 10. The eyes see, and the ears hear, for the whole body. I know it is generally understood of the forwardness even of the scholars of this tribe, who studied the law and expounded it, to take up arms in this cause, though they were better skilled in books than in the art of war. So Sir Richard Blackmore paraphrases it,

To wield the sword, laid down the pen.

(3.) Issachar did good service too; though he saw the rest was good, and therefore bowed his shoulder to bear, which is the character of that tribe, (Gen. 49. 15.) yet they disdained to bear the yoke of Jabin's tribute, and now preferred the generous toils of war to a servile rest. Though it should seem there were not many common soldiers listed out of that tribe, yet the princes of Issachar were with Deborah and Barak, (v. 15.) probably as a great council of war to advise upon emergencies. And, it should seem, these princes of Issachar did in person accompany Barak into the field of battle. Did he go on foot? They footed it with him, not consulting their honour or ease. Did he go into the valley, the place of most danger? They exposed themselves with him, and were still at his right hand to advise him: for the men of Issachar were men that had understanding of the times, 1 Chron. 12. 32.

(4.) Zebulun and Naphtali were the most bold and active of all the tribes, not only out of a particular affection to Barak their countryman, but because, they lying nearest to Jabin, the yoke of oppression lay heavier on their necks than on any other tribe. Better die in honour than live in bondage; and therefore, in a pious zeal for God and their country, they jeopardied their lives unto the death in the high places of the field, v. 18. With what heroic bravery did they charge and push on, even upon the chariots of iron, despising danger, and setting death itself at defiance in so good a cause!

(5.) The stars from heaven appeared, or acted at least, on Israel's side; (v. 20.) The stars in their courses, according to the order and direction of him who is the great Lord of their hosts, fought against Sisera, by their malignant influences; or by causing the storms of hail and thunder, which contributed so much to the rout of Sisera's army. The Chaldee reads it, From heaven, from the place where the stars go forth, war was waged against Sisera; that is, the power of the God of heaven was engaged against him, making use of the ministration of the angels of heaven. Some way or other, the heavenly bodies (not arrested, as when the sun stood still at Joshua's word, but going on in their courses) fought against Sisera. Those whom God is an enemy to, the whole creation is at war with. Perhaps the flashes of lightning, by which the stars fought, was that which frightened the horses, so as that they pranced till their very hoofs were broken; (v. 22.) and, probably, overturned the chariots of iron which they drew, or turned them back upon their owners.

(6.) The river of Kishon fought against their enemies. It swept them away, and abundance of them that hoped to make their escape through it, v. 21. Ordinarily, it was but a shallow river, and, being in their own country, we may suppose they well knew its fords and safest passages, and yet, now, probably by the great ruin that fell, it was so swelled, and the stream so deep and strong, that those who attempted to pass it, were drowned, being feeble and faint, and unable to make their way through it. And then were the horse-hoofs broken by means of the plungings. So it is in the margin, v. 22. The river of Kishon is called that ancient river, because described or celebrated by ancient historians or poets; or rather, because it was designed of old, in the counsel of God, to serve his purposes against Sisera at this time, and did so, as if it had been made on purpose; thus the water of the old pool, God is said to have fashioned long ago, for that use to which it was put, Isa. 22. 11.

(7.) Deborah's own soul fought against them; she speaks of it with a holy exultation; (v. 21.) O my soul, thou hast trodden down strength. She did it by exciting others to do it, and assisting them, which she did with all her heart; also by her prayers. As Moses conquered Amalek by lifting up his hand, so Deborah vanquished Sisera by lifting up her heart. And when the soul is employed in holy exercises, and heart-work is made of them, through the grace of God, the strength of our spiritual enemies will be trodden down, and will fall before us.

3. In this great engagement, she observes who stood neuter, and did not side with Israel as might have been expected. It is strange to find how many, even of those who were called Israelites, basely deserted this glorious cause, and declined to appear. No mention is made of Judah or Simeon among the tribes concerned, because they, lying so very remote from the scene of action, had not an opportunity to appear, and therefore it was not expected from them; but for those that lay near, and yet would not venture, indelible marks of disgrace are here put upon them, and they deserved it.

(1.) Reuben basely declined the service, v. 15, 16. Justly had he long ago been deprived of the privileges of the birth-right, and still does his dying father's doom stick by him, unstable as water, he shall not excel. Two things hindered them from engaging; [1.] Their divisions. This jarring string she twice strikes upon, to their shame. For the divisions of Reuben (or in these divisions) there were great thoughts, impressions, and searchings of heart. Not only for their division from Canaan by the river Jordan, that needed not to have hindered them, had they been hearty in the cause; for Gilead abode beyond Jordan, and yet from Machir of Gilead came down governors; but it means either that they were divided among themselves, could not agree who should go, or who should lead; each striving to gain the post of honour, and shun that of danger; some unhappy contests in their tribe kept them from uniting together, and with their brethren, for the common good; or, that they were divided in their opinion of this war from the rest of the tribes; thought the attempt either not justifiable, or not practicable, and therefore blamed those that engaged in it, and did themselves decline it; this occasioned great searchings of heart among the rest; especially when they had reason to suspect, that, whatever Reuben pretended, his sitting still now proceeded from a cooling of his affections to his brethren, and an alienation of mind from them, which occasioned them many sad thoughts. It grieves us to see our mother's children angry with us for doing our duty, and looking strange upon us when we most need their friendship and assistance. [2.] Their business in the world. Reuben abode among the sheep-folds, a warmer and safer place than the camp, pretending they could not conveniently leave the sheep they tended; he loved to hear the bleatings of the flocks, or, as some read it, the whistlings of the flocks, the music which the shepherds made with their oaten reeds or pipes, and the pastorals which they sung; these Reuben preferred before the martial drum and trumpet. Thus many are kept from doing their duty by the fear of trouble, the love of ease, and an inordinate affection to their worldly business and advantage. Narrow selfish spirits care not what becomes of the interests of God's church, so they can but get, keep, and save money; All seek their own, Philip. 2. 21.

(2.) Dan and Asher did the same, v. 17. These two lay on the sea-coast, and, [1.] Dan pretended he could not leave his ships, but they would be exposed, and therefore I pray thee have me excused. Those of that tribe perhaps pleaded that their sea-trade disfit them for land service, and diverted them from it; but Zebulun also was a haven for ships, a sea-faring tribe, and yet was forward and active in this expedition. There is no excuse we make to shift off duty, but what some or other have broken through and set aside, whose courage and resolution will rise up against us, and shame us. [2.] Asher pretended he must stay at home, and repair the breaches which the sea had in some places made upon his land, and to fortify his works against the encroachments of it; or he abode in his creeks, or small havens, where his trading vessels lay to attend them. A little thing will serve those for a pretence to stay at home, who have no mind to engage in the most necessary services, because there are difficulty and danger in them.

[3.] But, above all, Meroz is condemned, and a curse pronounced upon the inhabitants of it, because they came not to the help of the Lord, v. 23. Probably, this was some city that lay near the scene of action, and therefore the inhabitants had a fair opportunity of shewing their obedience to God, and their concern for Israel, and of doing good service to the common cause; but they basely declined it, for fear of Jabin's iron chariots, being willing to sleep in a whole skin. The Lord needed not their help; he made it to appear he could do his work without them; but no thanks to them; for aught they knew, the attempt might have miscarried for want of their hand; and therefore they are cursed for not coming to the help of the Lord, when it was in effect proclaimed, Who is on the Lord's side? The cause between God and the mighty, (the principalities and powers of the kingdom of darkness,) will not admit of neutrality. God looks upon those as against him that are not with him. This curse is pronounced by the Angel of the Lord, our Lord Jesus, the Captain of the Lord's host; (and those whom he curses are cursed indeed;) and further than we have warrant and authority from him, we may not curse. He that will richly reward all his good soldiers, will certainly and severely punish all cowards and deserters. This city of Meroz seems to have been at this time a considerable place, since something great was expected from it; but, probably, after the Angel of the Lord had pronounced this curse upon it, it dwindled, and, like the fig-tree which Christ cursed, withered away, so that we never read of it after this in the scripture.

24. Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be, blessed shall she be above women in the tent. 25. He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish. 26. She put her hand to the nail, and her right hand to the workman's hammer; and with the hammer she smote Sisera, she smote off his head, when she had pierced and stricken through his temples. 27. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down: at her feet he bowed, he fell: where he bowed, there he fell down dead. 28. The mother of Sisera looked out at a window, and cried through the lattice, Why is his chariot so long in coming? why tarry the wheels of his chariots? 29. Her wise ladies answered her, yea, she returned answer to herself, 30. Have they not sped? have they not divided the prey; to every man a damsel or two; to Sisera a prey of divers colours, a prey of divers colours of needle-work, of divers colours of needle-work on both sides, meet for the necks of them that take the spoil? 31. So let all thine enemies perish, O LORD: but let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might. And the land had rest forty years.

Deborah here concludes this triumphant song,

I. With the praises of Jael, her sister heroine, whose valiant act had completed and crowned the victory. She had mentioned her before, (v. 6.) as one that would have served her country, if it had been in her power; now she applauds her as one that did serve it admirably well, when it was in her power. Her poetry is truest and most florid here in the latter end of the song. How honourably does she speak of Jael, (v. 24.) who preferred her peace with the God of Israel before her peace with the king of Canaan; and though not a native of Israel, (for aught that appears,) yet heartily espoused the cause of Israel in this critical conjuncture, jeopardied her life as truly as if she had been in the high places of the field, and bravely fought for those whom she saw God fought for! Blessed shall she be above women in the tent. Note, Those whose lot is cast in the tent, in a very low and narrow sphere of activity, if they serve God in that according to their capacity, shall in no wise lose their reward. Jael in the tent wins as rich a blessing as Barak in the field.

Nothing is more confounding, grievous, and shameful, than disappointment; and Deborah here does most elegantly describe two great disappointments, the shame of which was typical of sinners' everlasting shame.

I. Sisera found a fatal enemy where he expected a fast and faithful friend. (1.) Jael shewed him the kindness of a friend, and perhaps at that time intended no other than kindness, until God, by an immediate impulse upon her mind, (which impulses then were to be regarded, and carried so much of their own evidence with them, that they might have been relied upon, but cannot now be pretended to,) directed her to do otherwise, v. 25. He asked only for fair water to quench his thirst, but she, not only to shew her housewifery and good housekeeping, but to express her respect to him, gave him milk, and brought forth butter, that is, (say some interpreters,) milk which had the butter taken from it; we call it butter-milk. No, (say others,) it was milk that had the butter still in it; we call it cream; whichsoever it was, it was, probably, the best her house afforded; and, to set it off, she brought it in a lordly dish, such as she called so, the finest she had, and better than she ordinarily used at her own table. This confirmed Sisera's opinion of her friendship, and made him sleep the faster and the more secure. But, (2.) She proved his mortal enemy; gave him his death stroke: it is curiously described, v. 26, 27. [1.] How great does Jael look, hammering Sisera, as it is in the margin, mauling that proud man, that had been so long the terror of the mighty, and sending him down slain to the pit with his iniquities upon his bones! Ezek. 32. 27. She seems to have gone about it with no more terror or concern, than if she had been going to nail one of the boards or bars of her tent, so confident was she of divine aid and protection. We read it, she smote off his head, probably with his own sword, which, now that his head was nailed through, she durst take from his side, but not before, for fear of waking him. But because there was no occasion for cutting off his head, nor was it mentioned in the history, many think it should be read, She struck through his head. That head which had been proudly lifted up against God and Israel, and in which had been forged bloody designs for the destruction of God's people, Jael finds a soft place in, and into that with a good-will strikes her nail. [2.] How mean does Sisera look, fallen at Jael's feet, v. 27. At the feet of this female executioner he bowed, he fell; all his struggles for life availed not; she followed her blow until he fell down dead. There lies extended the deserted carcass of that proud man, not in the bed of honour, not in the high places of the field, nor having any glorious wound to shew from a glittering sword or a bow of steel, but in a corner of a tent, at the feet of a woman, with a disgraceful wound by a sorry nail struck through his head. Thus is shame the fate of proud men. And it is a very lively representation of the ruin of those sinners whose prosperity slays them; it flatters and caresses them with milk and butter in a lordly dish, as if it would make them easy and happy, but it nails their heads and hearts too to the ground in earthly-mindedness, and pierces them through with many sorrows; its flatteries are fatal, and sinks them at last into destruction and perdition, 1 Tim. 6. 9, 10.

2. Sisera's mother had the tidings brought her of her son's fall and ruin, then when she was big with expectation of his glorious and triumphant return, v. 28..30. where we have, (1.) Her fond desire to see her son come back in triumph. Why is his chariot so long in coming? She speaks this, not so much out of a concern for his safety, or any jealousy of his having miscarried, (she had no fear of that, so confident was she of his success,) but out of a longing for his glory, which with a feminine weakness she was passionately impatient to see, chiding the lingering chariot, and expostulating concerning the delays of it, little thinking that her unhappy son had been, before this, forced to quite that chariot which they were so proud of, and which she thought came so slowly. The chariots of his glory were now become the shame of his house, Isa. 22. 18. Let us take heed of indulging such desires as these toward any temporal good thing, particularly toward that which cherishes vain glory, for that was it she here doated on. Eagerness and impatience in our desires do us a great deal of prejudice, and make it intolerable to us to be crossed. But toward the second coming of Jesus Christ, and the glories of that day, we should thus stand affected; Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly; for here we cannot be disappointed. (2.) Her foolish hope and confidence that he would come at last in so much the greater pomp. Her wise ladies answered her, and thought they gave a very good account of the delay; yea, she (in her wisdom, says the Chaldee) tauntingly made answer to herself, Have they not sped? No doubt they have, and that which delays them, is, that they are dividing the prey; which is so much, that it is a work of time to make a distribution of it." In the spoil they please themselves with the thought of, observe, [1.] How impudently, and to the reproach and scandal of their sex, these ladies boast of the multitude of damsels which the soldiers would have the abusing of. [2.] How childishly they please themselves with the hope of seeing Sisera himself in a gaudy mantle of divers colours: how charmingly would it look! of divers colours of needle-work, plundered out of the wardrobe of some Israelitish lady; it is repeated again, as that which pleased their fancy above any thing, of divers colours of needle work on both sides, and therefore very rich; such pieces of embroidery they hoped Sisera would have to present his mother and the ladies with. Thus apt are we to deceive ourselves with great expectations, and confident hopes of honour, and pleasure, and wealth, in this world, by which we prepare for ourselves the shame and grief of a disappointment. And thus does God often bring ruin on his enemies, when they are most elevated.

II. She concludes all with a prayer to God, 1. For the destruction of all his foes: So, so shamefully, so miserably, let all thine enemies perish, O Lord: let all that hope to triumph in Israel's ruin, be thus disappointed and triumphed over; Do to them all as unto Sisera, Ps. 33. 9. Though our enemies are to be prayed for, God's enemies, as such, are to be prayed against; and when we see some of God's enemies remarkably humbled and brought down, that is an encouragement to us to pray for the downfall of all the rest. Deborah was a prophetess, and this prayer was a prediction that in due time all God's enemies shall perish, Ps. 92. 9. None ever hardened his heart and prospered. 2. For the exaltation and comfort of all his friends. But let them that love him, and heartily wish well to his kingdom among men, be as the sun when he goeth forth in his strength; let them shine so bright, appear so glorious in the eye of the world, cast such benign influences, be as much out of the reach of their enemies, who curse the rising sun because it scorches them; let them rejoice as a strong man to run a race, Ps. 19. 5. Let them, as burning and shining lights in their places, dispel the mists of darkness, and shine with more and more lustre and power unto the perfect day," Prov. 4. 18. Such shall be the honour, and such the joy, of all that love God in sincerity, and for ever they shall shine as the sun in the firmament of our Father.

The victory here celebrated with this song, was of such happy consequence to Israel, that for the best part of one age they enjoyed the peace which it opened the way to; The land had rest forty years; that is, so long it was from this victory to the raising up of Gideon. And well it had been, if, when the churches and the tribes had rest, they had been edified, and had walked in the fear of the Lord.

CHAP. VI.

Nothing that occurred in the quiet and peaceable times of Israel is recorded; the forty years' rest after the conquest of Jabin is passed over in silence, and here begins the story of another distress, and another deliverance by Gideon, the fourth of the Judges. Here is, I. The calamitous condition of Israel, by the inroads of the Midianites, v. 1. . 6. II. The message God sent them by a prophet, by convincing them of sin, to prepare them for deliverance, v. 7. . 10. III. The raising up of Gideon to be their deliverer. 1. A commission which God sent him by the hand of an angel, and confirmed by a sign, v. 11. . 24. 2. The first-fruits of his government in the reform of his father's house, v. 25. . 32. 3. The preparations he made for a war with the Midianites, and the encouragement given him by a sign, v. 33. . 40.

1. AND the children of Israel did evil in the sight of the LORD; and the LORD delivered them into the hand of Midian seven years. 2. And the hand of Midian prevailed against Israel: and because of the Midianites the children of Israel made them the dens which are in the mountains, and caves, and strong holds. 3. And so it was, when Israel had sown, that the Midianites came up, and the Amalekites, and the children of the east, even they came up against them; 4. And they encamped against them, and destroyed the increase of the earth, till thou come unto Gaza; and left no sustenance for Israel, neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass. 5. For they came up with their cattle, and their tents, and they came as grasshoppers for multitude: for both they and their camels were without number: and they entered into the land to destroy it. 6. And Israel was greatly impoverished because of the Midianites; and the children of Israel cried unto the LORD.

We have here,

I. Israel's sin renewed; They did evil in the sight of the Lord, v. 1. The burnt child dreads the fire; yet this perverse, unthinking people, that had so often smarted sorely for their idolatry, upon a little respite of God's judgments, return to it again. This people hath a revolting, rebellious heart, not kept in awe by the terror of God's judgments, nor engaged in honour and gratitude by the great things he had done for them, to keep themselves in his love. The providence of God will not change the hearts and lives of sinners.

II. Israel's troubles repeated. This would follow of course; let all that sin expect to suffer; with the froward God will show himself froward, (Ps. 18. 26.) and will walk contrary to those that walk contrary to him, Lev. 26. 21, 24. Now as to this trouble,

1. It arose from a very despicable enemy. God delivered them into the hand of Midian; (v. 1.) not Midian in the south where Jethro lived, but Midian in the east that joined to Moab, Numb. 22. 4. A people that all men despised as uncultivated, and unheaded; hence we read not here of any king, lord, or general, that they had, but the force with which they destroyed Israel, was an undisciplined mob; and, which made it the more grievous, they were a people that Israel had formerly subdued, and in a manner destroyed; (see Numb. 31. 7.) and yet by this time, (near two hundred years after,) the poor remains of them were so multiplied, and so magnified, that they were capable of being made a very severe scourge to Israel. Thus God moved them to jealousy with those which were not a people, even a foolish nation, Deut. 32. 21. The meanest creature will serve to chastise those that have made the great Creator their enemy. And when those we are authorized to rule prove rebellious and disobedient to us, it concerns us to inquire whether we have not been so to our sovereign Ruler.

2. It arose to a very formidable height, (v. 2.) The hand of Midian prevailed, purely by their multitude. God had promised to increase Israel as the sand on the sea shore; but their sin stopped their growth and diminished them, and then their enemies, though otherwise every way inferior to them, overpowered them with numbers. They came upon them as grasshoppers for multitude; (v. 5.) not in a regular army to engage them in the field, but in a confused swarm, to plunder the country, quarter themselves upon it, and enrich themselves with its spoils. Bands of robbers, and no better. And sinful Israel, being separated by sin from God, had not spirit to make head against them. Observe the wretched havoc that these Midianites made with their bands of plunderers in Israel. Here is,

(1.) The Israelites imprisoned, or rather imprisoning themselves, in dens and caves, v. 2. This was owing purely to their own timorousness and faint-heartedness, that they would rather fly than fight; it was the effect of a guilty conscience which made them tremble at the shaking of a leaf, and the just punishment of their apostasy from God, who thus fought against them with those very terrors with which he would otherwise have fought for them; had it not been for this, we cannot but think Israel a match for the Midianites, and able enough to make head against them: but the heart that departs from God is lost, not only to that which is good, but to that which is great. Sin dispirits men, and makes them sneak into dens and caves. The day will come when chief captains and mighty men will call in vain to rocks and mountains to hide them.

(2.) The Israelites impoverished, greatly impoverished, v. 6. The Midianites and the other children of the east, that joined with them to live by spoil and rapine, as long before the Sabaeans and Chaldeans did that plundered Job, free-booters, these made frequent incursions into the land of Canaan; that fruitful land was a great temptation to them; and that sloth and luxury into which the Israelites were sunk by forty years' rest, made them and their substance an easy prey to them. They came up against them, (v. 3.) pitched their camps among them, (v. 4.) and brought their cattle with them, particularly camels innumerable; (v. 5.) not a flying party, to make a sally upon them, and be gone presently, but they resolved to force their way, and penetrated through the heart of the country as far as Gaza, on the western side: (v. 4.) they let the Israelites alone to sow their ground, but toward harvest they came and seized all, and ate up and destroyed it, both grass and corn; and when they went away, took with them the sheep and oxen; so that, in short, they left no sustenance for Israel, except what was privately taken by the rightful owners into the dens and caves. Now here we may see, [1.] The justice of God in the punishment of their sin. They had neglected to honour God with their substance in tithes and offerings, and had prepared that for Baal with which God should have been served, and now God justly sends an enemy to take it away in the season thereof, Hos. 2. 3, 9. [2.] The consequence of God's departure from a people; when he goes, all good goes, and all mischiefs break in. When Israel kept in with God, they reaped what others sowed; (Josh. 24. 13. Ps. 105. 44.) but now that God had forsaken them, others reaped what they sowed. Let us take occasion from this, to bless God for our national peace and tranquillity, that we eat the labour of our hands.

III. Israel's sense of God's hand revived at last. Seven years year after year, did the Midianites make these inroads upon them,

This was his weakness. We must not expect that the miracles which were wrought when a church was in the forming, and some great truth in the settling, should be continued and repeated when the formation and settlement are completed: no, nor that the mercies God shewed to our fathers that served him, and kept close to him, should be renewed to us, if we degenerate and revolt from him. Gideon ought not to have said, either, First, That God had delivered them into the hands of the Midianites, for by their iniquities they had sold themselves; or, Secondly, That now they were in their hands, that he had forsaken them, for he had lately sent them a prophet, (v. 8.) which was a certain indication that he had not forsaken them.

(3.) The angel gave him a very effectual answer to his objections, by giving him a commission to deliver Israel out of the hands of the Midianites, and assuring him of success therein, v. 14. Now the angel is called Jehovah, for he speaks as one having authority, and not as a messenger. [1.] There was something extraordinary in the look he now gave to Gideon; it was a gracious favourable look, which revived his spirits that drooped, and silenced his fears, such a look as that with which God's countenance beholds the upright, Ps. 11. 7. He looked upon him, and smiled at the objections he made, which he gave him no direct answer to, but girded and clothed him with such power as would shortly enable him to answer them himself, and make him ashamed that ever he had made them. It was a speaking look, like Christ's upon Peter; (Luke, 22. 61.) a powerful look, a look that strangely darted new light and life into Gideon's breast, and inspired him with a generous heat, far above what he felt before. [2.] But there was much more in what he said to him. First, He commissioned him to appear and act as Israel's deliverer. Such a one the few thinking people in the nation, and Gideon among the rest, were now expecting to be raised up, according to God's former method, in answer to the cries of oppressed Israel; and now Gideon is told, "Thou art the man: Go in this thy might, this might, wherewith thou art now threshing wheat: go, and employ it to a nobler purpose, I will make thee a thresher of men." Or, rather, "this might wherewith thou art now endued by this look." God gave him his commission, by giving him all the qualifications that were necessary for the execution of it, which is more than the mightiest prince and potentate on earth can do for those to whom he gives commissions. God's fitting men for work, is a sure and constant evidence of his calling them to it. "Go, not in thy might, that which is natural, and of thyself; depend not on thine own valour; but go in this thy might, this which thou hast now received; go in the strength of the Lord God, that is the strength with which thou must strengthen thyself." Secondly, He assured him of success; this was enough to put courage into him, he might be confident he should not miscarry in the attempt; it should not turn either to his own disgrace, or the damage of his people, (as baffled enterprises do,) but to his honour and their happiness; "Thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites, and so shalt not only be an eye-witness, but a glorious instrument, of such wonders as thy fathers told thee of." Gideon, we may suppose, looked as one astonished at this strange and surprising power conferred upon him, and questions whether he may depend upon what he hears: the angel ratifies his commission with a teste meipso—an appeal to his own authority, there needed no more. "Have not I commanded thee? I that have all power in heaven and earth, and particular authority here as Israel's King, giving commissions immediately. I who am that I am, the same that sent Moses," Exod. 3. 14.

(4.) Gideon made a very modest objection against this commission; (v. 15.) O my Lord, wherewith shall I save Israel? This question bespeaks him, either, [1.] Distrustful of God and his power. As if, though God should be with him, yet it were impossible for him to save Israel. True faith is often weak, yet it shall not be rejected, but encouraged and strengthened. Or, [2.] Inquisitive concerning the methods he must take; "Lord, I labour under all imaginable disadvantages for it; if I must do it, thou must pull me in the way." Note, Those who receive commissions from God, must expect and seek for instructions from him. Or rather, [3.] Humble, self-diffident, and self-denying. The angel had honoured him, but see how meanly he speaks of himself; "My family is comparatively poor in Manasseh," (impoverished, it may be, more than other families, by the Midianites,) "and I am the least, that have the least honour and interest, in my father's house; what can I pretend to do? I am utterly unfit for the service, and unworthy of the honour." Note, God often chooses to do great things by those that are little, especially that are so in their own eyes. God delights to advance the humble.

(5.) This objection was soon answered by a repetition of the promise, that God would be with him, v. 16. "Object not thy poverty and meanness, such things have indeed often hindered men in great enterprises; but what are they to a man that has the presence of God with him, which will make up all the deficiencies of honour and estate? Surely I will be with thee, to direct and strengthen thee; and put such a reputation upon thee, that, how weak soever thy personal interest is, thou shalt have soldiers enough to follow thee, and be assured thou shalt smite the Midianites as one man, as easily as if they were but one man, and as effectually. All the thousands of Midian shall be as if they had but one neck, and thou shalt have the cutting of it off."

(6.) Gideon desires to have his faith confirmed, touching this commission; for he would not be over-credulous of that which tended so much to his own praise, would not venture upon an undertaking so far above him, and in which he must engage many more: but he would be well satisfied himself of his authority, and would be able to give satisfaction to others, as to him who gave him that authority. He therefore humbly begs of this divine person, whoever he was,

[1.] That he would give him a sign, v. 17. And the commission being given him out of the common road of providence, he might reasonably expect it should be confirmed by some act of God out of the common course of nature. "Shew me a sign to assure me of the truth of this concerning which thou talkest with me, that it is something more than talk, and that thou art in earnest." Now, under the dispensation of the Spirit, we are not to expect signs before our eyes, such as Gideon here desired, but must earnestly pray to God, that, if we have found grace in his sight, he would shew us a sign in our heart, by the powerful operations of his Spirit there, fulfilling the work of faith, and perfecting what is lacking in it.

[2.] In order hereunto, that he would accept of a treat, and so give him a further and longer opportunity of conversation with him, v. 18. Those who know what it is to have communion with God, desire the continuance of it, and are loath to part, praying with Gideon, Depart not hence, I pray thee. That which Gideon designed in courting his stay, was, that he might bring out some provision of meat for this stranger; he did not take him into the house to entertain him there, either because his father's house were not well affected to him and his friends, or because he desired still to be in private with this stranger, and to converse with him alone, therefore calls not for a servant to bring the provision, but fetches it himself; or because thus his father Abraham entertained angels unawares, not in his tent, but under a tree, Gen. 18. 8. Upon the angel's promise to stay with him, he hastened to bring out a kid, which, it is likely, was ready boiled for his own dinner; so that, in making it ready, he had nothing to do but to put it in the basket, (for here was no sauce to serve it up in, nor the dish garnished,) and the broth in a vessel, and so he presented it, v. 19. Hereby he intended, First, To testify his grateful and generous respects to this stranger, and, in him, to God who sent him, as one that studied what he should render. He had pleaded the poverty of his family, (v. 15.) to excuse himself from being a general, but not here, to excuse himself from being hospitable. Out of the little which the Midianites had left him, he would gladly spare enough to entertain a friend, especially a messenger from heaven. Secondly, To try who, and what, this extraordinary person was. What he brought out, is called his present, v. 18. It is the same word that is used for a meat-offering; and perhaps that word is used, which signifies both, because Gideon intended to leave it to this divine person to determine which it should be, when he had it before him, whether a feast or a meat-offering, and accordingly he would be able to judge concerning him: if he ate of it as common meat, he would suppose him to be a man, a prophet; if otherwise, as it proved, he should know him to be an angel.

(7.) The angel gives him a sign, in and by that which he had kindly prepared for his entertainment; for what we offer to God for his glory, and in token of our gratitude to him, will be made, by the grace of God, to turn to our own comfort and satisfaction. The angel ordered him to take the flesh and bread out of the basket, and lay it upon a hard and cold rock, and to pour out the broth upon it, which, if he brought it hot, would soon be cold there; and Gideon did so, (v.20.) believing that the angel appointed it, not in contempt of his courtesy, but with an intention to give him a sign, which he did, abundantly to his satisfaction. For, [1.] He turned the meat into an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto himself; shewing hereby that he was not a man, who needed meat, but the Son of God, who was to be served and honoured by sacrifice, and who, in the fulness of time, was to make himself a sacrifice. [2.] He brought fire out of the rock to consume this sacrifice, summoning it, not by striking the rock, as we strike fire out of a flint, but by a gentle touch given to the offering with the end of his staff, v.21. Hereby he gave him a sign that he had found grace in his sight: for God testified his acceptance of sacrifices by kindling them, if public, with fire from heaven, as those of Moses and Elias; if private, as this, with fire out of the earth, which was equivalent—both were the effect of divine power; and this acceptance of his sacrifice evidenced the acceptance of his person, confirmed his commission, and perhaps was intended to signify his success in the execution of it, that he and his army should be a surprising terror and consumption to the Midianites, like this fire out of the rock. [3.] He departed out of his sight immediately; did not walk off as a man, but vanished and disappeared as a spirit. Here was as much of a sign as he could wish.

(8.) Gideon, though, no doubt, he was confirmed in his faith by the indications given of the divinity of the person who had spoken to him, yet, for the present, was put into a great fright by it, till God graciously pacified him, and removed his fears. [1.] Gideon speaks peril to himself; (v.22.) When he perceived that he was an angel, (which was not till he was departed, as the two disciples knew not it was Jesus they had been talking with till he was going, Luke, 24.31.) then he cried out, Alas! O Lord God, be merciful to me, I am undone, for I have seen an angel, as Jacob, who wondered that his life was preserved when he had seen God, Gen.32.30. Ever since man has, by sin, exposed himself to God's wrath and curse, an express from heaven has been a terror to him, as he scarcely dares to expect good tidings thence; at least, in this world of sense, it is a very awful thing to have any sensible conversation with that world of spirits to which we are so much strangers. Gideon's courage failed him now. [2.] God speaks peace to him, v.23. It might have been fatal to him, but he assures him it should not. The Lord departed out of his sight, v.21. But, though he must no longer walk by sight, he might still live by faith, that faith which comes by hearing; for the Lord said to him, with an audible voice, (as Bishop Patrick thinks,) these encouraging words, Peace be unto thee; all is well, and be thou satisfied that it is so; fear not, he that came to employ thee did not intend to slay thee, thou shalt not die." See how ready God is to receive the hearts of those that tremble at his word and presence, and to give them, that stand in awe of his majesty, assurances of his mercy.

Lastly, The memorial of this vision which Gideon set up, was, a monument in form of an altar, the rather because it was by a kind of sacrifice upon a rock, without the solemnity of an altar, that the angel manifested his acceptance of him: then it needed not; the angel's staff was sufficient to sanctify the gift without an altar; but now it was of use to preserve the remembrance of it, which was done by the name he gave to it, Jehovah-shalom, (v.24.) The Lord peace. This is, [1.] The title of the Lord that spake to him; compare Gen.16.13. The same that is the Lord our Righteousness is our Peace; (Eph.2.14.) our Reconciler, and so our Saviour. Or, [2.] The substance of what he said to him: "The Lord spake peace, and created that fruit of the lips; bid me be easy when I was in that agitation." Or, [3.] A prayer grounded upon what he had said; so the margin understands it: The Lord send peace, that is, rest from the present trouble; for still the public welfare lay nearest his heart.

25. And it came to pass the same night, that the LORD said unto him, Take thy father's young bullock, even the second bullock of seven years old, and throw down the altar of Baal that thy father hath, and cut down the grove that is by it: 26. And build an altar unto the LORD thy God upon the top of this rock, in the ordered place, and take the second bullock, and offer a burnt sacrifice with the wood of the grove which thou shalt cut down. 27. Then Gideon took ten men of his servants, and did as the LORD had said unto him; and so it was, because he feared his father's household, and the men of the city, that he could not do it by day, that he did it by night. 28. And when the men of the city arose early in the morning, behold, the altar of Baal was cast down, and the grove was cut down that was by it, and the second bullock was offered upon the altar that was built. 29. And they said one to another, Who hath done this thing? And when they inquired and asked, they said, Gideon the son of Joash hath done this thing. 30. Then the men of the city said unto Joash, Bring out thy son, that he may die: because he hath cast down the altar of Baal, and because he hath cut down the grove that was by it. 31. And Joash said unto all that stood against him, Will ye plead for Baal? will ye save him? he that will plead for him, let him be put to death whilst it is yet morning: if he be a god, let him plead for himself, because one hath cast down his altar. 32. Therefore on that day he called him Jerubbaal, saying, Let Baal plead against him, because he hath thrown down his altar.

Here,

I. Orders are given to Gideon to begin his government with the reformation of his father's house, v.25,26. A correspondence being settled between God and Gideon, by the appearance of the angel to him, it was kept up in another way; the same night after he had seen God, when he was full of thoughts concerning what had passed, which, probably, he had not yet communicated to any, the Lord said unto him in a dream, Do so and so. Note, God's visits, if gratefully received, shall be graciously repeated. Bid God welcome, and he will come again. Gideon is appointed, 1. To throw down Baal's altar, which, it seems, his father had, either for his own house, or perhaps for the whole town. See the power of God's grace, that he could raise up a reformer, and the condescensions of his grace, that he would raise up a deliverer, out of the family of one that was a ringleader in idolatry. But Gideon must now not think it enough not to worship at that altar, which we charitably hope he had not done, but he must throw u down; not consecrate the same altar to God, (it is Bishop Hall's observation,) but utterly demolish it; God first commands down the monuments of superstition, and then enjoins his own service. He must likewise cut down the grove that was by it, the plantation of young trees, designed to beautify the place. The learned Bishop Patrick, by the grove, understands the image in the grove, probably the image of Ashtaroth, (for the word for a grove is Ashereh;) which stood upon, or close by, the altar. 2. To erect an altar to God, to Jehovah his God; which, probably, was to be notified by an inscription upon the altar to that purport; to Jehovah, Gideon's God, or Israel's. It had been an improper thing for him to have built an altar, even to the God of Israel, especially for burnt-offering and sacrifice, and would have been construed into a contempt of the altar at Shiloh, if God, who has not tied up himself to his own laws, had not bidden him do it. But now it was his duty, and an honour to be thus employed. God directs him to the place where he should build it, on the top of the rock, perhaps in the same place in which the angel had appeared to him, near to the altar he had already built; and he must not do it in a hurry, but with the decency that became a religious action, in an orderly manner, as it is in the margin, according to the ancient law for altars raised on the occasion, that they must be of earth, not of hewn stone. The word here used for the rock, on which the altar was to be built, signifies a fortress, or stronghold, erected, some think, to secure them from the Midianites; if so, it was no security, while the altar of Baal was so near it, but it was effectually fortified when an altar to the Lord was built on the top of it, for that is the best defence upon our glory. On this altar, (1.) He was to offer sacrifice. Two bullocks he must offer; his father's young bullock, and the second bullock of seven years old; so it should rather be read, not even the second, as we read it. The former, we may suppose, he was to offer for himself, the latter for the sins of the people, whom he was to deliver. It was requisite he should thus make peace with God before he made war on Midian. Till sin be pardoned, through the great Sacrifice, no good is to be expected. These bullocks, it is supposed, were intended for sacrifices on the altar of Baal, but were now converted to a better use. Thus, when the strong man armed is overcome, and dispossessed, the stronger than he divides the spoil, seizes that for himself which they prepared for Baal; let him come whose right it is, and give it him. (2.) Baal's grove, or image, or whatever it was, that was the sanctity or beauty of his altar, must not be burnt, but must be used as fuel for God's altar, to signify, not only that whatever sets up itself in opposition to God shall be destroyed, but that the justice of God will be glorified in its destruction. God ordered Gideon to do this, [1.] To try his zeal for religion, which it was necessary he should give proofs of before he took the field to give proofs of his valour there. [2.] That some steps might hereby be taken towards Israel's reformation, which must prepare the way for their deliverance. Sin, the cause, must be taken away, else how should the trouble come to an end, which was but the effect? And it might be hoped that this example of Gideon's, who was now shortly to appear so great a man, would be followed by the rest of the cities and tribes, and the destruction of this one altar of Baal would be the destruction of many.

II. Gideon was obedient to the heavenly vision, v. 27. He that was to command the Israel of God must be subject to the God of Israel, without disputing, and, as a type of Christ, must first save his people from their sins, and then save them from their enemies. 1. He had servants of his own, whom he could confide in, who, we may suppose, like him, had kept their integrity, and had not bowed the knee to Baal, and therefore were forward to assist him in destroying the altar of Baal. 2. He did not scruple taking his father's bullock, and offering it to God without his father's consent, because God, who expressly commanded him to do so, had a better title to it than his father had, and it was the greatest real kindness he could do his father to prevent his sin. 3. He expected to incur the displeasure of his father's household by it, and the ill-will of his neighbours; yet he did it, remembering how much it was Levi's praise, that, in the cause of God, he said to his father and mother, I have not seen him, Deut. 33. 9. And, while he was sure of the favour of God, he feared not the anger of men; he that bade him do it would bear him out. Yet, 4. Though he feared not their resentments when it was done, to prevent their resistance in the doing of it, he prudently chose to do it by night, that he might not be disturbed in these sacred actions. And some think it was the same night in which God spake to him to do it, and that, as soon as ever he had received the orders, he immediately applied himself to the execution of them, and finished before morning.

III. He was brought into peril of his life for doing it, v. 28. . 30. 1. It was soon discovered what was done. Gideon, when he had gone through with the business, did not desire the concealment of it, nor could it be hid, for the men of the city rose early in the morning, as it should seem, to say their matins at Baal's altar, and so to begin the day with their god, such a one as he was; a shame to those who say the true God is their God, and yet, in the morning, direct no prayer to him, nor look up. 2. It was soon discovered who had done it. Strict inquiry was made; Gideon was known to be disaffected to the worship of Baal, which brought him into suspicion, and positive proof immediately came against him; "Gideon, no doubt, has done this thing." 3. Being found guilty of the fact, to such a pitch of impiety were these degenerate Israelites arrived, that they take it for law he must die for the same, and require his own father (who, by patronizing their idolatry, had given them too much cause to expect he would comply with them herein) to deliver him up. Bring out thy son, that he may die. Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and tremble, O earth! By the law of God, the worshippers of Baal were to die, but these wicked men impiously turn the penalty upon the worshippers of the God of Israel. How prodigiously mad were they upon their idols! Was it not enough to offer the choicest of their bullocks to Baal, but must the bravest youth of their city fall as a sacrifice to that dunghill-deity, when they pretended he was provoked? How soon will idolaters become persecutors!

IV. He was rescued out of the hands of his persecutors by his own father, v. 31. 1. There were those that stood against Gideon, that not only appeared at the first to make a demand, but insisted on it, and would have put him to death. Notwithstanding the heavy judgments they were at this time under for their idolatry, yet they hated to be reformed, and walked contrary to God then when he was walking contrary to them. 2. Yet then Joash stood for him; he was one of the chief men of the city. Those that have power may do a great deal for the protection of an honest man and an honest cause; and, when they so use their power, they are ministers of God for good. This Joash had patronized Baal's altar, yet now protects him that had destroyed it; either, (1.) Out of natural affection to his son, and perhaps a particular esteem for him, as a virtuous, valiant, valuable, young man, and never the worse for not joining with him in the worship of Baal. Many that have not courage enough to keep their integrity themselves, yet have so much conscience left as makes them love and esteem those that do. If Joash had a kindness for Baal, yet he had a greater kindness for his son. Or, (2.) Out of a care for the public peace. The mob grew riotous, and, he feared, would grow more so, and therefore, as some think, he bestirred himself to suppress the tumult; "Let it be left to the judges, it is not for you to pass sentence upon any man; he that offers it, let him be put to death;" he means, not as an idolater, but as a disturber of the peace, and the mover of sedition. Under this same colour, Paul was rescued, at Ephesus, from those that were as zealous for Diana as these here for Baal, Acts, 19. 40. Or, (3.) Out of a conviction that Gideon had done well. His son, perhaps, had reasoned with him, or God, who has all hearts in his hands, had secretly and effectually influenced him to appear thus against the advocates for Baal, though he had complied with them formerly in the worship of Baal. Note, It is good to appear for God when we are called to it, though there be few or none to second us, because God can incline the hearts of those to stand by us, from whom we little expect it. Let us do our duty, and then trust God with our safety.

Two things Joash urges; [1.] That it was absurd for them to plead with Baal. "Will you, that are Israelites, the worshippers of the one only living and true God, plead for Baal, a false god? Will you be so sottish, so senseless? They whose fathers' god Baal was, and that never knew any other, are more excusable in pleading for him than you are, that are in covenant with Jehovah, and have been trained up in the knowledge of him. You, that have smarted so much for worshipping Baal, and have brought all this mischief and calamity upon yourselves by it, will you yet plead for Baal?" Note, It is bad to commit sin, but it is a great wickedness indeed to plead for it, especially to plead for Baal, that idol, whatever it is, which possesses that room in the heart which God should have. [2.] That it was needless for them to plead for Baal; if he were not a god, as was pretended, they could have nothing to say for him; if he were, he was able to plead for himself, as the God of Israel had often done, by fire from heaven, or some other judgment, against those who put contempt upon him. Here is a fair challenge to Baal, to do either good or evil, and the result convinced his worshippers of their folly, in praying to one to help them that could not avenge himself; after this, Gideon remarkably prospered, and thereby it appeared how unable Baal was to maintain his own cause. Lastly, Gideon's father hereupon gave him a new name, (v. 32.) he called him Jerubbaal; "Let Baal plead, let him plead against him, if he can; if he have any thing to say for himself, against his destroyer, let him say it." This name was a standing defiance to Baal; now that Gideon was taking up arms against the Midianites that worshipped Baal, let him defend his worshippers, if he can; it likewise gave honour to Gideon, (a sworn enemy to that great usurper, and that had carried the day against him) and encouragement to his soldiers, that they fought, under one that fought for God, against that great competitor with him for the throne. It is the probable conjecture of the learned, that that Jerombalus, whom Sanchoniathon (one of the most ancient of all the heathen writers) speaks of as a priest of the god Jao, (a corruption of the name Jehovah;) and one to whom he was indebted for a great deal of knowledge, was this Jerubbaal. He is called Jerubbesheth, (2 Sam. 11. 21.) Baal, a lord, being fitly turned into Besheth, shame.

33. Then all the Midianites and the Amalekites and the children of the east were gathered together, and went over, and pitched in the valley of Jezreel. 34. But the Spirit of the Lord came upon Gideon, and he blew a trumpet; and Abi-ezer was gathered after him. 35. And he sent messengers throughout all Manasseh; who also was gathered after him. And he sent messengers unto Asher, and unto Zebulun, and unto Naphtali; and they came up to meet them. 36. And Gideon said unto God, If thou wilt save Israel by mine hand, as thou hast said, 37. Behold, I will put a fleece of wool in the floor; and if the dew be on the fleece only, and it be dry upon all the earth beside, then shall I know that thou wilt save Israel by mine hand, as thou hast said. 38. And it was so: for he rose up early on the morrow, and thrust the fleece together, and wringed the dew out of the fleece, a bowl full of water. 39. And Gideon said unto God, Let not thine anger be hot against me, and I will speak but this once: Let me prove, I pray thee, but this once with the fleece; let it now be dry only upon the fleece, and upon all the ground let there be dew. 40. And God did so that night: for it was dry upon the fleece only, and there was dew on all the ground.

Here we have,

I. The descent which the enemies of Israel made upon them, v. 33. A vast number of Midianites, Amalekites, and Arabians, got together, and came over Jordan, none either caring, or daring, to guard that important and advantageous pass, against them; and they made their head-quarters in the valley of Jezreel, in the heart of Manasseh's tribe, not far from Gideon's city. Some think that the notice they had of Gideon's destroying Baal's altar brought them over, and that they came to plead for Baal, and to make that a pretence for quarrelling with Israel; but it is more likely that it was now harvest time, when they had been wont each year to make them such a visit as this, (v. 3.) and were expected when Gideon was threshing, v. 11. God raised up Gideon to be ready against this terrible blow came. Their success so many years in these incursions, the little opposition they had met with, and the great booty they had carried off, made them now both very eager and very confident; but, it proved, the measure of their iniquity was full; the year of recompence was come; they must now make an end to spoil, and must be spoiled, and they are gathered as sheaves to the floor, (Mic. 4. 12, 13.) for Gideon to thresh.

II. The preparation which Gideon makes to attack them in their camp, v. 34, 35. 1. God, by his Spirit, put life into Gideon; The Spirit of the Lord clothed Gideon, so the word is; clothed him as a robe, to put honour upon him, clothed him as a coat of mail, to put defence upon him. Those are well clad that are thus clothed. A spirit of fortitude from before the Lord clothed Gideon, so the Chaldee. He was, of himself, a mighty man of valour; yet personal strength and courage, though vigorously exerted, would not suffice for this great action; he must have the armour of God upon him, and that is it that he must depend upon; the Spirit of the Lord clothed him in an extraordinary manner; whom God calls to his work, he will qualify and animate for it. Gideon with his trumpet put life into his neighbours, God working with him; he blew a trumpet, to call in volunteers, and more came in than, perhaps, he expected. (1.) The men of Abi-ezer, though lately enraged against him, for throwing down the altar of Baal, and though they had condemned him to death as a criminal, were now convinced of their error, bravely came in to his assistance, and submitted to him as their general; Abi-ezer was gathered after him, v. 34.—so suddenly can God turn the hearts, even of idolaters and persecutors. (2.) Distant tribes, even Asher and Naphtali, which lay most remote, though strangers to him, obeyed his summons, and sent him in the best of their forces, v. 35. Though they lay the furthest from the danger, yet, considering that, if their neighbours were over-run by the Midianites, their own turn would be next, they were forward to join against a common enemy.

III. The signs which God gratified him with, for the confirming both of his own faith and that of his followers; and perhaps it was more for their sakes than for his own that he desired them. Or, perhaps, he desired by these to be satisfied whether this was the time of his conquering the Midianites, or whether he was to wait for some other opportunity. Observe, 1. His request for a sign; (v. 36, 37.) "Let me by this know that thou wilt save Israel by my hand; let a fleece of wool, spread in the open air, be wet with the dew, and let the ground about it be dry." The purport of this is, Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief. He found his own faith weak and wavering, and therefore begged of God, by this sign, to perfect what was lacking in it. We may suppose God, who intended to give him these signs, for the glorifying of his own power and goodness, put it into his heart to ask them; yet, when he repeated his request for a second sign, the reverse of the former, he did it with a very humble apology, deprecating God's displeasure, because it looked so like a peevish humourous distrust of God, and dissatisfaction with the many assurances he had already given him; (v. 39.) Let not thine anger be hot against

3c. Though he took the boldness to ask another sign, yet he did it with such fear and trembling, as shewed that the familiarity God had graciously admitted him to did not breed any contempt of God's glory, or presumption on God's goodness. Abraham had given him an example of this, when God gave him leave to be very free with him; (Gen. 18. 30, 32.) Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak. God's favour must be sought with great reverence, due sense of our distance, and a religious fear of his wrath. 2. God's gracious grant of his request. See how tender God is of true believers, though they be weak, and how ready to condescend to their infirmities, that the bruised reed may not be broken, nor the smoking flax quenched. Gideon would have the fleece wet, and the ground dry; but then, lest any should object, "It is natural for wool, if ever so little moisture fall, to drink it in, and retain it, and therefore there was nothing extraordinary in that;" though the quantity wrung out was sufficient to obviate that objection, yet he desires, that, next night, the ground might be wet, and the fleece dry; and so willing is God to give to the heirs of promise strong consolation, (Heb. 6. 17, 18.) even by two immutable things, he suffers himself, not only to be prevailed with by their importunities, but even to be prescribed to by their doubts and dissatisfactions.

These signs were, (1.) Truly miraculous, and therefore abundantly serving to confirm his commission. It is said of the dew, that it is from the Lord, and tarrieth not for man, nor waiteth for the sons of men, Mic. 5. 7. And yet God here, in this matter, hearkened to the voice of a man; as to Joshua, in the directing the course of the sun, so to Gideon, in directing that of the dew; by which it appears, that it falls not by chance, but by providence. The latter sign inverted the former, and, to please Gideon, it was wrought backward and forward; whence Dr. Fuller observes, that heaven's real miracles will endure turning, being inside and outside both alike. (2.) Very significant. He and his men were going to engage the Midianites; could God distinguish between a small fleece of Israel and the vast floor of Midian? Yes, by this he is made to know that he can. Is Gideon desirous that the dew of divine grace might descend upon himself in particular? He sees the fleece wet with dew, to assure him of it. Does he desire that God will be as the dew to all Israel? Behold, all the ground is wet. Some make this fleece an emblem of the Jewish nation, which, when time was, was wet with the dew of God's word and ordinances, while the rest of the world was dry; but, since the rejection of Christ, and his gospel, they are dry as the heath in the wilderness, while the nations about are as a watered garden.

CHAP. VII.

This chapter presents us with Gideon in the field, commanding the army of Israel, and routing the army of the Midianites, for which great exploit we found, in the former chapter, how he was prepared, by his converse with God, and his conquest of Baul. We are here told, I. What direction God gave to Gideon for the modelling of his army, by which it was reduced to three hundred men, v. 1.. 8. II. What encouragement God gave to Gideon to attack the enemy, by sending him unknown into their camp, to hear a Midianite tell his dream, v. 9.. 15. III. How he formed his attack upon the enemy's camp, with his three hundred men, not to fight them, but to frighten them, v. 16.. 20. IV. The success of this attack; it put them to flight, and gave them a total rout, the disbanded forces, and their other neighbours, then coming in to his assistance, v. 21.. 25. It is a story that shines very bright in the book of the wars of the Lord.

1. THEN Jerubbaal, who is Gideon, and all the people that were with him, rose up early, and pitched beside the well of Harod: so that the host of the Midianites were on the north side of them, by the hill of Moreh, in the valley. 2. And the LORD said unto Gideon, The people that are with thee are too many for me to give the Midianites into their hands, lest Israel vaunt themselves against me, saying, Mine own hand hath saved me.

3. Now therefore go to, proclaim in the ears of the people, saying, Whosoever is fearful and afraid, let him return and depart early from mount Gilead. And there returned of the people twenty and two thousand; and there remained ten thousand. 4. And the LORD said unto Gideon, The people are yet too many; bring them down unto the water, and I will try them for thee there: and it shall be, that of whom I say unto thee, This shall go with thee, the same shall go with thee; and of whomsoever I say unto thee, This shall not go with thee, the same shall not go. 5. So he brought down the people unto the water: and the LORD said unto Gideon, Every one that lappeth of the water with his tongue, as a dog lappeth, him shalt thou set by himself; likewise every one that boweth down upon his knees to drink. 6. And the number of them that lapped, putting their hand to their mouth, were three hundred men: but all the rest of the people bowed down upon their knees to drink water. 7. And the LORD said unto Gideon, By the three hundred men that lapped will I save you, and deliver the Midianites into thine hand: and let all the other people go every man unto his place. 8. So the people took victuals in their hand, and their trumpets: and he sent all the rest of Israel every man unto his tent, and retained those three hundred men: and the host of Midian was beneath him in the valley.

Here,

I. Gideon applies himself, with all possible care and industry, to do the part of a good general, in leading on the hosts of Israel against the Midianites. He rose up early, (v. 1.) as one whose heart was upon his business, and who was afraid of losing time. Now that he is sure God is with him, he is impatient of delay. He pitched near a famous well, that his army might not be distressed for want of water, and gained the higher ground, which, possibly, might be some advantage to him, for the Midianites were beneath him in the valley. Note, Faith in God's promises must not slacken, but rather quicken, our endeavours. When we are sure God goes before us, then we must bestir ourselves, 2 Sam. 5. 24.

II. God provides that the praise of the intended victory may be reserved wholly to himself, by appointing three hundred men only to be employed in this service. The army consisted of thirty-two thousand men—a small army, in comparison with what Israel might have raised upon so great an occasion, and a very small one, in comparison with what the Midianites had now brought into the field; Gideon was ready to think them too few, but God comes to him, and tells him they were too many; (v. 2.) not but that they did well who offered themselves willingly to this expedition, but God saw fit not to make use of all that came. We often find God bringing great things to pass by a few hands, but this was the only time that he purposely made them fewer. Had Deborah lately blamed those who came not to the help of the Lord, and yet, in the next great action, must they be turned off that do come? Yes; 1. God would hereby shew, that, when he employed likely instruments in his service, he did not need them, but could do his work without them, so that he was not indebted to them for their service, but they to him for employing them. 2. He would hereby put them to shame for their cowardice, who had tamely submitted to the Midianites, and durst not make head against them, because of the disproportion of their numbers. They now saw if they had but made sure of the favour of God, one of them might have chased a thousand. 3. He would hereby silence and exclude boasting: that is the reason here given by him who knows the pride that is in men's hearts, lest Israel vaunt themselves against me. Justly were they denied the honour of the service, who would not give God the honour of the success. Mine own hand hath saved me, is a word that must never come out of the mouth of such as shall be saved. He that glories must glory in the Lord, and all flesh must be silent before him.

Two ways God took to lessen their numbers.

(1.) He ordered all that would own themselves timorous and faint-hearted to be dismissed, v. 3. He was now encamped on a mountain close to the enemy, called mount Gilead, from Gilead, the common ancestor of these families of Manasseh, which were seated on this side Jordan, Numb. 26. 30. And from thence they might see, perhaps, the vast numbers of the enemy; those, therefore, who were disheartened at the sight, were left to their liberty to go back if they pleased. There was a law for making such a proclamation as this, Deut. 20. 8. But Gideon, perhaps, thought that concerned only those wars which were undertaken for the enlarging of their coast, not, as this, for their necessary defence against an invader; therefore Gideon had not proclaimed this, if God had not commanded him, who knew how his forces would hereby be diminished. Cowards would be as likely as any, after the victory, to take the honour of it from God, and therefore God would not do them the honour to employ them in it. One would have thought there had been scarcely one Israelite to be found, that, against such an enemy as the Midianites, and under such a leader as Gideon, would have owned himself fearful; yet above two parts of three took the advantage of this proclamation, and filed off, when they saw the strength of the enemy and their own weakness, not considering the assurances of the divine presence which their general had received of the Lord, and, it is likely, delivered unto them. Some think the oppression they had been under so long had broken their spirits; others, more probably, that consciousness of their own guilt had deprived them of their courage. Sin stared them in the face, and therefore they durst not look death in the face. Note, Fearful faint-hearted people are not fit to be employed for God; and, among those that are listed under the banner of Christ, there are more such than we think there are.

(2.) He directed the cashiering of all that remained, but three hundred men, and he did it by a sign. The people are yet too many for me to make use of, v. 4. See how much God's thoughts and ways are above our's: Gideon himself, it is likely, thought they were too few; though they were as many as Barak encountered Sisera with, ch. 4. 14. and, had he not forced his way through the discouragement by dint of faith, he himself would have started back from so hazardous an enterprise, and have made the best of his own way back: but God saith, They are too many, and, when diminished to a third part, they are yet too many, which may help us to understand those providences which sometimes seem to weaken the church and its interests; its friends are too many, too mighty, too wise, for God to work deliverance by; God is taking a course to lessen them, that he may be exalted, in his own strength.

Gideon is ordered to bring his soldiers to the watering, probably, to the well of Harod, v. 1. and the stream that ran from it; he, or some appointed by him, must observe how they drank. We must suppose they were all thirsty, and were inclined to drink; it is likely he told them they must prepare to enter upon action immediately, and therefore must refresh themselves accordingly, not expecting, after this, to drink any thing else but the blood of their enemies. Now, [1.] Some, and no doubt the most, would kneel down on their knees to drink, and put their mouths to the water as horses do, and so they might get their full draught. [2.] Others, it may be, would not make such a formal business of it, but, as a dog laps with his tongue, so they would hastily take up a little water in their hands, and cool their mouths with that, and be gone. Three hundred, and no more, there were of this latter sort, that drank in haste, and by those God tells Gideon he would rout the Midianites, v. 7. By the former distinction, none were retained but hearty men, that were resolved to do their utmost for retrieving the liberties of Israel; but, by this further distinction, it was provided that none should be made use of, but, First, Men that were hardy, that could endure long fatigue, without complaining of thirst or weariness, that had not in them any dregs either of sloth or luxury. Secondly, Men that were hasty, that thought it long until they were engaged with the enemy, preferring the service of God and their country before their necessary refreshments; such as these God chooses to employ, that are not only well-affected, but zealously affected, in a good thing. And also because these were the smaller number, and therefore the least likely to effect what they were designed for, God would by them save Israel. It was a great trial to the faith and courage of Gideon, when God bid him let all the rest of the people but these three hundred go every man to his place, that is, go where they pleased out of his call, and from under his command; yet, we may suppose, those that were hearty in the cause, though now set aside, did not go far out of hearing, but that they were ready to follow the blow, when the three hundred men had made the assault; though that does not appear.

Thus strangely was Gideon's army purged and modelled, and reduced, instead of being recruited, as one would think, in so great an action, it both needed and deserved to be. Now, let us see how this little despicable regiment, on which the stress of the action must lie, was accoutred and fitted out. Had these three hundred been double-manned with servants and attendants, and double-armed with swords and spears, we should have thought them the more likely to bring something to pass. But, instead of making them more serviceable by their equipment, they are made less so. For, 1. Every soldier turns sutler, they took victuals in their hand, v. 8. left their baggage behind, and every man burthened himself with his own provision, which was a trial of their faith, whether they could trust God, when they had no more provisions with them than they could carry, and a trial of their diligence, whether they would carry as much as they had occasion for. This was indeed living from hand to mouth. 2. Every soldier turns trumpeter. The regiments that were cashiered left their trumpets behind them for the use of those three hundred men, who were furnished with those instead of weapons of war, as if they had been going rather to a game than to a battle.

9. And it came to pass the same night, that the Lord said unto him, Arise, get thee down unto the host; for I have delivered it into thine hand. 10. But if thou fear to go down, go thou with Phurah thy servant down to the host: 11. And thou shalt hear what they say; and afterward shall thine hands be strengthened to go down unto the host. Then went he down with Phurah his servant unto the outside of the armed men that were in the host. 12. And the Midianites and the Amalekites and all the children of the east lay along in the valley like grasshoppers for multitude; and their camels were without number, as the sand by the sea-side for multitude. 13. And when Gideon was come, behold, there was a man that told a dream unto his fellow, and said, Behold, I dreamed a dream, and, lo, a cake of barley-bread tumbled into the host of Midian, and came unto a tent, and smote it that it fell, and overturned it, that the tent lay along. 14. And his fellow answered and said, This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon the son of Joash, a man of Israel: for into his hand bath God delivered Midian, and all the host. 15. And it was so, when Gideon heard the telling of the dream, and the interpretation thereof, that he worshipped, and returned into the host of Israel, and said, Arise; for the LORD bath delivered into your hand the host of Midian.

Gideon's army being diminished, as we have found it was, he must either fight by faith or not at all; God, therefore, here provides recruits for his faith, instead of recruits for his forces.

I. He furnishes him with a good foundation to build his faith upon; nothing but a word from God will be footing for faith. He has that as full and express as he can desire, v. 9. A word of command to warrant the action, which otherwise seemed rash and indiscreet, and unbecoming a wise general; Arise, get thee down with this handful of men unto the host; and a word of promise to assure him of the success, which otherwise seemed very improbable; I have delivered it into thine hand, it is all thine own. This word of the Lord came to him the same night, when he was (we may suppose) full of care, how he should come off; in the multitude of his thoughts within him, these comforts did delight his soul. Divine consolations are given in to believers, not only strongly, but seasonably.

II. He furnishes him with a good prop to support his faith with. 1. He orders him to be his own spy, and now, in the dead of the night, to go down privately into the host of Midian, and see what intelligence he could gain. "If thou fear to go down to fight, go first, only with thine own servant, v. 10. and hear what they say," v. 11. and, it is intimated to him, he should hear that which would greatly strengthen his faith. God knows the infirmities of his people, and what great encouragement they may sometimes take from a small matter; and, therefore, knowing beforehand what would occur to Gideon, in that very part of the camp to which he would go down, he orders him to go down and hearken to what they said, that he might the more firmly believe what God said. He must take with him Phurah his servant, one that he could confide in, probably, one of the ten that had helped him to break down the altar of Baal; he must take him, and no one else, with him, must take him with him to be a witness of what he should hear the Midianites say, that out of the mouth of these two witnesses, when the matter came to be reported to Israel, the word might be established. He must take his servant with him, because two are better than one, and a little help better than none. 2. Being so, he orders him the sight of something that was discouraging. (1.) It was enough to frighten him, to discern, perhaps by moonlight, the vast numbers of the enemy, v. 12. the men, like grasshoppers for multitude, and they proved no better than grasshoppers for strength and courage; the camels, one could not count, any more than the sand. But, (2.) He heard that which was to him a very good omen; and which, when he had heard, he went back again immediately, supposing he now had what he was sent thither for. He overheard two soldiers of the enemy, that were comrades, talking; probably, they were in bed together, waking in the night. [1.] One of them tells his dream, and (as our dreams generally are bad, and therefore not worthy telling again) it is a very foolish one. He dreamed that he saw a barley-cake come rolling down the hill into the camp of the Midianites, and, "methought," says he, (for so we use to tell our dreams,) "this cake struck one of our tents," (perhaps one of the chief of their tents,) "and with such violence, that (would you think it?) it overturned the tent, forced down the stakes, and broke the cords at one blow, so that the tent lay along, and buried its inhabitants," v. 13. In multitudes of dreams there are divers vanities, says Solomon, Ecc. 5. 7. One would wonder what odd incoherent things are often put together by a ludicrous fancy in our dreams. [2.] The other, it may be, between sleeping and waking, undertakes to interpret this dream, and the interpretation is very far fetched:

This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon, v. 14. Out expositors now can tell us how apt the resemblance was; that Gideon, who had threshed corn for his family, and made cakes for his friend, ch. 6. 11. . 19. was fitly represented by a cake; that he and his army were as inconsiderable as a cake made of a little flour, as contemptible as a barley-cake, hastily got together, as a cake suddenly baked upon the coals, and as unlikely to conquer this great army as a cake to overthrow a tent. But, after all, do not interpretations belong to God? He put it into the head of the one to dream, and into the mouth of the other to give the sense of it; if Gideon had heard the dream only, and he and his servant had been to interpret it themselves, it had so little significance in it, that it would have done him little service, but having the interpretation from the mouth of an enemy, it not only appeared to come from God, who has all men's hearts and tongues in his hand, but it was likewise an evidence that the enemy was quite dispirited, and that the name of Gideon was become so formidable to them, that it disturbed their sleep. The victory would easily be won, which was already so tamely yielded; into his hand hath God delivered Midian. Those were not likely to fight, who saw God fighting against them.

Gideon, observing the finger of God pointing him to that very place, at that very time, to hear this dream, and the interpretation of it, was exceedingly encouraged by it against the melancholy apprehensions he had upon the reducing of his army. He was very well pleased to hear himself compared to a barley-cake, when it proved to effect such great things. Being hereby animated, we are told, v. 15. First, How he gave God the glory of it, he worshipped immediately, bowed his head, or, it may be, lifted up his eyes and hands, and, in a short ejaculation, thanked God for the victory he was now sure of, and for this encouragement to expect it. Wherever we are, we may speak to God, and worship him, and find a way open heavenward. God must have the praise of that which is encouraging to our faith. And his providence must be acknowledged in those events, which, though minute and seemingly accidental, prove serviceable to us. Secondly, How he gave his friends a share in the encouragements he had received. Arise, prepare to march presently, the Lord has delivered Midian into your hand.

16. And he divided the three hundred men into three companies, and he put a trumpet in every man's hand, with empty pitchers, and lamps within the pitchers. 17. And he said unto them, Look on me, and do likewise: and, behold, when I come to the outside of the camp, it shall be that, as I do, so shall ye do. 18. When I blow with a trumpet, I and all that are with me, then blow ye the trumpets also on every side of all the camp, and say, The sword of the LORD, and of Gideon. 19. So Gideon, and the hundred men that were with him, came unto the outside of the camp in the beginning of the middle watch; and they had but newly set the watch: and they blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers that were in their hands. 20. And the three companies blew the trumpets, and brake the pitchers, and held the lamps in their left hands, and the trumpets in their right hands to blow withal: and they cried, The sword of the LORD, and of Gideon. 21. And they stood every man in his place round about the camp: and all the host ran, and cried, and fled. 22. And the three hundred blew the trumpets, and the LORD set every man's sword against his fellow, even throughout all the host: and the host fled to Beth-shittah in Zererath, and to the border of Abel-meholah, unto Tabhath.

Here is,

1. The alarm which Gideon gave to the hosts of Midian in the dead time of the night; for it was intended that they who had so long been a terror to Israel, and had so often frightened them, should themselves be routed and ruined, purely by terror. The attack here made, was, in many circumstances, like that which Abraham made upon the army that had taken Lot captive; the number of men much the same, Abraham had three hundred and eighteen, Gideon three hundred; they both divided their forces, both made their attack by night, and were both victorious under great disadvantages, Gen. 14. 14, 15. and Gideon is not only a son of Abraham, (so were the Midianites by Keturah,) but an heir of his faith. Gideon, 1. Divided his army, small as it was, into three battalions, v. 16. one of which he himself commanded, v. 19. because great armies (and such a one he would make a shew of) were usually divided into the right wing, and left wing, and the body of the army. 2. He ordered them all to do as he did, v. 17. He told them now, it is very likely, what they must do, else the thing was so strange, they would scarcely have done it of a sudden, but he would, by doing it first, give notice to them when to do it, as officers exercise their soldiers with the word of command, or by beat of drum. Look on me, and do likewise: Such is the word of command our Lord Jesus, the Captain of our salvation, gives his soldiers, for he has left us an example, with a charge to follow it, As I do, so shall ye do. 3. He made his descent in the night, when they were secure, and least expected it, which would put them into great consternation; and when the smallness of his army would not be discovered; in the night, all frights are most frightful; especially in the dead of the night, as this was, a little after midnight, when the middle watch began, and the alarm would wake them out of their sleep. We read of terror by night, as very terrible, Ps. 21. 5. and fear in the night, Cant. 3. 8. 4. That which Gideon aimed at, was, to frighten this huge host, to give them not only a fatal rout, but a very shameful one. He accoutred his army with every man a trumpet in his right hand, and an earthen piteher, with a torch in it, in his left, and he himself thought it no disparagement to him, to march before them thus armed. He would make but a jest of conquering this army, and goes out against them, rather as against a company of children, than of soldiers. The virgin, the daughter of Zion, hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn, Isa. 37. 22. The fewness of his men favoured his design, for, being so few, they marched to the camp with the greater secrecy and expedition; so that they were not discovered till they were close by the camp; and he contrived to give the alarm when they had just mounted the guards, v. 19. that the sentinels, being then wakeful, might the sooner disperse the alarm through the camp, which was the best service they could do him.

Three ways Gideon contrived to strike a terror upon this army, and put them into confusion. (1.) With a great noise; every man must blow his trumpet in the most terrible manner he could, and clatter an earthen piteher to pieces at the same time; probably, each dashed his piteher to his next man's, and so they were broken both together, which would not only make a great crash, but was a figure of what would be the effects of the fright, even the Midianites' killing one another. (2.) With a great blaze; the lighted torches were hid in the pitehers, like a candle under a bushel, until they came to the camp, and then, being taken out all together of a sudden, would make a glaring shew, and run through the camp like a flash of lightning. Perhaps with these they set some of the tents on the outside of the camp on fire, which would very much increase the confusion. (3.) With a great shout; every man must cry, For the Lord, and for Gideon, so some think it should be read, v. 18. for there the sword is not in the original, but it is, (v. 20.) The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon. It should

is the sword of Gideon: finding his name was a terror to them, he thus improves it against them; but prefixes the name of Jehovah, as the figure, without which, his own was but an insignificant cypher. This would put life into his own men, who might well take courage, when they had such a God as Jehovah, and such a man as Gideon, both to fight for, and to fight for them: well might they follow, who had such leaders. It would likewise put their enemies into a fright, who had of old heard of Jehovah's great name, and of late of Gideon's. The sword of the Lord is all in all to the success of the sword of Gideon, yet the sword of Gideon must be employed. Men the instruments, and God the principal Agent, must both be considered in their places; but men, the greatest and best, always in subserviency and subordination to God. This army was to be defeated purely by terrors, and those are especially the sword of the Lord. These soldiers, if they had swords by their sides, that was all, they had none in their hands, but they gained the victory by shouting, "The sword." So the church's enemies are routed by a sword out of the mouth, Rev. 19. 21.

Now, this method, here taken, of defeating the Midianites, may be alluded to, [1.] As typifying the destruction of the devil's kingdom in the world, by the preaching of the everlasting gospel, the sounding of that trumpet, and the holding forth of that light out of earthen vessels, for such the ministers of the gospel are, in whom the treasure of that light is deposited, 2 Cor. 4. 6, 7. Thus God chose the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, a barley-cake to overthrow the tents of Midian, that the excellency of the power might be of God only; the gospel is a sword, not in the hand, but in the mouth, the sword of the Lord, and of Gideon; of God and Jesus Christ, him that sits on the throne, and the Lamb. [2.] As representing the terrors of the great day. So the excellent Bishop Hall applies it; if these pitchers, trumpets, and fire-brands, did so daunt and dismay the proud troops of Midian and Amalek, who shall be able to stand before the last terror, when the trumpet of the archangel shall sound, the elements shall be on a flame, the heavens pass away with a great noise, and the Lord himself shall descend with a shout?

II. The wonderful success of this alarm. The Midianites were shouted out of their lives, as the walls of Jericho were shouted down, that Gideon might see what he lately despaired of ever seeing, the wonders that their fathers told them of. Gideon's soldiers observed their orders, and stood every man in his place round about the camp, v. 21. sounding his trumpet to excite them to fight one another, and holding out his torch to light them to their ruin. They did not rush into the host of Midian, as greedy either of blood or spoil, but patiently stood still to see the salvation of the Lord, a salvation purely of his own working. Observe how the design took effect.

1. They feared the Israelites, all the host immediately took the alarm, it flew like lightning through all their lines, and they ran, and cried, and fled, v. 21. There was something natural in this fright; we may suppose they had not had intelligence of the great diminution of Gideon's army, but rather concluded, that, since their last advices, it had been growing greater and greater: and therefore had reason to suspect, knowing how odious and grievous they had made themselves, and what bold steps had been taken toward the throwing off of their yoke, that it was a very great army which was to be ushered in with all those trumpeters and torch-bearers; but there was more of a supernatural power impressing this terror upon them; God himself gave it the setting on, to shew how that promise should have been fulfilled, if they had not forfeited it, One of you shall chase a thousand. See the power of imagination, and how much it may become a terror at some times, as at other times it is a pleasure.

2. They fell foul upon one another, v. 22. The Lord set every man's sword against his fellow. In this confusion, observing the trumpeters and torch-bearers to stand still without their camp, they concluded the body of the army had already entered, and therefore every one ran to the next he met, though a friend, supposing him an enemy, and one such mistake as that would occasion many, for then he that slew him would certainly be taken for an enemy, and would be dispatched immediately. It is our interest to preserve such a command of our own spirits, as never to be afraid with any amazement, for we cannot conceive what mischiefs we thereby plunge ourselves in. See also how God often makes the enemies of his church instruments to destroy one another; it is pity the church's friends should ever be thus infatuated.

3. They fled for their lives. Perhaps, when day-light came, they were sensible of their mistake in fighting with one another, and concluded, that, by this fatal error, they had so weakened themselves, that now it was impossible to make any head against Israel, and therefore made the best of their way toward their own country, though, for aught that appears, the three hundred men kept their ground. The wicked flees when none pursues, Prov. 28. 1. Terrors make him afraid on every side, and drive him to his feet, Job, 18. 11.

23. And the men of Israel gathered themselves together out of Naphtali, and out of Asher, and out of all Manasseh, and pursued after the Midianites. 24. And Gideon sent messengers throughout all mount Ephraim, saying, Come down against the Midianites, and take before them the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan. Then all the men of Ephraim gathered themselves together, and took the waters unto Beth-barah and Jordan. 25. And they took two princes of the Midianites, Oreb and Zeeb; and they slew Oreb upon the rock Oreb, and Zeeb they slew at the wine-press of Zeeb, and pursued Midian, and brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon on the other side Jordan.

We have here the prosecution of this glorious victory.

1. Gideon's soldiers that had been dismissed, and perhaps had begun to disperse themselves, upon notice of the enemies' flight, got together again, and vigorously pursued them whom they had not courage to face. The men of Israel out of Naphtali and Asher, who did this, v. 23. were not such as now came from those distant countries, but the same that had enlisted themselves, ch. 6. 35. but had been cashiered. They who were fearful and afraid to fight, v. 3. now took heart, when the worst was over, and were ready enough to divide the spoil, though backward to make the onset. They also that might not fight, though they had a mind to it, and were disbanded by order from God, did not, as those, 2 Chron. 25. 10, 13. return in great anger, but waited for an opportunity of doing service in pursuing the victory, though they were denied the honour of helping to force the lines.

The Ephraimites, upon a summons from Gideon, came in unanimously, and secured the passes over Jordan, by the several fords, to cut off the enemies' retreat into their own country, that they might be entirely destroyed, to prevent the like mischief to Israel another time. Now, that they had begun to fall, they resolved utterly to destroy them, Esth. 6. 13. They took the waters, v. 24. that is, posted themselves along the river side, so that the Midianites, who fled from those who pursued them, fell into the hand of those that waited to intercept them. Here was fear, and the pit, and the snare, Isa. 24. 17.

3. Two of the chief commanders of the host of Midian were taken and slain by the Ephraimites on this side Jordan, v. 25. Their names, perhaps, signified their nature, Oreb signifies a raven, and Zeeb a wolf (Corvinus and Lupus). These in their flight had taken shelter, one in a rock, (Isa. 2. 21. Rev. 6. 15.) the other by a wine-press, as Gideon, for fear of them, had lately hid his corn by a wine-press, ch. 6. 11. But the places of their shelter were made the places of their slaughter, and the memory of it preserved to posterity in the names of the places, to their perpetual infamy; Here fell the princes of Midian.

CHAP. VIII.

This chapter gives us a further account of Gideon's victory over the Midianites, with the residue of the story of his life and government. I. Gideon prudently pacifies the offended Ephraimites, v. 1. .3. II. He bravely pursues the flying Midianites, v. 4. 10. .12. III. He justly chastises the insolence of the men of Succoth and Penuel, who basely abused him, v. 5. .9. and were reckoned with for it, v. 13. .17. IV. He honourably slays the two kings of Midian, v. 18. .21. V. After all this, he modestly declines the government of Israel, v. 22, 23. VI. He foolishly gratified the superstitious humour of his people, by setting up an ephod in his own city, which proves a great snare, v. 24. .27. VII. He kept the country quiet forty years, v. 28. VIII. He died in honour, and left a numerous family behind him, v. 29. .32. IX. Both he and his God were soon forgotten by ungrateful Israel, v. 33. .35.

1. AND the men of Ephraim said unto him, Why hast thou served us thus, that thou calledst us not, when thou wentest to fight with the Midianites? And they did chide with him sharply. 2. And he said unto them, What have I done now in comparison of you? Is not the gleaning of the grapes of Ephraim better than the vintage of Abi-ezer? 3. God hath delivered into your hands the princes of Midian, Oreb and Zeeb: and what was I able to do in comparison of you? Then their anger was abated toward him, when he had said that.

No sooner were the Midianites, the common enemy, subdued, than, through the violence of some hot spirits, the children of Israel are ready to quarrel among themselves; an unhappy spark was struck, which, if Gideon had not, with a great deal of wisdom and grace, extinguished immediately, might have broken out into a flame of fatal consequence. The Ephraimites, when they brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon as general, instead of congratulating his successes, and addressing him with thanks for his great services, as they ought to have done, picked a quarrel with him, and grew very hot upon it.

I. Their accusation was very peevish and unreasonable, Why didst thou not call us, when thou wentest to fight with the Midianites? v. 1. Ephraim was brother to Manasseh, Gideon's tribe, and had had the pre-eminence in Jacob's blessing, and in Moses's, and therefore was very jealous of Manasseh, lest that tribe should at any time eclipse the honour of their's. Hence we find Manasseh against Ephraim, and Ephraim against Manasseh, Isa. 9. 21. A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city, and their contentions are as the bars of a castle, Prov. 18. 19. But how unjust was their quarrel with Gideon! They were angry he did not send for them to begin the attack upon Midian, as well as to follow the blow. Why were they not called to lead the van? The post of honour, they thought, belonged to them. But, 1. Gideon was called of God, and must act as he directed; he neither took the honour to himself, nor did he dispose of honours himself, but left it to God to do all. So that the Ephraimites, in this quarrel, reflected upon the divine conduct; and what was Gideon, that they murmured against him? 2. Why did not the Ephraimites offer themselves willingly to the service? They knew the enemy was in their country, and had heard of the forces that were raising to oppose them, to which they ought to have joined themselves, in zeal, for the common cause, though they had not a formal invitation. Those seek themselves more than God, that stand upon a point of honour to excuse themselves from doing real service to God and their generation. In Deborah's time there was a root of Ephraim, ch. 5. 14. Why did not that appear now? The case itself called them, they needed not wait for a call from Gideon. 3. Gideon had saved their credit in not calling them; if he had sent for them, no doubt, many of them would have gone back with the faint-hearted, or been dismissed with the lazy, slothful, and intemperate; so that, by not calling them, he prevented the putting of those slurs upon them. Cowards will seem valiant when the danger is over, but those consult their reputation who try their courage when danger is near.

II. Gideon's answer was very calm and peaceable, and was intended not so much to justify himself, as to please and pacify them, v. 2. 3. He answers them, 1. With a great deal of meekness and temper; he did not resent the affront, nor answer anger with anger, but mildly reasons the case with them, and he won as true honour by this command which he had over his own passion, as by his victory over the Midianites; He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty. 2. With a great deal of modesty and humility, magnifying their performances above his own. Is not the gleaner of the grapes of Ephraim, who picked up the stragglers of the enemy, and cut off those of them that escaped, better than the vintage of Abiezer—a greater honour to them, and better service to the country, than the first attack Gideon made upon them? The destruction of the church's enemies is compared to a vintage, Rev. 14. 18. In this he owns their gleanings better than his gatherings. The improving of a victory is often more honourable, and of greater consequence, than the winning of it; in this they had signalized themselves, and their own courage and conduct; or, rather, God had dignified them; for though, to magnify their achievements, he is willing to diminish his own performances, yet he will not take any flowers from God's crown to adorn their's with; "God has delivered into your hands the princes of Midian, and a great slaughter has been made of the enemy by your numerous hosts, and what was I able to do with three hundred men, in comparison of you and your brave exploits?" Gideon stands here a very great example of self-denial. And this instance shews us, (1.) That envy is best removed by humility. It is true, even right works are often envied, Eccl. 4. 4. Yet they are not so apt to be so, when those who do them appear not to be proud of them. They are malignant indeed, who seek to cast those down from their excellency, that humble and abase themselves. (2.) It is likewise the surest method of ending strife, for only by pride comes contention, Prov. 13. 10. (3.) Humility is most amiable and admirable in the midst of great attainments and advancements. Gideon's conquests did greatly set off his condescensions. (4.) It is the proper act of humility to esteem others better than ourselves, and in honour to prefer one another.

Now, what was the issue of this controversy? The Ephraimites had chidden with him sharply, v. 1. forgetting the respect owing to their general, and one whom God had honoured, and giving vent to their passion in a very indecent liberty of speech, a certain sign of a weak and indefensible cause; reason runs low when the chiding flies high. But Gideon's soft answer turned away their wrath, Prov. 15. 1. Their anger was abated toward him, v. 3. It is intimated, that they retained some resentment, but he prudently overlooked it, and let it cool by degrees. Very great and good men must expect to have their patience tried, by the unkindnesses and follies even of those they serve, and must not think it strange.

4. And Gideon came to Jordan, and passed over, ae, and the three hundred men that were with him, faint, yet pursuing them. 5. And he said unto the men of Succoth, Give, I pray you, loaves of bread unto the people that follow me; for they be faint, and I am pursuing after Zebah and Zalmunna, kings of Midian. 6. And the princes of Succoth said, Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thine hand, that we should give bread unto thine army? 7. And Gideon said, Therefore when the LORD hath delivered Zebah and Zalmunna into mine hand, then I will tear your flesh with the thorns of the wilderness and with briers. 8. And he went up thence to Penuel, and spake unto them likewise: and the men of Penuel answered him as the men of Succoth had answered him. 9. And he spake also unto the men of Penuel, saying, When I come again in peace, I will break down this tower. 10. Now Zebah and Zalmunna were in Karkor, and their hosts with them, about fifteen thousand men, all that were left of all the hosts of the children of the east: for there fell an hundred and twenty thousand men that drew sword. 11. And Gideon went up by the way of them that dwelt in tents on the east of Nobah and Jogbehah, and smote the host: for the host was secure. 12. And when Zebah and Zalmunna fled, he pursued after them, and took the two kings of Midian, Zebah and Zalmunna, and discomfited all the host. 13. And Gideon the son of Joash returned from battle before the sun was up, 14. And caught a young man of the men of Succoth, and inquired of him: and he described unto him the princes of Succoth, and the elders thereof, even threescore and seventeen men. 15. And he came unto the men of Succoth, and said, Behold Zebah and Zalmunna, with whom ye did upbraid me, saying, Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thine hand, that we should give bread unto thy men that are weary? 16. And he took the elders of the city, and thorns of the wilderness and briers, and with them he taught the men of Succoth. 17. And he beat down the tower of Penuel, and slew the men of the city.

In these verses, we have,

1. Gideon, as a valiant general, pursuing the remaining Midianites, and bravely following his blow. A very great slaughter was made of the enemy at first, one hundred and twenty thousand men that drew the sword, v. 10. Such a terrible execution did they make among themselves, and so easy a prey were they to Israel: but, it seems, the two kings of Midian, being better provided than the rest for an escape, with fifteen thousand men, got over Jordan before the passes could be secured by the Ephraimites, and made toward their own country: Gideon thinks he does not fully execute his commission to save Israel, if he let them escape. He is not content to chase them out of the country, but he will chase them out of the world, Job, 18. 18. This resolution is here pushed on with great firmness, and crowned with great success.

1. His firmness was very exemplary; he effected his purpose under the greatest disadvantages and discouragements that could be. (1.) He took none with him, but his three hundred men, who now laid aside their trumpets and torches, and betook themselves to their swords and spears. God had said, By these three hundred men will I save you, ch. 7. 7. And, confiding in that promise, Gideon kept to them only, v. 4. He expected more from three hundred men, supported by a particular promise, than from so many thousands, supported only by their own valour. (2.) They were faint, and yet pursuing, much fatigued with what they had done, and yet eager to do more against the enemies of their country. Our spiritual warfare must thus be prosecuted with what strength we have, though we have but little: it is many a time the true Christian's case, fainting, and yet pursuing. (3.) Though he met with discouragement from those of his own people, was jeered for what he was doing, as going about what he could never accomplish, yet he went on with it. If those that should be our helpers, in the way of our duty, prove hinderances to us, let not that drive us off from it. Those know not how to value God's acceptance, that know not how to despise the reproaches and contempts of men. (4.) He made a very long march by the way of them that dwell in tents, v. 11. Either because he hoped to find them kinder to him than the men of Succoth and Penuel, that dwell in walled towns. (Sometimes there is more generosity and charity found in country-tents than in city-palaces.) Or, because that was a road in which he would be least expected, and therefore that way it would be the greater surprise to them. It is evident, he spared no pains to complete his victory. Now he found it an advantage to have his three hundred men, such as could bear hunger, and thirst, and toil. It should seem he set upon them by night, as he had done before, for the host was secure. The security of sinners often proves their ruin, and dangers are most fatal when least feared.

2. His success was very encouraging to resolution and industry in a good cause. He routed the army, v. 11. and took the two kings prisoners, v. 12. Note, The fear of the wicked shall come upon him. They that think to run from the sword of the Lord and of Gideon, do but run upon it. If he flee from the iron weapon, yet the bow of steel shall strike him through; for evil pursueth sinners.

II. Here is Gideon, as a righteous judge, chastising the insolence of the disaffected Israelites, the men of Succoth, and the men of Penuel, both in the tribe of Gad, on the other side Jordan.

1. Their crime was great. Gideon, with a handful of feeble folk, was pursuing the common enemy, to complete the deliverance of Israel; his way leads him through the city of Succoth first, and afterward of Penuel; he expects not that the magistrates should meet him in their formalities, congratulate his victory, present him with the keys of their city, give him a treat, much less that they should send forces in to his assistance, though he was entitled to it all; but he only begs some necessary food for his soldiers that were ready to faint for want, and he does it very humbly and importunately, Give, I pray you, loaves of bread unto the people that follow me, v. 5. The request had been reasonable if they had been but poor travellers in distress; but, considering that they were soldiers, called, and chosen, and faithful, Rev. 17. 14. men whom God had greatly honoured, and whom Israel was highly obliged to, who had done great service to their country, and were now doing more; that they were conquerors, and had power to put them under contribution; that they were fighting God's battles and Israel's; nothing could be more just than that they should furnish them with the best provisions their city afforded. But the princes of Succoth neither feared God, nor regarded man. For, (1.) In contempt of God, they refused to answer the just demands of him whom God had raised up to save them, affronted him, bantered him, despised the success he had already been honoured with, despaired of the success of his present undertaking, did what they could to discourage him in prosecuting the war, and were very willing to believe that the remaining forces of Midian, which they had now seen march through their country, would be too hard for him. Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thine hand? "No, nor ever will be," so they conclude, judging by the disproportion of numbers. (2.) The bowels of their compassion were shut up against their brethren, they were as destitute of love as they were of faith, would not give morsels of bread (so some read it) to them that were ready to perish. Were these princes? Were these Israelites? Unworthy either title, base and degenerate men! Surely they were worshippers of Baal, or in the interests of Midian. The men of Penuel gave the same answer to the same request, defying the sword of the Lord, and of Gideon, v. 8.

2. The warning he gave them of the punishment of their crime, was very fair. (1.) He did not punish it immediately, because he would not lose so much time from the pursuit of the enemy that were flying from him, because he would not seem to do it in a heat of passion, and because he should do it more to their shame and confusion, when he had completed his undertaking, which they thought impracticable. But, (2.) He told them how he would punish it, v. 7, 9. to shew the confidence he had of success in the strength of God, and that if they had the least grain of grace and consideration left, they might, upon second thoughts, repent of their folly, humble themselves, and contrive how to atone for it, by sending after him succours and supplies, which if they had done, no doubt, Gideon would have pardoned them. God gives notice of danger, and space to repent, that sinners may flee from the wrath to come.

3. The warning being slighted, the punishment, though very severe, was really very just. (1.) The princes of Succoth were first made examples; Gideon got intelligence of their number, seventy-seven men, their names and places of abode, which were described in writing to him, v. 14. And, to their great surprise, when they thought he had scarce overtaken the Midianites, he was returned a conqueror; his three hundred men were now the ministers of his justice; they secured all these princes, and brought them before Gideon, who shewed them his royal captives in chains. "These are the men you thought me an unequal match for, and would give me no assistance in the pursuit of," v. 15. And he punished them with thorns and briers, but, it should seem, not unto death. With these, [1.] He tormented their bodies, either by scourging, or rolling them in the thorns and briers; some way or other he tore their flesh, v. 7. Those shall have judgment without mercy, that have shewed no mercy. Perhaps he observed them to be soft and delicate men, who despised him and his company for their roughness and hardness, and therefore Gideon thus mortified them for their effeminacy. [2.] He instructed their minds, with these he taught the men of Succoth, v. 16. The correction he gave them, was intended, not for destruction, but wholesome discipline, to make them wiser and better for the future. He made them know, (so the word is,) made them know themselves and their folly, God and their duty, made them know who Gideon was, since they would not know by the success wherewith God had crowned him. Note, Many are taught with the briers and thorns of affliction, that would not learn otherwise. God gives wisdom by the rod and reproof, chastens and teaches, and, by correction, opens the ear to discipline. Our blessed Saviour, though he were a Son, yet learned obedience by the things which he suffered, Heb. 5. 8. Let every pricking brier, and grieving thorn, especially when it becomes a thorn in the flesh, be thus interpreted, thus improved, "By this God designs to teach me; what good lesson shall I learn?" (2.) Penuel's doom comes next, and it should seem he used them more severely than the other, for good reason, no doubt, v. 17. [1.] He beat down their tower, of which they gloried, in which they trusted, perhaps scornfully advising Gideon and his men rather to secure themselves in that, than to pursue the Midianites. What men make their pride, the ruin of it is justly made their shame. [2.] He slew the men of the city, not all, perhaps not the elders or princes, but those that had affronted him, and those only. He slew some of the men of the city that were most insolent and abusive, for terror to the rest, and so he taught the men of Penuel.

18. Then said he unto Zebah and Zalmunna, What manner of men were they whom ye slew at Tabor? And they answered, As thou art, so were they; each one resembled the children of a king. 19. And he said, They were my brethren, even the sons of my mother: as the LORD liveth, if ye had saved them alive, I would not slay you. 20. And he said unto Jeihor his first-born, Up, and slay them. But the youth drew not his sword: for he feared, because he was yet a youth. 21. Then Zebah and Zalmunna said, Rise thou, and fall upon us: for as the man is, so is his strength. And Gideon arose, and slew Zebah and Zalmunna, and took away the ornaments that were on their camels' necks.

Judgment began at the house of God, in the just correction of the men of Succoth and Penuel, who were Israelites, but it did not end there. The kings of Midian, when they had served to demonstrate Gideon's victories, and grace his triumphs, must now be reckoned with.

1. They are indicted for the murder of Gideon's brethren some time ago at mount Tabor. When the children of Israel, for fear of the Midianites, made them dens in the mountains, ch. 6. 2. those young men, it is likely, took shelter in that mountain, where they were found by these two kings, and most basely and barbarously slain in cold blood. When he asks them, What manner of men they were? v. 18. it is not because he was uncertain of the thing, or wanted proof of it; he was not so little concerned for his brethren's blood, as not to inquire it out before now, nor were these proud tyrants solicitous to conceal it. But he puts that question to them, that, by their acknowledgment of the more than ordinary comeliness of the persons they slew, their crimes might appear the more heinous, and consequently their punishment the more righteous. They could not but own, that though they were found in a mean and abject condition, yet they had an unusual greatness and majesty in their countenances, not unlike Gideon himself at this time, they resembled the children of a king, born for something great.

2. Being found guilty of this murder by their own confession, Gideon, though he might have put them to death, as Israel's judge, for the injuries done to that people in general, as Oreb and Zeeb, ch. 7. 25. yet he chooses rather to put on the character of an avenger of blood, as next of kin to the persons slain. They were my brethren, v. 19. Their other crimes might have been forgiven, at least Gideon would not have slain them himself, let them have answered it to the people; but the voice of his brethren's blood cries, cries to him, now it is in the power of his hand to avenge it, and therefore there is no remedy, by him must their blood be shed, though they were kings. Little did they think to have heard of this so long after; but murder seldom goes unpunished in this life.

3. The execution is done by Gideon himself with his own hand, because he was the avenger of blood; he bade his son slay them, for he was a near relation to the persons murdered, and fittest to be his father's substitute and representative, and he would thus train him up to the acts of justice and boldness, v. 20. But, (1.) The young man himself desired to be excused, he feared, though they were bound, and could make no resistance, because he was yet a youth, and not used to such work: courage does not always run in the blood. (2.) The prisoners themselves desired that Gideon would excuse it, v. 21. begged, if they must die, they might die by his own hand, which would be somewhat more honourable to them, and more easy, for by his great strength they would sooner be dispatched and rid out of their pain. As the man is, so is his strength. Either they mean it of themselves, they were men of such strength as called for a better hand than that young man's to overpower quickly; or of Gideon, "Thou art at thy full strength, he is not yet come to it, therefore be thou the executioner." From those that are grown up to maturity, it is expected, that what they do, in any service, be done with so much the more strength. Gideon dispatched them quickly, and seized the ornaments that were on their camels' necks, ornaments like the moon, so it is in the margin, either badges of their royalty, or perhaps of their idolatry, for Ashtaroth was represented by the moon, as Baal by the sun. With these he took all their other ornaments, as appears, v. 26. where we find he did not put them to so good a use as one would have wished. The destruction of these two kings, and that of the two princes, ch. 7. 25. is long after pleaded as a precedent in prayer for the ruin of others of the church's enemies, Ps. 83. 11. Make their nobles like Oreb and Zeeb, and all their princes as Zebah and Zalmunna, let them all be cut off in like manner.

22. Then the men of Israel said unto Gideon, Rule thou over us, both thou, and thy son, and thy son's son also: for thou hast delivered us from the hand of Midian. 23. And Gideon said unto them, I will not rule over you, neither shall my son rule over you: the Lord shall rule over you. 24. And Gideon said unto them, I would desire a request of you, that ye would give me every man the ear-rings of his prey. (For they had golden ear-rings, because they were Ishmaelites.) 25. And they answered, We will willingly give them. And they spread a garment, and did cast therein every man the ear-rings of his prey. 26. And the weight of the golden ear-rings that he requested was a thousand and seven hundred shekels of gold; beside ornaments, and collars, and purple raiment that was on the kings of Midian, and beside the chains that were about their camels' necks. 27. And Gideon made an ephod thereof, and put it in his city, even in Ophrah: and all Israel went thither a whoring after it: which thing became a snare unto Gideon, and to his house. 28. Thus was Midian subdued before the children of Israel, so that they lifted up their heads no more. And the country was in quietness forty years in the days of Gideon.

Here is,

1. Gideon's laudable modesty, after his great victory, in refusing the government which the people offered him. 1. It was honest in them to offer it, v. 22. Rule thou over us, for thou hast delivered us. They thought it very reasonable that he, who had gone through the toils and perils of their deliverance, should enjoy the honour and power of commanding them ever after; and very desirable that he, who in this great and critical juncture had had such manifest tokens of God's presence with him, should ever after preside in their affairs. Let us apply it to the Lord Jesus, he hath delivered us out of the hands of our enemies, our spiritual enemies, the worst and most dangerous, and therefore it is fit he should rule over us; for how can we be better ruled than by one that appears to have so great an interest in heaven, and so great a kindness for this earth? We are delivered, that we may serve him without fear, Luke, 1. 74, 75. 2. It was honourable in him to refuse it, v. 23. I will not rule over you. What he did was with a design to serve them, not to rule them; to make them safe, easy, and happy, not to make himself great or honourable. And as he was not ambitious of grandeur himself, so he did not covet to entail it upon his family, "My son shall not rule over you, either while I live, or when I am gone, but the Lord shall still rule over you, and constitute your judges by the special designation of his own Spirit, as he has done. This intimates, (1.) His modesty, and the mean opinion he had of himself and his own merits. He thought the honour of doing good was recompence enough for all his services, which needed not be rewarded with the honour of bearing sway; he that is greatest, let him be your minister. (2.) His piety, and the great opinion he had of God's government. Perhaps he discerned in the people a dislike of the theocracy, or divine government, a desire of a king like the nations, and his merits might have supplied a colourable pretence to move for this change of government. But Gideon would by no means admit it. No good man can be pleased with any honour done to himself, which ought to be peculiar to God. Were ye baptized in the name of Paul? 1 Cor. 1. 13.

II. Gideon's irregular zeal to perpetuate the remembrance of this victory, by an ephod, made of the choicest of the spoils. 1. He asked the men of Israel to give him the ear-rings of their prey; for such ornaments they strip the slain of in abundance. These he demanded, either because they were the finest gold, and therefore fittest for a religious use, or because they had had, as ear-rings, some superstitious signification, which he thought too well of. Aaron called for the ear-rings to make the golden calf of, Exod. 32. 2. These Gideon begged, v. 24. And he had reason enough to think that they who offered him a crown, when he declined it, would not deny him their ear-rings, when he begged them, nor did they, v. 25. 2. He himself added the spoil he took from the kings of Midian, which, it should seem, had fallen to his share, v. 26. The generals had that part of the prey which was most splendid, the prey of divers colours, ch. 5. 30. 3. Of this he made an ephod, v. 27. It was plausible enough, and might be well intended to preserve a memorial of so divine a victory in the judge's own city. But it was a very unadvised thing to make that memorial to be an ephod, a sacred garment. I would gladly put the best construction that can be put upon the actions of good men, and such a one we are sure Gideon was. But we have reason to suspect that this ephod had, as usual, a teraphim annexed to it, Hos. 3. 4. and that, having an altar already built by divine appointment, ch. 6. 26. which he erroneously imagined he might still use for sacrifice, he intended this for an oracle, to be consulted in doubtful cases. So the learned Dr. Spencer supposes. Each tribe having now very much its government within itself, they were too apt to covet their religion among themselves. We read very little of Shiloh and the ark there, in all the story of the judges. Sometimes by divine dispensation, and much oftener by the transgression of men, that law which obliged them to worship only at that one altar, seems not to have been so religiously observed as one would have expected, no more than afterward, when, in the reigns even of very good kings, the high places were not taken away; from which we may infer, that that law had a further reach as a type of Christ, by whose mediation alone all our services are accepted. Gideon therefore, through ignorance or inconsideration, sinned in making this ephod, though he had a good intention in it. Shiloh, it is true, was not far off, but it was in Ephraim, and that tribe had lately disobliged him, v. 1. which made him perhaps not care to go so often among them as his occasions would lead him, to consult the oracle, and therefore he would have one nearer home. However this might be honestly intended, and at first did little hurt, yet, in process of time, (1.) Israel went a whoring after it, that is, they deserted God's altar and priesthood, being fond of change, and prone to idolatry, and having some excuse for paying respect to this ephod, because so good a man as Gideon had set it up, and by degrees their respects to it grew more and more superstitious. Note, Many are led into false ways, by one false step of a good man. The beginning of sin, particularly of idolatry and will-worship, is as the letting forth of water, so it has been found in the fatal corruptions of the church of Rome, therefore leave it off before it be meddled with. (2.) It became a snare to Gideon himself, abating his zeal for the house of God in his old age, and much more to his house, who were drawn by it into sin, and it proved the ruin of the family.

III. Gideon's happy agency for the repose of Israel, v. 28. The Midianites, that had been so vexatious, gave them no more disturbance; Gideon, though he would not assume the honour and power of a king, governed as a judge, and did all the good offices he could for his people; so that the country was in quietness forty years. Hitherto the times of Israel had been reckoned by forties; Othniel judged forty years; Ehud eighty, just two forties; Barak forty; and now Gideon forty. Providence so ordering it, to bring in mind the forty years of their wandering in the wilderness; forty years long was I grieved with this generation. And see Ezek. 4. 6. After these, Eli ruled forty years, 1 Sam. 4. 18. Samuel and Saul forty, Acts. 13. 21. David forty, and Solomon forty. Forty years is about an age.

29. And Jerubbaal the son of Joash went and dwelt in his own house. 30. And Gideon had threescore and ten sons of his body begotten: for he had many wives. 31. And his concubine that was in Shechem, she also bare him a son, whose name he called Abimelech. 32. And Gideon the son of Joash died in a good old age, and was buried in the sepulchre of Joash his father, in Ophrah of the Abi-ezrites. 33. And it came to pass, as soon as Gideon was dead, that the children of Israel turned again, and went a whoring after Baalim, and made Baal-berith their god. 34. And the children of Israel remembered not the LORD their God, who had delivered them out of the hands of all their enemies on every side: 35. Neither shewed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal, namely, Gideon, according to all the goodness which he had shewed unto Israel.

We have here the conclusion of the story of Gideon.

1. He lived privately, v. 29. he was not puffed up with his great honours, did not covet a palace or castle to dwell in, but retired to the house he had lived in before his elevation. Thus that brave Roman who was called from the plough upon a sudden occasion to command the army, when the action was over, returned to his plough again.

2. His family was multiplied. He had many wives, (therein he transgressed the law,) by them he had seventy sons, v. 30. but one by a concubine, whom he named Abimelech, which signifies, my father a king; that proved the ruin of his family, v. 31.

3. He died in honour, in a good old age, when he had lived as long as he was capable of serving God and his country; and who would desire to live any longer? And he was buried in the sepulchre of his fathers.

4. After his death, the people corrupted themselves, and went all to naught. As soon as ever Gideon was dead, who had kept them close to the worship of the God of Israel, they found themselves under no restraint, and then they went a whoring after Baalim, v. 33. They went a whoring, first after another ephod, v. 27. for which irregularity Gideon had himself given them too much occasion, and now they went a whoring after another god. False worships made way for false deities. They now choose a new god, ch. 5. 8. a god of a new name, Baal-berith; a goddess, say some. Berith, some think, was Berytus, the place where the Phœnicians worshipped this idol. The Lord of a covenant, so it signifies, perhaps because his worshippers joined themselves by covenant to him, in imitation of Israel's covenanting with God, for the Devil is God's ape. In this revolt of Israel to idolatry, they shewed, 1. Great ingratitude to God, v. 34. They remembered not the Lord, not only who had delivered them into the hands of their enemies, to punish them for their idolatry, but who had also delivered them out of the hands of their enemies, to invite them back again into his service: both the judgments and the mercies were forgotten, and the impressions of them lost. 2. Great ingratitude to Gideon, v. 35. A great deal of goodness he had shewed unto Israel, as a father to his country, for which they ought to have been kind to his family when he was gone, for that is our way by which we ought to shew ourselves grateful to our friends and benefactors, and may be returning their kindnesses when they are in their graves. But Israel shewed not this kindness to Gideon's family, as we shall find in the next chapter. No wonder if those who forget their God, forget their friends.

CHAP. IX.

The apostacy of Israel, after the death of Gideon, is punished, not as the former apostacies, by a foreign invasion, or the oppressions of any neighbouring power, but by intestine broils among themselves, which in this chapter we have the story of; and it is hard to say, whether their sin, or their misery, appears most in it. It is an account of the usurpation and tyranny of Abimelech, who was base son to Gideon; so we must call him, and not, more madishly, his natural son, he was so unlike him. We are here told, I. How he thrust himself into the government at Shechem, his own city, by subtlety and cruelty, particularly by the murder of all his brethren, v. 1. .6. II. How his doom was read in a parable by Jotham, Gideon's youngest son, v. 7. .21. III. What strifes there were between Abimelech and his friends the Shechemites, v. 22. .41. IV. How this ended in the ruin of the Shechemites, (v. 42. .49.) and of Abimelech himself, v. 50. .57. Of this meteor, this ignis fatuus of a prince, that was not protector, but a plague to his country, we may say, as once was said of a great tyrant, that he came in like a fox, ruled like a lion, and died like a dog. For the transgression of a land, such are the princes thereof.

1. AND Abimelech the son of Jerubbaal went to Shechem unto his mother's brethren, and communed with them, and with all the family of the house of his mother's father, saying, 2. Speak, I pray you, in the ears of all the men of Shechem, Whether is better for you, either that all the sons of Jerubbaal, which are threescore and ten persons, reign over you, or that one reign over you? Remember also that I am your bone and your flesh. 3. And his mother's brethren spake of him in the ears of all the men of Shechem all these words: and their hearts inclined to follow Abimelech: for they said, He is our brother. 4. And they gave him threescore and ten pieces of silver out of the house of Baal-berith, wherewith Abimelech hired vain and light persons, which followed him. 5. And he went unto his father's house at Ophrah, and slew his brethren the sons of Jerubbaal, being threescore and ten persons, upon one stone: notwithstanding yet Jotham the youngest son of Jerubbaal was left; for he hid himself. 6. And all the men of Shechem gathered together, and all the house of Millo, and went, and made Abimelech king, by the plain of the pillar that was in Shechem.

We are here told by what arts Abimelech got into authority, and made himself great. His mother perhaps had instilled into his mind some towering ambitious thoughts, and the name his father gave him, carrying royalty in it, might help to blow up these sparks; and now that he has buried his father, nothing will serve his proud spirit but he will succeed him in the government of Israel, directly contrary to his father's will, for he had declared no son of his should rule over them. He had no call from God to this honour, as his father had, nor was there any present occasion for a judge to deliver Israel, as there was when his father was advanced, but his own ambition must be gratified, and that is all he aims at. Now observe here,

I. How craftily he got his mother's relations into his interests. Shechem was a city in the tribe of Ephraim, of great note, Joshua had held his last assembly there; if that city would but appear for him, and set him up, he thought it would go far in his favour. There he had an interest in the family of which his mother was, and by them he made an interest in the leading men of the city. It does not appear that any of them had an eye to him as a man of merit, who had any thing to recommend him to such a choice, but the motion came first from himself. None would have dreamed of making such a one king, if he had not dreamed of it himself. And see here, 1. How he wheedled them into the choice, v. 2, 3. He basely suggested, that Gideon having left seventy sons that made a good figure and had a good interest, they were designing to keep the power which their father had, in their hands, and by a joint influence to reign over Israel; "Now," says he, "you had better have one king than more, than many, than so many. Affairs of state are best managed by a single person," v. 2. We have no reason to think that all or any of Gideon's sons had the least intention to reign over Israel, (they were of their father's mind, that the Lord should reign over them, and they were not called of him,) yet this he insinuates, to pave the way to his own pretensions. Note, Those who design ill themselves, are commonly most apt to suspect that others design ill. As for himself, he only puts them in mind of his relation to them, Verbum sapienti—A word to the wise is sufficient; remember that I am your bone and your flesh. The plot took wonderfully. The magistrates of Shechem were pleased to think of their city being a royal city, and the metropolis of Israel, and therefore they inclined to follow him, for they said, "He is our brother, and his advancement will be our advantage." 2. How he got money from them to bear the charges of his pretensions, v. 4. They gave him seventy pieces of silver; it is not said what the value of these pieces was; so many shekels was less, and so many talents more, than we can well imagine; therefore it is supposed they were each a pound weight: but they gave it out of the house of Baal-berith, that is, out of the public treasury, which, out of respect to their idol, they deposited in his temple, to be protected by him; or, out of the offerings that had been made to that idol, which they hoped would prosper the better in his hands for its having been consecrated to their god. How unfit was he to reign over Israel, because unlikely to defend them, who, instead of restraining and punishing idolatry, thus early made himself a pensioner to an idol! 3. What soldiers he enlisted; he hired into his service vain and light persons, the scum and scoundrels of the country, men of broken fortunes, giddy heads, and profligate lives; none but such would own him, and they were fittest to serve his purpose. Like leader, like followers.

II. How cruelly he got his father's sons out of the way. The first thing he did with the rabble he headed, was, to kill all his brethren at once, publicly, and in cold blood, threescore and ten men, one only escaping, all slain upon one stone. See in this bloody tragedy, 1. The power of ambition, what beasts it will turn men into, how it will break through all the ties of natural affection and natural conscience, and sacrifice that which is most sacred, dear, and valuable, to its designs. Strange that ever it should enter into the heart of a man to be so very barbarous! 2. The peril of honour and high birth. Their being the sons of so great a man as Gideon, exposed them thus, and made Abimelech jealous of them. We find just the same number of Ahab's sons slain together at Samaria, 2 Kings, 10. 1, 7. The Grand Seigniors have seldom thought themselves safe while any of their brethren have been unstrangled. Let none envy those of high extraction, or complain of their own meanness and obscurity. The lower, the safer.

Way being thus made for Abimelech's election, the men of Shechem proceeded to choose him king, v. 6. God was not consulted whether they should have any king at all, much less who it should be; here is no advising with the priest, or with their brethren of any other city or tribe, though it was designed he should reign over Israel, v. 22. But, (1.) The Shechemites, as if they were the people, and wisdom must die with them, do all; they aided and abetted him in the murder of his brethren, (v. 24.) and then they made him king. The men of Shechem, that is, the great men, the chief magistrates of the city, and the house of Millo, that is, the common-council, the full-house, or house of fulness, as the word signifies, those that met in the Guild-hall, (we read often of the house of Millo, or state-house, in Jerusalem, or the city of David, 2 Sam. 5. 9. 2 Kings, 12. 20.) these gathered together, not to prosecute and punish Abimelech for this barbarous murder, as they ought to have done, he being one of their citizens, but to make him king. Proterium sceleris tulit hic diadema—His wickedness was rewarded with a diadem. What could they promise themselves from a king that laid the foundation of his kingdom in blood? (2.) The rest of the Israelites were so very sottish as to sit by unconcerned; they took no care to give check to this usurpation, to protect the sons of Gideon, or to avenge their death, but tamely submitted to the bloody tyrant, as men who, with their religion, had lost their reason, and all sense of honour and liberty, justice and gratitude. How vigorously had their fathers appeared to avenge the death of the Levite's concubine, and yet so wretchedly degenerate are they now, as not to attempt the avenging of the death of Gideon's sons! it is for this that they are charged with ingratitude; (ch. 8. 35.) Neither shewed they kindness to the house of Jerubbaal.

7. And when they told it to Jotham, he went and stood in the top of mount Gerizzim, and lifted up his voice, and cried, and said unto them, Hearken unto me, ye men of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you. 8. The trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them; and they said unto the olive-tree, Reign thou over us. 9. But the olive-tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honour God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees? 10. And the trees said to the fig-tree, Come thou, and reign over us. 11. But the fig-tree said unto them, Should I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees? 12. Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou, and reign over us. 13. And the vine said unto them, Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees? 14. Then said all the trees unto the bramble, Come thou, and reign over us. 15. And the bramble said unto the trees, If in truth ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow: and if not, let fire come out of the bramble, and devour the cedars of Lebanon. 16. Now therefore, if ye have done truly and sincerely, in that ye have made Abimelech king, and if ye have dealt well with Jerubbaal and his house, and have done unto him according to the deserving of his hands; 17. (For my father fought for you, and adventured his life far, and delivered you out of the hand of Midian: 18. And ye are risen up against my father's house this day, and have slain his sons, threescore and ten persons, upon one stone, and have made Abimelech, the son of his maid-servant, king over the men of Shechem, because he is your brother;) 19. If ye then have dealt truly and sincerely with Jerubbaal and with his house this day, then rejoice ye in Abimelech, and let him also rejoice in you: 20. But if not, let fire come out from Abimelech, and devour the men of Shechem, and the house of Millo; and let fire come out from the men of Shechem, and from the house of Millo, and devour Abimelech.

21. And Jotham ran away, and fled, and went to Beer, and dwelt there, for fear of Abimelech his brother.

We have here the only testimony that appears to have been borne against the wicked confederacy of Abimelech, and the men of Shechem. It was a sign they had provoked God to depart from them, that neither any prophet was sent, nor any remarkable judgment, to awaken this stupid people, and to stop the progress of this threatening mischief. Only Jotham, the youngest son of Gideon, who by a special providence escaped the common ruin of his family, (v. 5.) dealt plainly with the Shechemites; and his speech, which is here recorded, shews him to be a man of such great ingenuity and wisdom, and really such an accomplished gentleman, that we cannot but the more lament the fall of Gideon's sons. Jotham did not go about to raise an army out of the other cities of Israel, (in which, one would think, he might have made a good interest, for his father's sake,) to avenge his brethren's death, much less to set up himself in competition with Abimelech, so groundless was the usurper's suggestion, that the sons of Gideon aimed at dominion; (v. 2.) but he contents himself with giving a faithful reproof to the Shechemites, and fair warning of the fatal consequences. He got an opportunity of speaking to them from the top of mount Gerizzim, the mount of blessings, at the foot of which, probably, the Shechemites were, upon some occasion or other, gathered together, Josephus says, solemnizing a festival, and it seems they were willing to hear what he had to say.

I. His preface is very serious; (v. 7.) "Hearken unto me, ye men of Shechem, that God may hearken unto you. As ever you hope to obtain God's favour, and to be accepted of him, give me a patient and impartial hearing." Note, Those who expect God to hear their prayers, must be willing to hear reason, to hear a faithful reproof, and to hear the complaints and appeals of wronged innocency. If we turn away our ear from hearing the law, our prayer will be an abomination, Prov. 28. 9.

II. His parable is very ingenious—that when the trees were disposed to choose a king, the government was offered to those valuable trees, the olive, the fig-tree, and the vine; but they refused it, choosing rather to serve than rule, to do good than bear sway. But the same tender being made to the bramble, he accepted it with vain-glorious exultation. The way of instruction by parables is an ancient way, and very useful, especially to give reproofs by.

1. He hereby applauds the generous modesty of Gideon, and the other judges who were before him, and perhaps of the sons of Gideon, who had declined accepting the state and power of kings when they might have had it. And likewise shews that it is in general the temper of all wise and good men to decline preferment, and to choose rather to be useful than to be great.

(1.) There was no occasion at all for the trees to choose a king; they are all the trees of the Lord which he has planted, (Ps. 104. 16.) and which therefore he will protect. Nor was there any occasion for Israel to talk of setting a king over them, for the Lord was their king.

(2.) When they had it in their thoughts to choose a king, they did not offer the government to the stately cedar, or the lofty pine, which are only for shew and shade, and not otherwise useful till they are cut down, but to the fruit-trees, the vine and the olive. Those that bear fruit for the public good are justly respected and honoured by all that are wise, more than they that affect to make a figure. For a good useful man some would even dare to die.

(3.) The reason which all these fruit-trees gave for their refusal was much the same. The olive pleads, (v. 9.) Should I leave my fatness? And the vine, (v. 13.) Should I leave my wine, wherewith both God and man are served and honoured? For oil and wine were used both at God's altars and at men's tables; and shall I leave my sweetness, saith the fig-tree, and my good fruit, (v. 11.) and go to be promoted over the trees? Or, as the margin reads it, go up and down for the trees? It is intimated, [1.] That government involves a man in a great deal both of toil and care; he that is promoted over the trees, must go up and down for them, and make himself a perfect drudge to business. [2.] That those who are preferred to places of public trust and power must resolve to forego all their private interests and advantages, and sacrifice them to the good of the community. The fig-tree must lose its sweetness, its sweet retirement, sweet repose, and sweet conversation and contemplation, if it go to be promoted over the trees, and must undergo a constant fatigue. [3.] That those who are advanced to honour and dignity are in great danger of losing their fatness and fruitfulness. Preferment is apt to make men proud and slothful; and that spoils their usefulness, with which, in a lower sphere, they honoured God and man. For which reason, they that desire to do good are afraid of being too great.

2. He hereby exposes the ridiculous ambition of Abimelech, whom he compares to the bramble or thistle, v. 14. He supposes the trees to make their court to him, Come thou, and reign over us; perhaps, because he knew not that the first motion of Abimelech's preferment came from himself, as we found, (v. 2.) but thought the Shechemites had proposed it to him; however, supposing it so, his folly in accepting it deserved to be chastised. The bramble, a worthless plant, not to be numbered among the trees, useless and fruitless, nay, hurtful and vexatious, scratching and tearing, and doing mischief, it began with the curse, and its end is to be burned. Such a one was Abimelech, and yet chosen to the government by the trees, by all the trees: this election seems to have been more unanimous than any of the others. Let us not think it strange, if we see folly set in great dignity, (Ecc. 10. 6.) and the vilest men exalted, (Ps. 12. 8.) and men blind to their own interest in the choice of their guides. The bramble being chosen to the government, he takes no time to consider whether he should accept it or no, but immediately, as if he had been born and bred to dominion, hectors, and assures them they should find him as he found them. See what great swelling words of vanity he speaks, (v. 15.) what promises he makes to his faithful subjects—Let them come and trust in his shadow: a goodly shadow to trust in! How unlike to the shadow of a great rock in a weary land, which a good magistrate is compared to, Isa. 32. 2. Trust in his shadow! More likely to be injured by him than benefited. Thus men boast of a false gift. Yet he threatens with as much confidence as he promises; If ye be not faithful, let fire come out of the bramble; a very unlikely thing to emit fire, and devour the cedars of Lebanon; more likely to catch fire, and be itself devoured.

III. His application is very close and plain. In it, 1. He reminds them of the many good services his father had done for them, v. 17. He fought their battles, at the hazard of his own life, and to their unspeakable advantage. It was a shame that they needed to be put in mind of this. 2. He aggravates their unkindness to his father's family; they had not done to him according to the deserving of his hands, v. 16. Great merits often meet with very ill returns, especially to posterity, when the benefactor is forgotten, as Joseph was among the Egyptians. Gideon had left many sons that were an honour to his name and family, and those they had barbarously murdered; one son he had left, that was the blemish of his name and family, for he was the son of his maid-servant, whom all that had any respect to Gideon's honour would endeavour to conceal, yet him they made their king. In both, they put the utmost contempt imaginable upon Gideon. 3. He leaves it to the event to determine whether they had done well, whereby he lodges the appeal with the divine providence: (1.) If they prospered long in this villany, he would give them leave to say they had done well, v. 19. "If your conduct toward the house of Gideon be such as can be justified at any bar of justice, honour, or conscience, much good may it do you with your new king." But, (2.) If they had, as he was sure they had, dealt basely and wickedly in this matter, let them never expect to prosper, v. 20. Abimelech, and the Shechemites, that had strengthened one another's hands in this villany, would certainly be a plague and ruin one to another. Let none expect to do ill, and fare well.

Jotham, having given them this admonition, made a shift to escape with his life; (v. 21.) either they could not reach him, or they were so far convinced, that they would not add the guilt of his blood to all the rest: but, for fear of Abimelech, he lived in exile, in some remote obscure place. Those whose extraction and education are ever so high, know not to what difficulties and straits they may be reduced.

22. When Abimelech had reigned three years over Israel, 23. Then God sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the men of Shechem; and the men of Shechem dealt treacherously with Abimelech: 24. That the cruelty done to the threescore and ten sons of Jerubbaal might come, and their blood be laid upon Abimelech their brother, which slew them; and upon the men of Shechem, which aided him in the killing of his brethren. 25. And the men of Shechem set liers in wait for him in the top of the mountains, and they robbed all that came along that way by them: and it was told Abimelech. 26. And Gaal the son of Ebed came with his brethren, and went over to Shechem: and the men of Shechem put their confidence in him. 27. And they went out into the fields, and gathered their vineyards, and trode the grapes, and made merry, and went into the house of their god, and did eat and drink, and cursed Abimelech. 28. And Gaal the son of Ebed said, Who is Abimelech, and who is Shechem, that we should serve him? Is not he the son of Jerubbaal? and Zebul his officer? serve the men of Hamor the father of Shechem: for why should we serve him? 29. And would to God this people were under my hand! then would I remove Abimelech. And he said to Abimelech, Increase thine army, and come out. 30. And when Zebul the ruler of the city heard the words of Gaal the son of Ebed, his anger was kindled. 31. And he sent messengers unto Abimelech privily, saying, Behold, Gaal the son of Ebed and his brethren be come to Shechem; and, behold, they fortify the city against thee. 32. Now therefore up by night, thou and the people that is with thee, and lie in wait in the field: 33. And it shall be, that in the morning, as soon as the sun is up, thou shalt rise early, and set upon the city: and, behold, when he and the people that is with him, come out against thee, then mayest thou do to them as thou shalt find occasion. 34. And Abimelech rose up, and all the people that were with him, by night, and they laid wait against Shechem in four companies. 35. And Gaal the son of Ebed went out, and stood in the entering of the gate of the city: and Abimelech rose up, and the people that were with him, from lying in wait. 36. And when Gaal saw the people, he said to Zebul, Behold, there come people down from the top of the mountains. And Zebul said unto him, Thou seest the shadow of the mountains as if they were men. 37. And Gaal spake again, and said, See, there come people down by the middle of the land, and another company come along by the plain of Meonenim. 38. Then said Zebul unto him, Where is now thy mouth, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech, that we should serve him? is not this the people that thou hast despised? Go out, I pray now, and fight with them. 39. And Gaal went out before the men of Shechem, and fought with Abimelech. 40. And Abimelech chased him, and he fled before him, and many were overthrown and wounded, even unto the entering of the gate. 41. And Abimelech dwelt at Arumah: and Zebul thrust out Gaal and his brethren, that they should not dwell in Shechem. 42. And it came to pass on the morrow, that the people went out into the field; and they told Abimelech. 43. And he took the people, and divided them into three companies, and laid wait in the field, and looked, and behold, the people were come forth out of the city; and he rose up against them, and smote them. 44. And Abimelech, and the company that was with him, rushed forward, and stood in the entering of the gate of the city: and the two other companies ran upon all the people that were in the fields, and slew them. 45. And Abimelech fought against the city all that day; and he took the city, and slew the people that was therein, and beat down the city, and sowed it with salt. 46. And when all the men of the tower of Shechem heard that, they entered into an hold of the house of the god Berith. 47. And it was told Abimelech, that all the men of the tower of Shechem were gathered together. 48. And Abimelech gat him up to mount Zalmon, he and all the people that were with him; and Abimelech took an axe in his hand, and cut down a bough from the trees, and took it, and laid it on his shoulder, and said unto the people that were with him, What ye have seen me do, make haste, and do as I have done. 49. And all the people likewise cut down every man his bough, and followed Abimelech, and put them to the hold, and set the hold on fire upon them; so that all the men of the tower of Shechem died also, about a thousand men and women.

Three years Abimelech reigned, after a sort, without any disturbance; it is not said, He judged Israel, or did any service at all to his country, but, So long, he enjoyed the title and dignity of a king; and not only the Shechemites, but many other places, paid him respect. They must have been fond of a king, that could please themselves with such a one as this.

But the triumphing of the wicked is short. Within three years, as the years of a hireling, all this glory shall be contemned, and laid in the dust, Isa. 16. 14. The ruin of these confederates in wickedness, was from the righteous hand of the God to whom vengeance belongs. He sent an evil spirit between Abimelech and the Shechemites; (v. 23.) that is, they grew jealous one of another, and ill-affected one to another. He slighted them that set him up, and countenanced, perhaps more than their's, other cities, which now began to come into his interests; and then they grew uneasy at his government, blamed his conduct, and quarrelled at his impositions. This was from God. He permitted the devil, that great mischief-maker, to sow discord between them, and he is an evil spirit, whom God not only keeps under his cheek, but sometimes serves his own purposes by. Their own lusts were evil spirits, they are devils in men's own hearts, from them come wars and fightings. These God gave them up to, and so might be said to send the evil spirits between them. When men's sin is made their punishment, though God is not the Author of the sin, yet the punishment is from him. The quarrel God had with Abimelech and the Shechemites, was for the murder of the sons of Gideon; (v. 24.) That the cruelty done to them might come, and their blood be laid as a burthen upon Abimelech that slew them, and the men of Shechem that helped him. Note, 1. Sooner or later, God will make inquisition for blood, innocent blood, and will return it on the heads of those that shed it, who shall have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy. 2. Accessories shall be reckoned with, as well as principals, in that and other sins. The Shechemites, that countenanced Abimelech's pretensions, aided and abetted him in his bloody projects, and avowed the fact by making him king after he had done it, must fall with him, fall by him, and fall first. 3. Those that combine together, to do wickedly, are justly dashed in pieces one against another. Blood cannot be a lasting cement to any interest.

1. The Shechemites began to affront Abimelech; perhaps they scarcely knew why, or wherefore, but they were given to change. 1. They dealt treacherously with him, v. 23. It is not said, They repented of their sin in owning him; had they done so, it had been laudable to disown him; but they did it only upon some particular pique, conceived against him by their pride or envy. They that set him up were the first that deserted him, and endeavoured to dethrone him. It is not strange that those who were ungrateful to Gideon were unfaithful to Abimelech; for what will hold those that will not be held by the obligation of such merits as Gideon's? Note, It is just with God, that those who tempt others to be once perfidious, should afterward be themselves betrayed by those whom they have taught to be perfidious. 2. They aimed to seize him when he was at Arumah, (v. 41.) his country-seat; expecting him to come to town, they set liers in wait for him, (v. 25.) who should make him their prisoner, whom they had lately made their prince. Those who were thus posted, he not coming, took the opportunity of robbing travellers, which would help to make the people more and more uneasy under Abimelech, when they saw he could not, or would not, protect them from highwaymen. 3. They entertained one Gaal, and set him up as their head in opposition to Abimelech, v. 26. This Gaal is said to be the son of Ebed, which signifies a servant, perhaps denoting the meanness of his extraction; as Abimelech was by the mother's side, so he by the father's, the son of a servant; here was one bramble contesting with another. We have reason to suspect that this Gaal was a native Canaanite, because he courts the Shechemites into subjection to the men of Hamor, who was the ancient lord of this city in Jacob's time. He was a bold ambitious man, served their purpose admirably well, when they were disposed to quarrel with Abimelech, and they also served his purpose; so he went over to them to blow the coals, and they put their confidence in him. 4. They did all the despite they could to Abimelech's name, v. 27. They made themselves very merry in his absence, as those who were glad he was out of the way, and who, now that they had another to head them, were in hopes to get clear of him: nay, they went into the house of their god, to solemnize their feast of in-gathering, and there they did eat, and drink, and cursed Abimelech; not only said all the ill they could of him in their table-talk and the song of their drunkards, but wished all the ill they could to him over their sacrifices, praying to their idol to destroy him. They drank healths to his confusion, and with as loud huzzas as ever they had drunk them to his prosperity. That very temple whence they had fetched money to set him up with, did they now meet in to curse him, and contrive his ruin. Had they deserted their idol-god with their image-king, they might have hoped to prosper; but while they still cleave to the former, the latter shall cleave to them to their ruin. How should Satan cast out Satan? 5. They pleased themselves with Gaal's defying of Abimelech, v. 28, 29. They loved to hear that impudent upstart speak scornfully, (1.) Of Abimelech; though, calling him in disdain Shechem, or a Shechemite, he reflected upon their own city. (2.) Of his good father likewise, Gideon; Is not he the son of Jerubbaal? So he calls him, perhaps in an impious indignation at his name and memory, for throwing down the altar of Baal; turning that to his reproach which was his praise. (3.) Of his prime minister of state, Zebul his officer, and ruler of the city. "We may well be ashamed to serve them, and need not be afraid to oppose them." Men of turbulent ambitious spirits thus despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities. Gaal aimed not to recover Shechem's liberty, only to change their tyrant, "Oh that this people were under my hand, what I would do! I would challenge Abimelech to try titles for the crown; and it should seem he desired his friends to send him word that he was ready to dispute it with him whenever he pleased; "Increase thine army, and come out. Do thy worst; let the point be determined by the sword." This pleased the Shechemites, who were now as sick of Abimelech as ever they had been fond of him. Men of no conscience will be men of no constancy.

II. Abimelech turned all his force upon them, and, in a little time, quite ruined them. Observe the steps of it.

1. The Shechemites' counsels were betrayed to Abimelech by Zebul his confidant, the ruler of the city, who continued hearty for him. His anger was kindled, (v. 30.) and the more, because Gaal had spoken slightly of him; (v. 28.) for perhaps if he had complimented and caressed him, now that things were in this ferment, he might have gained him to his interest; but he, being disobliged, sends notice to Abimelech of all that was said and done in Shechem against him, v. 31. Betrayers are often betrayed by some among themselves, and the cursing of the king is sometimes strangely carried by a bird of the air. He prudently advises him to come against the city immediately, and lose no time, v. 32, 33. He thinks it best that he should march his forces by night into the neighbourhood, surprise the city in the morning, and then make the best of his advantages. How could the Shechemites hope to speed in their attempt, when the ruler of their city was in the interests of their enemy? They knew it, and yet took no care to secure him.

2. Gaal, that headed their faction, having been betrayed by Zebul, Abimelech's confidant, was most wretchedly bantered by him. Abimelech, according to Zebul's advice, drew all his forces down upon Shechem by night, v. 34. Gaal, in the morning, went out to the gate, (v. 35.) to see what posture things were in, and to inquire, What news? Zebul, as a ruler of the city, met him there as a friend. Abimelech and his forces beginning to move toward the city, Gaal discovers them; (v. 36.) takes notice of their approach to Zebul that was standing with him, little thinking that he had sent for them, and was now expecting them. "Look," says he, "do not I see a body of men coming down from the mountain towards us? Yonder they are," pointing to the place; "No, no," says Zebul, "thine eye-sight deceives thee, it is but the shadow of the mountains, which thou takest to be an army." By this he intended, (1.) To ridicule him, as a man of no sense or spirit, and therefore very unfit for what he pretended to; as a man that might easily be imposed upon, and made to believe any thing, and that was so silly and so cowardly, that he apprehended danger where there was none, and was ready to fight with a shadow. (2.) To detain him, and hold him in talk, while the forces of Abimelech were coming up, that thereby they might gain advantage. But when Gaal, being content to believe those he now saw to be but the shadow of the mountains, (perhaps the mountains of Ebal and Gerizzim, which lay close by the city,) was undeceived by the discovery of two other companies that marched apace toward the city, then Zebul took another way to banter him, upbraiding him with what he had said but a day or two before, in contempt of Abimelech; (v. 38.) "Where is now thy mouth, that foul mouth of thine, wherewith thou saidst, Who is Abimelech?" Note, Proud and haughty people are often made, in a little time, to change their note, and to dread those whom they had most despised. Gaal had, in a bravado, challenged Abimelech to increase his army, and come out; but now Zebul, in Abimelech's name, challenges him: "Go out, and fight with them, if thou darest." Justly are the insolent thus insulted over.

3. Abimelech routed Gaal's forces that sallied out of the town, v. 39, 40. Gaal, disheartened, no doubt, by Zebul's hectoring him, and perceiving his interest weaker than he thought it was, though he marched out against Abimelech with what little force he had, was soon put to the worst, and obliged to retire into the city with great precipitation. In this action the Shechemites' loss was considerable, many were overthrown and wounded; the common effect of popular tumults, in which the inconsiderate multitude are often drawn into fatal snares by those that promise them glorious success.

4. Zebul, that night, expelled Gaal, and the party he had brought with him into Shechem, out of the city, (v. 41.) sending him to the place whence he came. For though the generality of the city continued still averse to Abimelech, as appears by the sequel of the story, yet they were willing to part with Gaal, and did not oppose his expulsion, because, though he had talked big, both his conduct and courage had failed him when there was occasion for them. Most people judge of men's fitness for business by their success, and he that does not speed well is concluded not to do well. Well, Gaal's interest in Shechem is soon at an end, and he that had talked of removing Abimelech is himself removed, nor do we ever hear of him any more. Exit Gaal—Gaal retires.

5. Abimelech, the next day, set upon the city, and quite destroyed it, for their treacherous dealings with him. Perhaps Abimelech had notice of their expelling Gaal, who had headed the faction, with which they thought he would have been satisfied; but the crime was too deep to be thus atoned for, and his resentments too keen to be pacified by so small an instance of submission, besides that it was more Zebul's act than their's; by it their hands were weakened, and therefore he resolved to follow his blow, and effectually to chastise their treachery. (1.) He had intelligence brought him that the people of Shechem were come out into the field; (v. 42.) some think, into the field of business, to plough and sow, (having lately gathered in their harvest,) or to perfect their harvest, for it was only their vintage that they had made an end of, (v. 27.) and then it intimates that they were secure. And because Abimelech was retired, (v. 41.) they thought themselves in no danger from him, and then the issue of it is an instance of sudden destruction coming upon those that cry, Peace and safety. Others think they went out into the field of battle; though Gaal was driven out, they would not lay down their arms, but put themselves into a posture for another engagement with Abimelech, in which they hoped to retrieve what they had lost the day before. (2.) He himself, with a strong detachment, cut off the communication between them and the city; stood in the entering of the gate, (v. 44.) that they might neither make their retreat into the city, nor receive any succours from the city, and then sent two companies of his men, who were too strong for them, and they put them all to the sword, ran upon them that were in the fields, and slew them. When we go out about our business, we are not sure that we shall come home again; there are deaths both in the city and in the field. (3.) He then fell upon the city itself, and, with a rage reaching up to heaven, though it was the place of his nativity, laid it in ruins, slew all the people, beat down all the buildings, and, in token of his desire that it might be a perpetual desolation, sowed it with salt, that it might remain a lasting monument of the punishment of perfidiousness. Yet Abimelech prevailed not to make its desolations perpetual, for it was afterward rebuilt, and became so considerable a place, that all Israel came thither to make Rehoboam king, 1 Kings, 12. 1. And the place proved an ill omen. Abimelech intended hereby to punish the Shechemites for their slighting him now, but God intended to punish them for their serving of him formerly in the murder of Gideon's sons. Thus, when God makes use of men as instruments in his hand to do his work, he means one thing, and they another, Isa. 10. 6, 7. They design to maintain their honour, but God to maintain his.

6. Those that retired into a strong hold of their idol-temple, were all destroyed there. These are called the men of the tower of Shechem, (v. 46, 47.) some castle that belonged to that city, but lay at some distance from it; they, hearing of the destruction of the city, withdrew into a hold of the temple, trusting, it is likely, not so much to its strength as to its sanctity; they put themselves under the protection of their idol; for thus all people will walk in the name of their god; and shall not we then choose to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of our life? for in the time of trouble he shall hide us in his pavilion, Ps. 27. 5. The name of the Lord is a strong tower, Prov. 18. 10. But that which they hoped would have been for their welfare, proved to them a snare and a trap, as those will certainly find, that run to idols for shelter; it will prove a refuge of lies. When Abimelech had them all together penned up in that hold, he desired no more. That barbarous project immediately came into his head, of setting fire to the strong hold, and, so to speak, burning all the birds together in the nest. He kept the design to himself, but set all his men on work to expedite the execution of it, v. 48, 49. He ordered them all to follow him, and do as he did: as his father had said to his men, (ch. 7. 17.) Look on me, and do likewise; so said he to his, as becomes a general that will not be wanting to give both the plainest direction, and the highest encouragement that can be, to his soldiers, What ye have seen me do, make haste to do as I have done.—Not Ite illic—Go thither, but Venite huc—Come hither. The officers in Christ's army should thus teach by their example, Phil. 4. 9. He and they fetched each of them a bough from a wood, not far off, laid all their boughs together under the wall of this tower, which, it is probable, was of wood, set fire to their boughs, and so burnt down their hold, and all that were in it, who were either burnt or stifled with the smoke. What inventions men have to destroy one another! Whence come these cruel wars and fightings, but from their lusts? Some think that the men of the tower of Shechem were the same with the house of Millo, and then Jotham's just imprecation was answered in the letter, Let fire come out from Abimelech, and devour not only in general the men of Shechem, but in particular the house of Millo, v. 20. About one thousand men and women perished in these flames, many of whom, it is probable, were no way concerned in the quarrel between Abimelech and the Shechemites, nor meddled with either side, yet, in this civil war, came to this miserable end; for men of factious turbulent spirits perish not alone in their iniquity, but involve many more, that follow them in their simplicity, in the same calamity with them.

50. Then went Abimelech to Thebez, and encamped against Thebez, and took it. 51. But there was a strong tower within the city, and thither fled all the men and women, and all they of the city, and shut it to them, and gat them up to the top of the tower. 52. And Abimelech came unto the tower, and fought against it, and went hard unto the door of the tower to burn it with fire. 53. And a certain woman cast a piece of a millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to break his skull. 54. Then he called hastily unto the young man his armour-bearer, and said unto him, Draw thy sword, and slay me, that men say not of me, A woman slew him. And his young man thrust him through, and he died. 55. And when the men of Israel saw that Abimelech was dead, they departed every man unto his place. 56. Thus God rendered the wickedness of Abimelech, which he did unto his father, in slaying his seventy brethren: 57. And all the evil of the men of Shechem did God render upon their heads: and upon them came the curse of Jotham the son of Jerubbaal.

We have seen the ruin of the Shechemites completed by the hand of Abimelech; and now it comes to his turn to be reckoned with, who was their leader in villany. Thebez was a small city, probably not far from Shechem, dependent upon it, and in confederacy with it. Now,

I. Abimelech attempted the destruction of this city, (v. 50.) drove all the inhabitants of the town into the castle, or citadel, v. 51. When he had them there, he did not doubt but he should do the same execution here that he had lately done at the strong hold of the temple of Baal-berith, not considering that the tower of an idol-temple lay more exposed to divine vengeance than any other tower. He attempted to set fire to this tower, at least, to burn down the door, and so force an entrance, v. 52. Those who have escaped, and succeeded well in one desperate attempt, are apt to think the like attempt another time not desperate. This instance was long after quoted, to shew how dangerous it is to come near the wall of a besieged city, 2 Sam. 11. 20, &c. But God infatuates those whom he will ruin.

II. In the attempt, he was himself destroyed, having his brains knocked out with a piece of a millstone, v. 57. No doubt this man was a murderer, whom, though he had escaped the dangers of the war with Shechem, yet vengeance suffered not to live, Acts, 23. 4. Evil pursues sinners, and sometimes overtakes them then when they are not only secure, but triumphant. Thebez, we may suppose, was a weak inconsiderable place, conquered with Shechem. Abimelech, having conquered the bigger, makes no doubt of being master of the less without any difficulty, especially when he had taken the city, and had only the tower to deal with; yet he lays his bones with that, and there is all his honour buried. Thus are the mighty things of the world often confounded by the weakest, and those things that are most made light of. See here what rebukes those are justly put under many times by the divine providence, that are unreasonable in their demands of satisfaction for injuries received. Abimelech had some reason to chastise the Shechemites, and he had done it with a witness; but when he will carry his revenges further, and nothing will serve but that Thebez also must be sacrificed to his rage, he is not only disappointed there, but destroyed, for verily there is a God that judges in the earth.

Three circumstances are observed in the death of Abimelech. 1. That he was slain with a stone, as he had slain his brethren all upon one stone. 2. That he had his skull broken: vengeance aimed at that guilty head which had worn the usurped crown. 3. That the stone was cast upon him by a woman, v. 53. He saw the stone come, it was therefore strange he did not avoid it; but, no doubt, it made it so much the greater mortification to him, to see from what hand it came. Sisera died by a woman's hand, and knew it not; but Abimelech knew it, and when he found himself ready to breathe his last, nothing troubled him so much as this, that it should be said, A woman slew him. See, (1.) His foolish pride, in laying so much to heart this little circumstance of his disgrace. Here was no care taken about his precious soul, no concern what would become of that, no prayer to God for his mercy; but very solicitous he is to patch up his shattered credit, when there is no patching of his shattered skull. Oh let it never be said that such a mighty man as Abimelech was killed by a woman! The man was dying, but his pride was alive and strong, and the same vain-glorious humour that had governed him all along, appears now at last. Qua- lis vita, finis ita—As was his life, such was his death. As God punished his cruelty by the manner of his death, so he punished his pride by the instrument of it. (2.) His foolish project to avoid this disgrace; nothing could be more ridiculous; his own servant must run him through, not to rid him the sooner out of his pain, but that men say not, A woman slew him. Could he think that this would conceal what the woman had done, and not rather proclaim it the more? Nay, it added to the infamy of his death, for hereby he becomes a self-murderer. Better have it said, A woman slew him, than that it should be said, His servant slew him by his own order; yet now both will be said of him, to his everlasting reproach. And it is observable, that this very thing, which Abimelech was in such care to conceal, appears to have been more particularly remembered by posterity, than most passages of this history; for Joab speaks of it, as that which he expected David would reproach him with, for coming so nigh the wall, 2 Sam. 11. 21. The ignominy we seek to avoid by sin, we do but perpetuate the remembrance of.

Now the issue of all is, that, Abimelech being slain, [1.] Israel's peace was restored, and an end was put to this civil war, for they that followed him departed every man unto his place, v. 55. [2.] God's justice was glorified, v. 56, 57. Thus God punished the wickedness of Abimelech, and of the men of Shechem, and performed Jotham's curse, for it was not a curse causeless. Thus he preserved the honour of his government, and gave warning to all ages to expect blood for blood. The Lord is known by these judgments which he executes, when the wicked is snared in the work of his own hauds. Though wickedness may prosper a while, it will not prosper always.

CHAP. X.

In this chapter we have, I. The peaceable times Israel enjoyed under the government of two judges, Tola and Jair, v. 1. .5. II. The troublesome times that ensued. 1. Israel's sin that brought them into trouble, v. 6. 2. The trouble itself they were in, v. 7. .9. III. Their repentance and humiliation for sin, their prayers and reformation; and the mercy they found with God thereupon, v. 10. .16. IV. Preparation made for their deliverance out of the hand of their oppressors, v. 17, 18.

1. AND after Abimelech there arose to defend Israel Tola the son of Puah, the son of Dodo, a man of Issachar; and he dwelt in Shamir in mount Ephraim. 2. And he judged Israel twenty and three years, and died, and was buried in Shamir. 3. And after him arose Jair a Gileadite, and judged Israel twenty and two years. 4. And he had thirty sons that rode on thirty ass colts, and they had thirty cities, which are called Havoth-jair unto this day, which are in the land of Gilead. 5. And Jair died, and was buried in Camon.

Quiet and peaceable reigns, though the best to live in, are the worst to write of, as yielding least variety of matter for the historian to entertain his reader with; such were the reigns of these two judges, Tola and Jair, who make but a small figure, and take up but a very little room in this history. But, no doubt, they were both raised up of God to serve their country in the quality of judges, not pretending, as Abimelech had done, to the grandeur of kings, nor, like him, taking the honour they had to themselves; they were called of God to it.

1. Concerning Tola, it is said, that he arose after Abimelech to defend Israel, v. 1. After Abimelech had debauched Israel by his wickedness, disquieted and disturbed them by his restless ambition, and, by the mischiefs he brought on them, exposed them to enemies from abroad, God animated this good man to appear for the reforming of abuses, the putting down of idolatry, the appeasing of tumults, and the healing of the wounds given to the state by Abimelech's usurpation. Thus he saved them from themselves, and guarded them against their enemies. He was of the tribe of Issachar, a tribe disposed to serve, for he bowed his shoulder to bear; (Gen. 49. 14, 15.) yet one of that tribe is here raised up to rule; for those that humble themselves shall be exalted. He bore the name of him that was ancestor to the first family of that tribe; of the sons of Issachar, Tola was the first, Gen. 46. 13. Numb. 26. 23. It signifies a worm, yet, being the name of his ancestor, he was not ashamed of it. Though he was of Issachar, yet, when he was raised up to the government, he came and dwelt in mount Ephraim, which was more in the heart of the country, that the people might the more conveniently resort to him for judgment. He judged Israel twenty-three years; (v. 2.) kept things in good order, but did not any thing very memorable.

2. Jair was a Gileadite, so was his next successor Jephthah, both of that half tribe of the tribe of Manasseh which lay on the other side Jordan; though they seemed separated from their brethren, yet God took care, while the honour of the government was shifted from tribe to tribe, and before it settled in Judah, that they who lay remote should sometimes share in it, putting more abundant honour on that part which lacked. Jair bore the name of a very famous man of the same tribe, who, in Moses's time, was very active in reducing this country, Numb. 32. 41. Josh. 13. 30. That which is chiefly remarkable concerning this Jair, is, the increase and honour of his family, he had thirty sons, v. 4. And, (1.) They had good preferments, for they rode on thirty ass colts; that is, they were judges itinerant, who, as deputies to their father, trode from place to place, in their several circuits, to administer justice. We find afterward that Samuel made his sons judges, though he could not make them good ones, 1 Sam. 8. 1. .3. (2.) They had good possessions; every one a city, out of those that were called, from their ancestor, of the same name with their father, Havoth-jair; the villages of Jair; yet they are called cities, either because those young gentlemen, to whom they were assigned, enlarged and fortified them, and so improved them into cities; or because they were as well pleased with their lot, in those country towns, as if they had been cities compact together, and fenced with gates and bars. Villages are cities to a contented mind.

6. And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the LORD, and served Baalim and Ashtaroth, and the gods of Syria, and the gods of the Zidon, and the gods of Moab, and the gods of the children of Ammon, and the gods of the Philistines, and forsook the LORD, and served not him. 7. And the anger of the LORD was hot against Israel, and he sold them into the hands of the Philistines, and into the hands of the children of Ammon. 8. And that year they vexed and oppressed the children of Israel eighteen years, all the children of Israel that were on the other side Jordan in the land of the Amorites, which is in Gilead. 9. Moreover the children of Ammon passed over Jordan to fight also against Judah, and against Benjamin, and against the house of Ephraim; so that Israel was sore distressed.

While those two judges, Tola and Jair, presided in the affairs of Israel, things went well, but afterward,

1. Israel returned to their idolatry, that sin which did most easily beset them; (v. 6.) they did evil again in the sight of the Lord, from whom they were unaccountably bent to backslide, as a foolish people and unwise. 1. They worshipped many gods; not only their old demons Baalim and Ashtaroth, which the Canaanites had worshipped, but, as if they would proclaim their folly to all their neighbours, they served the gods of Syria, Zidon, Moab, Ammon, and the Philistines. It looks as if the chief trade of Israel were to import deities from all countries. It is hard to say whether it was more impious or impolitic to do this. By introducing these foreign deities, they rendered themselves mean and despicable, for no nation, that had any sense of honour, changed their gods. Much of the wealth of Israel, we may suppose, was carried out, in offerings to the temples of the deities in the several countries whence they came, on which, as their mother-churches, their temples in Israel were expected to own their dependence; the priests and devotees of those sorry deities would follow their gods, no doubt, in crowds into the land of Israel, and, if they could not live in their own country, would take root there, and so "strangers would devour their strength." If they did it in compliment to the neighbouring nations, and to ingratiate themselves with them, justly were they disappointed; for those nations which by their wicked arts they sought to make their friends, by the righteous judgments of God became their enemies and oppressors. In quo quis peccat, in eo punitur—Wherein a person offends, therein he shall be punished. 2. They did not so much as admit the God of Israel to be one of those many deities they worshipped, but quite cast him off; they forsook the Lord, and served not him at all. Those that think to serve both God and mammon, will soon come entirely to forsake God, and to serve mammon only. If God have not all the heart, he will soon have none of it.
